Caimans Are Making A Comeback In Brazil. The New York Times (9/6, Rohter) reports from Mamiraua, Brazil, "As dusk falls, the waters here gradually come alive. One after another, caimans begin to stick their armored heads above the surface, and before long this isolated, tree-lined channel feeding the Amazon is teeming with crocodilians as large as 15 feet long. Their thrashing, splashing and grunting reverberates all through the night. Just a generation ago the caiman, a cousin of the American alligator, was driven so near extinction by the demand for its skin and meat that the government banned hunting it. But efforts to protect the black and spectacled caiman (pronounced KAY-men) have proved so successful that the population has exploded and the beast has now become a pest and, according to some, a threat." The Times adds, "Peasants along the rivers complain that caimans devour their livestock, and they are clamoring for the right to resume hunting. Even small children are occasionally attacked at the river's edge, leading local newspapers and radio stations to say the officials in far away Brasília know nothing about the hard realities of river life. The loudest and most constant protests, however, come from fishermen in areas like this, 450 miles west of Manaus, the capital of Amazonas State. They complain that the resurgent caimans destroy their nets, which can cost between $50 and $200, and consume large quantities of the same game fish that they need to catch and sell to feed their families."

House Judiciary Leaders Penning Tough Anti-Steroids Measure. USA Today (9/6, Kiely) reports House Judiciary Chairman James Sensenbrenner "plans to unveil a new proposal this week to crack down on steroid use in sports, another sign of the growing determination by Congress to impose tougher testing standards and penalties on pro sports." Sensenbrenner and Judiciary ranking Democrat John Conyers are co-authoring a bill that "would put the Justice Department in charge of developing 'minimum standards' for testing and penalties. Participation in the program would be voluntary, but Sensenbrenner says there will be 'incentives' to encourage pro sports leagues to sign up. He did not elaborate on what those incentives might be. But in baseball's case the Judiciary Committee could threaten to lift the sport's antitrust exemption. Lawmakers are returning to Congress this week for the first time since news broke of Baltimore Orioles star Rafael Palmeiro's 10-day suspension last month for steroid use. That has stoked many members' exasperation. 'That's called a vacation; that's not a suspension,' said Rep. Chris Shays, R-Conn." In Congress, "frustration with professional sports in general, and Major League Baseball in particular, is growing. As they prepared to return to town this week from a month-long August recess, a number of Republican and Democratic lawmakers said the Palmeiro revelations would build momentum for federally mandated drug tests and penalties in pro sports. 'Obviously the current approach on steroids both in professional sports and amateur sports is not working,' says Sensenbrenner. The bill will be the sixth measure introduced in Congress this year to regulate steroids in pro sports. All of the bills have bipartisan support. All would impose much stiffer penalties than the one levied on Palmeiro."

Orioles Send Palmeiro Home. The AP (9/5) reports Palmeiro "was sent home to Texas to rehabilitate knee and ankle injuries, leaving his baseball future unclear during a season in which he was suspended for a positive steroids test. Palmeiro's season unraveled soon after he collected his 3,000th career hit on July 15. He received a 10-day suspension on Aug. 1 for failing a drug test, and upon his return was booed by fans in Baltimore and on the road. He is 2-for-26 with one RBI since coming back, and has been bothered the past two weeks by injuries to his left ankle and right knee. The Orioles still expect him to play this month, but decided Monday that the first baseman should go home to recover."

Chiefs Offensive Lineman Suspended Over Steroids. The AP (9/3) reported, "Kansas City Chiefs offensive lineman John Welbourn has been suspended for four games for violation of the league's steroid policy. 'John has been suspended,' coach Dick Vermeil told The Associated Press on Saturday. 'We are moving forward. I really can't say any more than that right now.'"

Prosecutors Drop Fraud Charges Against DEA's Clark. The AP (9/3) reported, "Prosecutors have dropped the fraud charges against a man whose wife falsely claimed to have cancer and collected thousands of dollars in donations. Salt Lake County prosecutors said Wednesday they no longer felt they could prove Drug Enforcement Agency officer Jeff James Clark was part of the scam perpetrated by his wife, Tania Clark." Tania Clark, "who has pleaded guilty to felony counts of theft and theft by deception in Utah and Salt Lake counties, is taking sole responsibility for the crimes, said Deputy Salt Lake County District Attorney Robert Stott." Jeff Clark's job status "remains uncertain, DEA spokeswoman Karen Flowers said Thursday, and he remains on unpaid administrative leave."

US Army Soldier Headed Colombia-To-US Cocaine Smuggling Ring. The AP (9/3, Housego) wrote, "U.S. Army Staff Sgt. Daniel Rosas was deployed to Colombia as part of the large U.S. mission to fight drug trafficking, but before long he found the lure of cocaine money too hard to resist. He formed a smuggling ring involving U.S. soldiers that was eventually busted, deeply embarrassing U.S. officials." A deposition "shows Rosas' scheme was so amateurish that at one point he made a deal with a stranger he met in a Mexican nightclub bathroom and even saw a $140,000 payment vanish in the mail. The authenticity of Rosas' sworn statement was recently confirmed by a Colombian official familiar with the case. The document provides for the first time a detailed look into how the drug ring operated and shows that, with stunning ease, it was able to send 170 pounds of cocaine from Colombia to the United States, subject to only cursory searches at best from U.S. Customs agents." In a sworn statement to military investigators in March, Rosas said, "They never suspected that any military or civilian personnel would bring back contraband. They did not use dogs, they very rarely checked our carryon bags but never checked our equipment that was loaded on the pallets." US Ambassador William Wood said that "in the wake of the arrests on March 28 that U.S. soldiers leaving Colombia would be subjected to stricter searches. The case infuriated many Colombians who said President Alvaro Uribe should revoke treaties granting immunity to U.S. soldiers serving in Colombia. Rosas, 23, of McAllen, Texas, is behind bars awaiting court-martial along with two other U.S. soldiers. A fourth soldier, Spc. Francisco Rosa, pleaded guilty on Aug. 10 to using, possessing and distributing cocaine and making a false official statement. He was sentenced to five years in prison, demoted to the rank of private and will receive a bad conduct discharge."

Gun Control Initiatives Weaken In South. The Boston Globe (9/6, Wirzbicki) reports, "Even as Boston struggles against a tide of smuggled handguns, some state governments in the South are loosening their gun control laws in ways that critics say will make it easier for traffickers to bring illegal firearms into the Northeast." The Globe continues, "Under pressure from the National Rifle Association, South Carolina abolished a state law last year that limited to one the number of handguns individuals can buy in a month, a measure that was designed in 1975 to prevent trafficking." The Globe adds, "Virginia, which was the epicenter of gun smuggling into New York and Boston before it passed a one-gun-per-month law in 1993, weakened that rule in 2004 and gun control advocates fear that it could soon be abolished. … Academic studies have shown that limits on monthly gun purchases help limit smuggling, but lobbyists for gun manufacturers call such laws ''gun rationing' and say they infringe on Second Amendment gun ownership rights. … Over the past five years the overall trend on the state level has been toward lax gun laws, said David Hemenway, a professor at the Harvard School of Public Health who studies gun crime. That has left states such as Massachusetts and New York, which retain their strict gun limits, increasingly isolated."

1.7 Million Children Live In Homes With A Loaded, Unlocked Gun. A survey published today in the Pediatrics online journal found that 1.7 million US children live in homes with loaded, unlocked firearms. USA Today (9/6, Elias) reports, "One-third of adults have handguns, rifles or shotguns at home, says the CDC report. But states vary greatly in the percentage of adults who keep weapons, and in how many with children at home store their guns loaded and unlocked. The states with the highest percentage of adults who have children at home and leave guns unlocked and loaded are Alabama, Alaska, Arkansas, Idaho, Montana and Wyoming. … The Pediatrics report says that of 1,400 children and teens shot to death in 2002, about 90% were home when it happened."

IMMIGRATION:

Fox Says US Shares Responsibility For Illegal Immigration. The New York Times (9/5, Thompson) reports Mexican President Vicente Fox "responded over the weekend to criticism from American authorities about a recent surge in violence and illegal immigration along the border, saying that the United States shares responsibility for the problems and should work harder with Mexico to fix them." Fox "said he rejected 'forcefully' the statements by the Bush administration and governors of border states, contending that they had unfairly depicted Mexico as a safe haven for organized crime, though his government has arrested more leading drug traffickers and dismantled more cartels than any of its predecessors. He also said Mexican immigrants had been portrayed unfairly as potential terrorists when they had in fact become a pillar of the American economy.

Union Organizers Focus On Low-Wage, Immigrant Workers. Several "insurgent unions" are hoping to revive the labor movement by focusing n low-wage and immigrant workers, the New York Times (9/6, Greenhouse) reports. This summer, the United Food and Commercial Workers, "joined the Teamsters and the Service Employees International Union in breaking away from the A.F.L.-C.I.O., with those three unions promising to devote far more energy to recruiting workers than the rest of organized labor has. Two organizing drives aimed at poultry workers…are among the early battles in this effort to reinvigorate labor."

Jailed Telecom Tycoon Said To Be Trying To Move Assets. The Legal Times (9/5, McLure) reports, "Even from jail, Walter Anderson, the D.C. telecom tycoon accused of concealing $450 million from the Internal Revenue Service, continued to try to hide money overseas, federal prosecutors say." The Times continues, "On Aug. 24, prosecutors filed in court a transcript of a taped jailhouse phone call from Anderson to an overseas business associate that they say shows him trying to move assets beyond the government's reach. On March 22, Anderson placed a collect call to the associate from the D.C. Correctional Treatment Facility to discuss moving an investment from a Cayman Island company to a blind trust on the Isle of Man." The Times adds, "In the transcript, Anderson says Chadbourne & Parke corporate attorney Hwan Kim was advising him on the offshore deal. 'I had a meeting with my attorney, Hwan Kim," Anderson says in the call. "I explained to him the logic that we were trying to create some full separation. He understands completely what we're trying to do. He said that there are a number of different ways to do it . . . he simply suggested that if you could decide which lawyer you want to do it on your side, he'll see if his firm has somebody appropriate to do it on the other side.' Moments later, Anderson tells the business associate: 'The main thing we have to make sure [is] it's reversible, in some way . . . so that when we clean up the mess, we can reverse it.' The transcript makes no mention of how much money would be involved."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Visits Hurricane Zone For Second Time. President Bush yesterday visited the hurricane zone for a second time, amid reports of friction between the White House and local officials such as Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco. The network coverage of the visit tended to have a skeptical edge, with reporters casting the visit as part of a PR effort by the Administration to show it is effectively managing the situation. Meanwhile, the historical stakes for the Administration in the recovery are being portrayed as high, with NBC News Washington bureau chief Tim Russert placing the current crisis on the same scale as the war in Iraq and 9/11. Russert said on NBC Nightly News (9/5, story 7, 1:15), "The President obviously understands with his return visit today that he has to make up for lost ground. The recovery effort and how well it goes will be enormous to historians on how they judge the Bush second term."

While the coverage of Bush's visit was largely negative, the news coming out of the hurricane zone was more positive, with progress reported in the rescue of stranded residents in hard-hit areas of New Orleans, in sealing the breach in a major levee, in the delivery of aid to the zone, and in the relocation of refugees. On the network news, coverage of the suffering and human tragedy, mostly in New Orleans, was still a large component of the newscasts. However, there was a noticeable increase in the depiction of the stepped-up rescue and recovery efforts as workers and aid began reaching even the hardest-hit areas. NBC had the most negative coverage, with approximately 65% of its images depicting human grief and suffering versus 35% relief and recovery. CBS, which ran an abbreviated newscast, was the most positive, with an approximately 70% of its imagery showing scenes of recovery. ABC ran an extended, hour-long newscast, with about 60% of its footage depicting relief efforts.

ABC World News Tonight (9/5, lead story, 4:20, Gibson) reported the visit was "another chance" for the President "to demonstrate that he and his Administration are on top of the relief effort." ABC World News Tonight (9/5, lead story, 4:20, Woodruff) said Bush "returned to the hurricane zone today, including a visit to a Baton Rouge prayer center, now home to hundreds of people from New Orleans." Bush was shown saying, "This is a long-term project to help these people. This country is going to be committed to doing what it takes to get people back on their feet."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/5, Blitzer) reported that Bush returned to the hurricane zone "amid blistering criticism of the federal government's response to the Katrina catastrophe." CNN called the decision "a response, at least in part, to very angry allegations that he and the Federal government were slow to respond to this crisis."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/5, Bash) reported that "one of the things that some were looking for when the President went down to the region for the first time on Friday was what some call a bullhorn moment," like the one after the 9/11 attacks when Bush stood in the rubble of the World Trade Center. Many believe that moment "sort of shifted what had been at the time some heavy criticism of the President's immediate response after 9/11. There are some who are looking for those moments. Some here at the White House and some Bush allies were a little bit disappointed that perhaps that didn't happen the first time."

Fox News Special Report (9/5) reported that Bush returned to Baton Rouge "when the criticism is growing harsher by the day, directed to the federal government and the response in New Orleans." Bush "focused on the positive. He said earlier today the US response has been amazing. Touching down in Baton Rouge he headed for an evacuation center."

A majority of local TV stations led with largely positive stories about Bush's second visit to the area in four days. Typical of coverage was the lead story from WEAR-TV Mobile (9/5, 5:02 p.m.) that Bush "sought to comfort Hurricane Katrina victims. Promising them a huge effort to alleviate their suffering, the President toured parts of Louisiana and Mississippi, where the scope of the disaster is still not fully known." The President was shown saying, "The good people of this region know there's a lot of work to be done and we'll continue working with the local and state people to get it done." Likewise, WTVY-TV Dothan, Alabama (9/5, 6:03 p.m.) lead its broadcast with a report that "President Bush toured areas devastated by Hurricane Katrina today. His first stop was at the Bethany World Prayer Center in Baton Rouge, Louisiana. The President took time to thank members of the community who have been helping Hurricane Katrina victims."

Nationally, local TV continued to extensively cover Katrina. Much of the coverage also centered around Bush's visit to the Gulf Coast. For example, WABC-TV New York (9/5, 12:00 p.m.) reported, "The President arrived in Baton Rouge for a second tour of [the] hurricane-ravaged" region. The station added that the First Lady accompanied the President on the trip.

A number of stations pointed out that some significant repair work has been accomplished in New Orleans. KDFW-TV Dallas (9/5, 10:03 p.m.) reported, "Seven days after Hurricane Katrina started the events [in New Orleans], two of the three major breaks in the city's levee system have been plugged." WRC-TV Washington (9/5, 11:01 p.m.) added, "One week after Hurricane Katrina, they are finally starting to pump the floodwater out of New Orleans." The station also noted, however, "Tonight, the Mayor of New Orleans says as many as 10,000 people may be dead," and many other stations covering the Katrina story reported this information as well.

The New York Times (9/6, Purdum) says "just how well Mr. Bush would endure the political challenges posed by the hurricane, much less prevail over them, remained a question on Monday." Having been "faulted by some as not spending enough time last week with black victims of the flooding in New Orleans, Mr. Bush was flanked at one point on Monday by prominent blacks, including Mayor Kip Holden of Baton Rouge and Bishop T. D. Jakes, a prominent Pentecostal minister from Dallas who has been courted by the White House in efforts to reach out to black voters."

Reuters (9/6, Zakaria) says Bush has been "under fierce criticism for his government's slow response to Hurricane Katrina," under fire "from Democrats and Republicans alike for a sluggish federal response to a flood that has made hundreds of thousands homeless and is feared to have killed several thousands along the northern Gulf of Mexico coast."

The New York Times (9/6, Bumiller, Haberman) adds that, addressing "a group of mostly black victims at a makeshift shelter, the Bethany World Prayer Center, in Baton Rouge," Bush said, "There's a lot of work to be done," adding that "Americans' response to the disaster had been 'amazing' and that 'this country is going to be committed to doing what it takes to help people get back on their feet.'" The President's trip was "an effort to calm the region and part of a major White House campaign to stem the political damage from the hurricane."

Rift Between Administration, Blanco Examined. The AP (9/6, Loven) reports, "Like estranged in-laws at a holiday gathering, President Bush and Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco kept their distance as both toured a relief center for storm victims Monday. … State and federal officials are all facing public criticism for a slow response to the crisis. Behind the scenes, each suggests the other is to blame." The AP adds, "In front of the cameras during Bush's visit to the Gulf Coast states on Monday, the president and Blanco said little to each other, focusing instead on thanking relief workers. 'I know I don't need to make any other introduction other than "Mr. President,"' Blanco said tersely, turning the microphone over to Bush after praising emergency management officials during a stop with Bush at an emergency operations center."

ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 9, 3:15, Woodruff) reported, "State and Federal officials are not always on the same page. The Governor of Louisiana has refused to hand over control of the National Guard to the Federal Government. There are even wire reports that she was not even told exactly when the President would be coming to her state."

The CBS Evening News (9/5, lead story, 3:50, Schieffer) added "there is so little coordination and so much friction between national and local officials that the Governor's office learned of the President's itinerary from a news reporter." CBS (Roberts) added the New Orleans devastation is "something President Bush still hasn't seen for himself. He returned to Louisiana today, but only to Baton Rouge to meet with survivors. Later in Mississippi, he insisted he's got the picture." President Bush: "I understand the damage, I understand the devastation, I understand the destruction, I understand how long it's going to take, and we're with you." Roberts: "Now that help has arrived, local officials, who felt so abandoned last week, are willing to move on."

The Los Angeles Times (9/6, Barry, Gold, Zucchino) notes Bush yesterday "planted a kiss on the governor's cheek," but "their staffs continued their wrangling."

The New York Times (9/6, Bumiller, Haberman) adds that "Bush comforted victims in Poplarville, Miss., and Baton Rouge, La., but he found himself ensnared in a dispute with Louisiana's Democratic governor, Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, who learned of Mr. Bush's trip from news reports."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/5, Blitzer) reported, "The White House is denying today that it tried to exclude" Blanco "from traveling with Mr. Bush A good deal of political fingerpointing in this crisis has been between the Democratic governor of Louisiana and the Bush administration." CNN (Feyerick) added, "The explanation that's coming from the White House is that they tried to reach the governor yesterday, but no one called them back. The Governor says otherwise. She said that they got no official word that the president was even going to be in the area. And it wasn't until somebody from her office actually called over to the White House, to Andy Card, that, in fact, they were told that, yes, he was going to be arriving in Louisiana." One of the "reasons of the falling out…is the White House wanted to try to federalize the National Guard so that they could have control of it. But the Louisiana Governor said, no, she needed to keep control, because she wanted to make sure that they could continue to perform law enforcement actions. And that meant keeping order on the ground, and that meant firing if they had to, something that they would not have been able to do had they been under the power of the government."

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (9/5, Feyerick) added Homeland Secretary Michael Chertoff "said there is a unity in the operations. That he made it clear that everybody is getting along, everybody is acting like a professional, and they're all in agreement as to how to move forward."

Katrina Response Seen As Second Benchmark For Bush Presidency. On NBC Nightly News (9/5, story 7, 1:15), anchor Brian Williams spoke with Tim Russert. Williams: "I think most Americans would have told you prior to Katrina, the US response and now the argument over it, that the Bush Presidency thus far would have been judged, its benchmark event would have been Iraq, especially coming out of 9/11. Tim, is the ballgame now this storm and the response to it?" Russert: "In large part, yes, Brian. I think it joins Iraq but doesn't replace it. People believe in their Presidents. Generally, a President gets a large spike in the poll ratings after handling a crisis. That has not occurred with this particular crisis because there's been serious criticism of the government's response -- Federal, state, and local. This President has to demonstrate extraordinary leadership in rebuilding the Gulf region as well as conducting the war in Iraq in order to maintain a second term that is seen as successful. That is an extraordinarily large challenge."

The Christian Science Monitor (9/6, Feldmann) also compares the current crisis to 9/11, adding Bush "faces perhaps the most profound test of executive and political skill of his life."

Nagin Says He Doesn't Think Bush Got Right Information. ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 10, 3:20, Sawyer) interviewed New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin. Sawyer: "Do you think the President delayed, because he didn't have enough information? Do you think he didn't have the right instinct? What do you think happened at that moment?" Nagin: "The President? I think the President was suffering from the same thing I was suffering from initially. I would ask questions. They would tell me what was supposed to happen. I would follow up to find out what really happened. And it wasn't happening. And I don't think the right information got to the President. Because when I finally got to him and talked to him, he immediately dispatched this incredible general who came down here. And I've been talking about him, General Honore. And things started to happen."

Bartlett Says Bush Will Order Probe Of Federal Response. USA Today (9/6, Keen, Benedetto) reports, "After angry complaints last week about delays in mobilizing federal help for hurricane victims, criticism of Bush's light-hearted recollection Friday of his youthful partying in New Orleans and failed efforts to blame local and state officials for problems, the president and his aides tried Monday to regain a sense of equilibrium." Bush counselor Dan Bartlett "said Monday that after the situation is under control, Bush will order an inquiry into delays in federal aid. 'We want to know what happened and how,' Bartlett said."

Barbour's Strong Defense Of Bush Noted, Analyzed. The New York Times (9/6, Cooper) reports, "The Bush administration has been stung by criticism of its handling of Hurricane Katrina by anguished Louisiana officials and by nervous Republicans from across the country, but it has one stalwart defender right in the heart of the devastated region -- Gov. Haley Barbour of Mississippi." Barbour has consistently "praised President Bush and a federal response to the storm that even the president later called 'not acceptable.' At one point last week, when Mr. Barbour's glowing assessment was challenged by an interviewer on CNN, he asked 'if this is an interview or an argument.'" Barbour's praise "has put him at odds with some other Mississippi officials who have bemoaned the slow response in their areas and has put him at risk of sounding like a Pollyanna to Mississippians still struggling in the storm's aftermath." But "the strategy is unsurprising for a canny political strategist like Mr. Barbour -- a former political director in the Reagan White House, chairman of the Republican Party, and powerful Washington lobbyist -- who won the governorship two years ago by in part emphasizing the strength of his close ties to President Bush."

"Flurry Of Emails" Among Bush Aides Described. USA Today (9/6, Keen, Benedetto) reports, "In a flurry of e-mail exchanges late Saturday night when they learned about Chief Justice William Rehnquist's death, President Bush's top advisers debated -- after their most difficult week since 9/11 -- what calamity might be next. Their worried conversations continued in meetings at the White House before 8 a.m. on Sunday." They "concluded that for Bush's remaining 40 months in office, they should expect almost anything, said a top adviser who works closely with Bush. 'We've just kind of realized that if things are going to happen, they're going to happen to this president,' he said, refusing to be identified because he was not authorized to describe internal discussions."

Weak Katrina Response Could Hurt Bush's Sway Over GOP. Roll Call (9/6, Preston) reports President Bush's "command over the Republican Congress is showing signs of weakening as a result of the growing unease over the U.S. mission in Iraq, the lack of a definitive plan to overhaul the nation's Social Security system and rising energy costs." But "complicating matters for Bush is the devastation wrought on the Gulf Coast by Hurricane Katrina, and the subsequent criticism from some local officials of the federal government's alleged failure to respond quickly enough with relief aide." Now, the White House "must work to shore up support among Republican Members even as it tries to advance Bush's goal on Social Security, said Senators, senior aides and GOP strategists."

WSJournal Says White House "Slowly Recovering From Its First-Week Stumbles." The Wall Street Journal (9/6, A28) editorializes, "The White House is slowly recovering from its first-week stumbles responding to Katrina, with President Bush taking his second trip to New Orleans yesterday. His quick elevation of John Roberts to Chief Justice is another welcome sign of energy. … But Mr. Bush can't afford to stop there, because the aftermath of Katrina poses a threat to his entire second term. … What Americans want now is proof that their government understands the nature of the challenge and is acting forcefully to meet it. On this point, Mr. Bush is going to have to recognize the obvious initial failure of the Department of Homeland Security in its first big post-9/11 test. The President created this latest huge federal bureaucracy, against the advice of many of us, and we're still waiting for evidence that it has done anything but reshuffle the Beltway furniture. If FEMA can't now handle the diaspora out of New Orleans to Houston, Baton Rouge and other cities, the political retribution will be fierce."

Scholar Says Iraq Fixation Hurt Bush Reactions To 9/11, Katrina. In a Financial Times (9/6) op-ed, New America Foundation fellow Michael Lind writes, "In early 2001, shortly after President George W. Bush was inaugurated and before 9/11, the Federal Emergency Management Agency warned of the three most devastating disasters that could strike the US: a terrorist attack on New York City, a hurricane flooding New Orleans and a San Francisco earthquake. The Bush administration was focused on its priority: Iraq. The first foreseen disaster took place on September 11 2001, when al-Qaeda flew hijacked jets into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. The federal government was taken by surprise. New York City's first responders were hampered by communications problems and poor planning for this long-predicted event. The Bush administration's response to the mass murder committed by al-Qaeda was warped by the focus on Iraq. Many in Washington believe that the administration failed to send sufficient troops to Afghanistan because it was with-holding forces for the invasion of Iraq. … Supporters of the war in Iraq predicted that the dominos would fall in the Middle East. Instead, the dominos are falling across America."

More Criticism Of Bush. John Tierney, in his column for the New York Times (9/6, Tierney) writes of President Bush that when one campaigns as "the great leader whose arm rescues Americans in their moment of need, they expect you to deal with a hurricane, too." Tierney adds that FEMA, "often criticized for ineptitude, became even less efficient after it was swallowed by [DHS], a bureaucracy consumed with terrorism. The department has spent billions on new federal airport screeners - with no discernible public benefit - while giving short shrift to natural disasters. The federal officials who had been laboring on a one-size-fits-all strategy were unprepared for the peculiarities of New Orleans, like the high percentage of people without cars. The local officials who knew about that problem didn't do anything about it - and then were furious when Mr. Bush didn't solve it for them. Why didn't the man on the mound come through for them?"

Nicholas Kristof, in his column for the New York Times (9/6, Kristof) writes, "The wretchedness coming across our television screens from Louisiana" illustrates "the Bush administration's ongoing reluctance or ineptitude in helping the poorest Americans. The scenes in New Orleans reminded me of the suffering I saw after a similar storm killed 130,000 people in Bangladesh in 1991 - except that Bangladesh's government showed more urgency in trying to save its most vulnerable citizens." Kristof adds, "If it's shameful that we have bloated corpses on New Orleans streets, it's even more disgraceful that the infant mortality rate in America's capital is twice as high as in China's capital."

In his Washington Post (9/6, A25) column, Eugene Robinson writes, "After a tragically incompetent beginning, the effort to give urgent care to the multitudes from New Orleans whose homes and livelihoods have been obliterated is finally in high gear. The problem now is that nobody knows where it's headed. … A few days in and around this ground zero have convinced me that there are two things the federal government failed to do, and that for these failures there's ultimately no one to blame but the president. First, an administration that since Sept. 11, 2001, has told us a major terrorist strike is inevitable should have had in place a well-elaborated plan for evacuating a major American city. … Second, someone should have thought about what to do with hundreds of thousands of evacuees, both in the days after a disaster and in the long term."

Katrina Seen As Reawakening Tough, Scrutinizing Media. USA Today (9/6, 3D, Johnson) reports that journalists covering Katrina "on the scene showed their human -- and often angry and frustrated -- face as they questioned the slow response over the weekend." Fox News anchor Shepard Smith "fumed on-air" Friday, "The government said, 'You go here, and you'll get help,' or 'You go in that Superdome and you'll get help.' And they didn't get help. They got locked in there. And they watched people being killed around them." Fordham University communications professor Paul Levinson said, "The media rose to the occasion, shone their light on the desolation and the needy, and kept it focused there until the cavalry finally began to arrive." Some media observers say Katrina's "media legacy may be a return to a post-Watergate-like era of tougher scrutiny of the federal government and public policy issues."

USA Today (9/6, 1D, Johnson) also reports that while the "media shelf life for natural disasters is notoriously short," journalists and observers "predict that mounting questions about U.S. government preparation, policies and response to Hurricane Katrina will result in intense news coverage for months." Bob Lichter of the Center for Media and Public Affairs said Katrina "doesn't just have legs, it has tentacles. Its implications reach into hot-button controversies involving race, poverty, economics and partisan politics. The reach of this story will make the O.J. Simpson case look like a news brief."

Brown's Qualifications Questioned As Criticism of FEMA Relief Effort Continues. FEMA Director Michael Brown continues to draw fire for his handling of the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. As reports emerge that his most recent job was with the International Arabian Horse Association, many are now saying that he has scant emergency management experience on his resume. ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 7, 2:40, Gibson) reported there are "some very real questions about the Federal official ultimately in charge of relief efforts." ABC (Ross) added, "Michael Brown had virtually no experience with emergency management when the President put him in the top FEMA job two years ago. And his official resume omits the job he previously held. Brown was a top official of an Arabian horse association, which asked him to resign in 2001, according to the association's secretary." Rep. Bennie Thompson: "I can't see for the life of me, what heading a horse association has to do with responding to domestic preparedness." Former FEMA regional director John Copenhaver: "It would appear that it has become a political patronage job." Meanwhile, "The Bush Administration "continued to support Brown today, as President Bush did last Friday, on his first visit to the scene." President Bush: "And Brown, you're doing a heckuva of a job. The FEMA director's working 24-7."

NBC Today Show (9/5, 7:08 am, Myers) reported that there are "new questions about whether Brown is qualified to run the largest relief effort in history." International Arabian Horse Association officials tell NBC News that Brown resigned under pressure from the horse show job and many who worked with him were stunned when he became director of FEMA." Copenhaver was shown saying, "I have a hard time understanding how experience with Arabian horse association translates into the capability to run the federal emergency management agency."

Brown, meanwhile, is defending FEMA's response to the hurricane. NBC Nightly News (9/5, lead story, 3:20, Seigenthaler) reported, "Anger is all around, and while evacuees welcomed the President in Baton Rouge today…politicians, aid workers, and reporters continue to hammer officials at every level, forcing FEMA Director Michael Brown today to defend his qualifications for the job." Brown: "Last year's historic four hurricanes have struck Florida, so, yeah, I've been through a few disasters in my life." CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (9/5, Dobbs) added, "Brown today forcefully defended himself against charges he's unfit to lead the agency in this time of crisis. Brown said at a press conference that he's well qualified for the task of heading up the government relief effort. … The critics say Brown had no experience in disaster relief before joining FEMA in 2001. And they point out his last private sector job was managing a horse show circuit." CNN (Sylvester) added, "FEMA's bungling of the recovery efforts has put Brown's emergency management credentials, or lack thereof, in the spotlight."

A minority of local TV stations in the Gulf Coast area lead their broadcasts by reporting on the press conference, in which Brown had to "defend his qualifications for the job." WVTM-TV Birmingham (9/5, 10:03 pm) showed Brown saying, "I've been through a few disasters in my life." Lt. Gen. Russel Honore was shown saying, "All those smart business guys out there who say have we or have we not done this right, and have some fancy computer matrix, get down here and get some damn gas down here, and come down here and get the phones working!" WALA-TV Mobile (9/5, 5:30 pm) added, "During a press conference, FEMA said it was prepared for the hurricane."

The New Orleans Times-Picayune has joined those criticizing Brown, and is now calling for the resignation of top FEMA officials. In an editorial, the New Orleans Times-Picayune (9/5) wrote an open letter to President Bush, asking the President to please forgive them if they "wait to see proof of" his promise to make what is not working right before they believe him. The paper claims to "have good reason for" its skepticism. The Times Picayune goes on to say that despite New Orleans' "multiple points of entry, our nation's bureaucrats spent days after last week's hurricane wringing their hands, lamenting the fact that they could neither rescue the city's stranded victims nor bring them food, water and medical supplies. Meanwhile there were journalists, including some who work for The Times-Picayune, going in and out of the city via the Crescent City Connection." "We're angry," the paper writes, "Mr. President, and we'll be angry long after our beloved city and surrounding parishes have been pumped dry. Our people deserved rescuing. Many who could have been were not. That's to the government's shame." ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 10, 3:20, Woodruff) noted the letter, and the fact that it called "for the resignation of every Federal official at the Federal agency in charge of relief here, including its director, Michael Brown."

The Washington Post (9/6, A1, Hsu, Glasser) reports in a front page article that Brown is being called "the accidental director" and has been "caricatured as the failed head of an Arabian horse sporting group who was plucked from obscurity to become President Bush's point man for the worst natural disaster in US history." After what has been seen as a slow federal response, "politicians and officials in both parties have derided Brown's qualifications to head the nation's chief disaster-response agency -- as well as the performance of the agency and its federal, state and local partners." Meanwhile, "As recently as three weeks ago, state emergency managers urged Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and his deputy, Michael P. Jackson, to ease the department's focus on terrorism, warning that the shift away from traditional disaster management left FEMA a bureaucratic backwater less able to respond to natural events such as hurricanes and earthquakes. The Times-Picayune, Louisiana's largest newspaper, published an open letter on Sunday to President Bush, calling for every FEMA official to be fired, 'Director Michael Brown especially,' joining critics in the state and Congress."

FEMA's purported failure in the aftermath of Katrina was a major topic on cable TV news shows last night. For example, CNN security analyst Clark Kent Ervin, a former DHS inspector general who left his post reluctantly, said on CNN's The Situation Room (9/5) that FEMA's handling of the response is "inexcusable. There's absolutely no excuse for it. This is the kind of thing that ought to have been planned for. Asked about suggestions of incompetence on the part of FEMA Director Michael Brown, Ervin said, "I know Michael Brown and I think he's a wonderful fellow. He's actually been praised for the response to the hurricanes in Florida last year. So, I must say that I'm rather surprised by the response at this point. This was, as I say, not just foreseeable but it was actually foreseen, so it's inexcusable." Ervin added that it is clear Brown is "in over his head."

CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (9/5, 7:15 p.m.) evaluated government response to Katrina, reporting that critics along the Gulf Coast have said that FEMA's relief had been "inadequate or missing." The report continues, "Chertoff, who oversees FEMA, says for the scope of the disaster, things are going well." However, "his own FEMA director now says he was surprised by the storm's power. Surprised people did not evacuate, surprised levees failed, though that was all predicted by many experts for many years."

MSNBC's Countdown With Keith Olbermann (9/5, 8:01 p.m.) reported, "The director of the National Hurricane Center has told the newspaper of the New Orleans Times-Picayune" that Brown and Chertoff "both listened to electronic briefings before Hurricane Katrina, during which the hurricane center warned the storm could overtop the levees or even breach them. 'It's not,' said Dr. Max Mayfield, 'like this was a surprise.' Secretary Chertoff and President Bush both continue to say it was."

Congress Likely To Consider Separating FEMA From DHS. The Hill (9/6, Snyder) reports lawmakers are "pledging an across-the-board response to help Hurricane Katrina victims recover and to fix problems the storm and its aftermath exposed. Efforts are likely to include the removal of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) from the Department of Homeland Security to speed recovery efforts and expansion of energy production to areas outside the Gulf of Mexico to ease future price shocks, congressional and outside experts said."

State, Local Officials Also Held Responsible For Poor Response. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (9/6, A28), Bob Williams, president of the Evergreen Freedom Foundation, writes that it isn't fair "to dump on the federal officials and avoid those most responsible -- local and state officials who failed to do their job as the first responders. The plain fact is, lives were needlessly lost in New Orleans due to the failure of Louisiana's governor, Kathleen Blanco, and the city's mayor, Ray Nagin." Williams adds that corrective action must be taken with FEMA as well, but "if citizens expect FEMA to be a first responder to terrorist attacks or other local emergencies (earthquakes, forest fires, volcanoes), they will be disappointed. The federal government's role is to offer aid upon request."

Livingston Critical Of Blanco For Not Declaring Martial Law. The Hill (9/6, Dufour) adds in its "Under the Dome" column that former Rep. Bob Livingston "was particularly critical of Gov. Kathleen Blanco (D) for failing to declare martial law promptly to deter widespread looting. 'I raised hell with the governor for not declaring martial law,' he said Thursday. 'I told her last [Wednesday] night I was going on 'Hannity & Colmes' and criticize her for not doing that, and 20 minutes later, she did.'"

Katrina Aftermath Could Provide Opportunity For Terrorists. The Wall Street Journal (9/6, A10, Solomon) reports, "The Bush administration has spent billions of dollars developing government agencies and technologies to better predict and respond to disasters since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. But security experts said the delays in helping Katrina's victims in New Orleans and elsewhere along the Gulf Coast indicate the relief process has become more cumbersome, opening opportunities for terrorists. Business consultants and security experts are advising clients to tighten safety measures since al Qaeda or other terrorist networks might find it advantageous to strike when tens of thousands of federal troops and other homeland-security resources are deployed to Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama."

Congress To Investigate DHS Response To Katrina. USA Today (9/6, Hall) reports Katrina "has become the Homeland Security Department's first big test. Since the department was created after the 9/11 attacks to prevent and respond to catastrophes, it has spent tens of billions of dollars, studied disaster scenarios of every imaginable kind and run some of the nation's biggest emergency response drills." But it "wasn't ready for the power of Katrina. Today, as workers struggle to provide better relief for survivors, Congress will begin investigating why the government's response was so slow." Sens. Susan Collins and Joe Lieberman, "leaders of the Senate homeland security committee, will discuss their committee's plan for an inquiry into the response by the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA). The agency is the disaster-response division of the Homeland Security Department." Some, "including Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., say Bush should appoint an independent national commission similar to the commission that investigated the 9/11 attacks."

In a lengthy article examining the Federal government's response, the Wall Street Journal (9/6, A1, Block, Schatz, Fields and Cooper) reports, "Now that Hurricane Katrina has left the Gulf Coast flooded and New Orleans in ruins, the question ricocheting around the nation and the world is this: How could the world's biggest superpower fail so badly in protecting and rescuing its residents from a natural disaster so frequently foretold? The answer is sure to receive intense scrutiny this fall in Congress and around the nation, especially given revived fears that the U.S. is ill-prepared for a terrorist attack." Though there have been "missteps" at the local level, "so far, the federal government is bearing the brunt of criticism, given its vast resources and unique role in responding to major disasters. Critics say the response shows that the nation's disaster-response system, rebuilt in the wake of the 2001 terrorist attacks, is woefully inadequate." The Journal adds, "Many of last week's problems are rooted in January 2003, when the Bush administration, urged on by some members of Congress, created the Homeland Security Department."

Hillary Clinton Calls For 9/11-Style Inquiry. The New York Daily News (9/5, McAuliff) reported that with "many blaming the growing scope of Katrina's devastation on the Bush administration, Sen. Hillary Clinton called yesterday for a 9/11-style probe into how the federal government responded to the crisis." Sen. Clinton's "call echoed statements of Republicans such as Arizona's Sen. John Kyl, chairman of the Technology and Homeland Security Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee, who plans a hearing and has said the catastrophe in New Orleans could have a lot in common with a terror attack."

DHS Said To Have Failed First Major Test. USA Today (9/6) editorializes, "Every level of government that was supposed to prepare for the storm and its aftermath failed miserably." FEMA's response was "not only a human tragedy but also an international embarrassment for the USA. That bungled response should serve as an alert to the rest of the nation. After spending four years and tens of billions of dollars since 9/11 on 'all-hazards preparedness,' FEMA's parent, the Homeland Security Department, failed its first major test."

Congress Shifts Priorities To Respond To Katrina. The Wall Street Journal (9/6, Fialka) reports that after "approving a cash infusion for hurricane relief, Congress is focusing on three legislative priorities for responding to Katrina: moving energy supplies, resettling displaced people, and restoring economically critical Gulf ports." Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist "said the chamber's primary legislative business will include hurricane-related measures and appropriations bills." Majority Whip Roy Blunt said the House "may consider legislation designed to ease supply by expanding on the administration's authority to waive fuel standards and environmental requirements." The Journal adds lawmakers "also will weigh allowing exploration for oil and gas along the coast of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska, and letting states lease federal offshore land to companies exploring for natural gas along the Atlantic, Pacific and Gulf coasts." Frist said "that he would delay indefinitely a vote scheduled for today on the estate tax."

The Washington Times (9/6, Hurt) reports Senate Republicans "agreed yesterday to postpone consideration of the bill to fully and permanently repeal the death tax that had been scheduled for this week." Majority Leader Bill Frist "promised to return to the bill as soon as possible but wanted to clear the legislative decks this week -- lawmakers' first after a month's recess -- to consider what could be done to help deal with the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina."

The Los Angeles Times (9/6, Hook) also says Frist "said he would cancel a vote scheduled for this week on repealing the estate tax — a controversial measure that Democrats had decried as inappropriate relief for the wealthy at a time when so many poor storm victims are suffering in the South." Frist also "announced the postponement of confirmation hearings on the nomination of John G. Roberts Jr. to the U.S. Supreme Court, which had been scheduled to start Tuesday." Frist said the "decision to postpone the hearings' start -- at least until Thursday, but not beyond Monday -- was to honor Rehnquist and not in response to some Democrats' contention that more preparation time is needed now that Roberts is being considered for the court's top post." The agenda "changes come on the eve of Congress' return from a month-long August recess — a return that will be marked by a striking change in political climate. Republicans left town at the end of July buoyed by their success in passing energy, highway and trade legislation and eager to tackle other priorities, such as overhauling Social Security and repealing the estate tax." But as they "reconvene this week, their agenda and mood will be darkened by more sobering realities: a vast swath of the U.S. ravaged by Katrina; skyrocketing gas prices; the death of the chief justice; and spreading turmoil in Iraq."

The New York Times (9/6, Kirkpatrick) adds Republicans said committees "would announce plans for hearings into the apparently flawed response and increasing oil and gasoline prices." Democrats said they "expected the aftermath of the storm to be a reminder of the importance of federal power in the hearings on the selection of Judge John G. Roberts Jr. for the Supreme Court." Frist said he "expected the Senate energy committee to look at 'price gouging, the excessive oil profits and what responsibility oil companies have in the skyrocketing fuel prices.'" Congressional leaders "are to meet President Bush on Tuesday to discuss relief efforts, and a group of cabinet secretaries, including Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, are to brief the full Senate at the end of the day." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid "called for an investigation of the disaster response by a commission modeled after the 9/11 panel. Mr. Reid faulted the White House as failing to take responsibility."

The Washington Times (9/6, Lambro) notes Congress "quickly approved an interim $10.5 billion assistance bill last week as the first step in the early recovery efforts, but congressional officials said a far more expansive aid package is expected in the next several weeks."

Blumenauer Had Presciently Warned Of New Orleans' Peril. The Hill (9/6, Cusack) reports one "of the most outspoken legislators on preparing" New Orleans "for a storm like Hurricane Katrina was a Democrat from Oregon." Earlier this year, Rep. Earl Blumenauer "delivered a speech on the House floor that drew parallels between the 2004 tsunami in Southeast Asia and the vulnerability of New Orleans. Blumenauer's predictions of a catastrophe came true as Katrina flooded New Orleans, leading to a death toll that is expected to climb into the thousands." On Jan. 26, Blumenauer "said a hurricane hitting New Orleans would lead to a '30-foot wall of water hitting the city, causing thousands of deaths and $100 billion in damage.'"

Republicans Face Scrambled Political Environment. The Washington Post (9/6, A6, Murray, Babington) reports Republicans "face a far more troubling political landscape than the one they left a month ago, according to lawmakers in both parties." Democrats are "sounding emboldened. One sign of GOP unease: The Senate was supposed to vote this week on whether to permanently repeal the estate tax, but Frist said yesterday that the bill will be temporarily shelved." Lawmakers in "both parties said the surging price of gas and spot shortages are leading concerns in their states and districts, and Democrats will try to get the upper hand by calling for price caps and a requirement that oil companies and refineries disclose their pricing policies. Frist said Republicans would proceed with legislation to allow oil drilling in the Alaska wilderness." Although congressional Republicans facing reelection "are unhappy with Bush's slide in the polls, there's no sense of panic, said Stu Rothenberg, who writes an independent political newsletter." Rothenberg said, "But inevitably, if we continue to see a softening in the president's numbers, every Republican is going to be expressing some concern, if not alarm."

Bill Clinton Criticizes Federal Response, Calls For "Katrina Commission." Former President Bill Clinton criticized the federal response to the disaster yesterday. Speaking to a CNN (9/5) camera crew, Clinton said, "Our government failed those people in the beginning, and I take it now there is no dispute about it; 100 percent of the people recognize that, that it was a failure. And I personally believe there should be a serious analysis of it. I have my own ideas about what caused it, and -- but I don't think we should do it now. I think that in a few weeks we should have some sort of Katrina commission."

The Los Angeles Times (9/6, Barry, Gold, Zucchino) reports that when asked "why FEMA did not move more quickly," Clinton said, "That's a question you should be asking them. It has something to do with how they reorganized after I left." The Washington Post (9/6, A11, Rein) reports, "With the administration facing public criticism for a slow response to the crisis, there was no sign of friction between the president's father and Clinton."

Former Presidents Bush, Clinton Visit Victims In Houston. In a reprise of their roles as fundraisers for relief efforts for the Indonesian tsunami, former Presidents George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton have teamed up again to raise funds for the victims of Katrina. ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 5, :25, Woodruff) reported, "In Houston today, former Presidents Bush and Clinton formally began their program to help people by raising money, for people affected by the hurricane. They hope the new fund would help people that would otherwise be overlooked by government programs. 'How are we going to find jobs for these people,' asked President Clinton? 'Where are they really going to live?' So many of them feel lost."

In a later story, ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 11, 2:05, Gibson) reported the former presidents "went in to meet the people affected in the Astrodome. They got hugs, prayers, stories of travails. And they got an earful." Former President Clinton: "A lot of them, it hit them out of the blue. One day, everything's normal. 48 hours later, their house is under water and they have nothing left. People they know and love are dead." The CBS Evening News (9/5, story 4, 0:30, Roberts) reported, "Former Presidents Bush and Clinton visited the Houston Astrodome today, which is now filled to capacity. They were there to offer comfort and to help raise money for storm victims." NBC Nightly News (9/5, story 4, 0:30, Williams) reported, "Also today, 41 and 42 are trying to combine to post a much bigger number. In Houston today at the Astrodome, former Presidents Bush and Clinton announced the establishment of a fund for the victims of Katrina, the same sort of effort after the two of them made after the tsunami in Asia. Several large corporations have made multi-million-dollar donations."

Clinton Seen As Coming To Bush's Aid. The New York Times (9/6, Nagourney, Broder) reports, "Mr. Clinton's visit to the Houston shelter on Monday is the latest time the former president has come to the current president's aid in his second term, from early in the year when Mr. Bush was criticized for his slow response to the tsunami, to initially defending the administration's response to Hurricane Katrina at the White House last week, to praising the credentials of Judge John G. Roberts Jr., Mr. Bush's choice for the Supreme Court. And it offered what many Democrats described as a vivid, if slightly disconcerting, insight into the complicated and increasingly transactional relationship between the Bush and Clinton families."

Bush 41 Says Some Criticism Of Bush 43 Has Been "Grossly Unfair." Former President George Bush was asked on CNN's Larry King Live (9/5) about criticism of the Federal response. Bush said, "I think any time there's a crisis people want to blame someone. I've never been much for the Monday morning quarterbacking and to be very candid. I think some of the criticism had been grossly unfair, particularly when they suggest the president doesn't care and all of that. You have to understand that people that are hurting are going to criticize. I thought President Clinton put it pretty well today when he said, 'Let's get on with it and then there will be plenty of time to assign blame.'" Bush added, "Certainly I'm not satisfied but I'm just talking about the blame game and there was one particularly vicious comment that the president didn't care, was insensitive on ethnicity. Insensitive about race. Now that one hurt because I know this president and I know he does care and you know what can he do? He can just go out and do what he's doing today, showing that the federal government is involved, has been involved, will continue to be involved."

Chertoff Appoints Coast Guard Admiral To Run Recovery Efforts In New Orleans. USA Today (9/6, Hall) reports, "Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, who flew to the gulf region over the weekend to take control of the relief effort, appointed Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen on Monday to run recovery efforts in New Orleans. Chertoff will fly back to Washington for one day today to meet with members of President Bush's Cabinet and members of Congress."

US May Look To Foreign Countries For Ideas On How To Protect New Orleans. The New York Times (9/6, Broad) reports that following a 1953 flood that killed nearly 2,000 people, the Dutch, "at a cost of some $8 billion over a quarter century,…erected a futuristic system of coastal defenses that is admired around the world today as one of the best barriers against the sea's fury - one that could withstand the kind of storm that happens only once in 10,000 years. The Dutch case is one of many in which low-lying cities and countries with long histories of flooding have turned science, technology and raw determination into ways of forestalling disaster." In the United States, experts say such projects "are worth studying for inspiration about how to rebuild New Orleans once the deadly waters of Hurricane Katrina recede into history."

Expert Questions Sense Of Rebuilding. Klaus Jacob, geophysicist and adjunct professor at Columbia University's School of International and Public Affairs, in an op-ed in the Washington Post (9/6, A25) asks, "should we rebuild New Orleans, 10 feet below sea level, just so it can be wiped out again? Some say we can raise and strengthen the levees to fully protect the city. Here is some unpleasant truth: The higher the defenses, the deeper the floods that will inevitably follow." Jacob adds, "This is not a natural disaster. It is a social, political, human and -- to a lesser degree -- engineering disaster."

Breached Levees Repaired In New Orleans, Pumping Begins. USA Today (9/6, O'Driscoll) reports, "There were signs of progress amid the devastation. Repairs were completed on two flood walls that broke last week and allowed floodwaters to gush into New Orleans. Water levels had dropped 1 foot after a day of pumping. Electricity had been restored to some areas." The Washington Times/AP (9/6, Simpson) adds "officials warned that it might take weeks to pump floodwaters from the city."

The Wall Street Journal (9/6, A19, Carrns, Hudson, Searcey) reports, "Officials with the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, which is in charge of repairing the levees, are balking at putting a firm time frame -- or price tag -- on the drainage effort, saying the situation is dynamic and too many variables remain. Over the weekend, portable pumps began arriving to supplement the city's existing network of permanent pumping stations, known as some of the most powerful in the world. An official with the Corps of Engineers' Mississippi Valley division said at a briefing Sunday in Baton Rouge that it could take between one to three months to drain the water, after all the pumps are operational." The Washington Post (9/6, A1, Roig-Franzia) reports, "There are entire swaths of New Orleans where no one can go without a boat, or hip waders. … But a few go anyway, searching for stranded pets or stranded neighbors, or both. The city -- the worst parts, at least, the deeply flooded east -- is best approached by water.

Meanwhile, the CBS Evening News (9/5, lead story, 3:50, Schieffer) reported that a "week after Hurricane Katrina, the water level in these neighborhoods has only gone down about a foot. Getting it all out will take more than a month, yet amazingly, many of these people don't want to leave." It's "the sort of urban survival the city's police chief just can't understand." Downtown, "security is still the main focus. The city is an armed camp."

Army Corps Of Engineers Fills Levee Breach. The Army Corps of Engineers yesterday said there was significant progress in sealing the breach of one of the levees that collapsed in the aftermath of Katrina. ABC World News Tonight (9/5, lead story, 4:20, Woodruff) reported, "Today, the Army Corps of Engineer said they had filled one of the holes in the city's levees. Work continued to try and fill the other gaps and get the pumps started. Officials say it could take as long as six months to drain the water from the city." NBC Nightly News (9/5, story 3, 1:55, Williams) reported, "There was this piece of good news today with the help of the Army Corps Of engineers: The 17th Street Canal has been repaired. It was the breach there that sent a sea of water from Pontchartrain into downtown New Orleans and beyond. That fix is just a start."

However, residents of the lower Ninth Ward, which was flooded when the levee broke, believe the city may have purposely broken it. ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 2, 2:30, Woodruff) reported, "One thing people in the city are talking about is why so many neighborhoods were spared, while so many others were nearly completely destroyed. Today, we got into a neighborhood around the industrial canal, where there was a major breach in the levee system. It's the place where thousands of the city's poorest residents live. And where thousands of them may have died." ABC (Muir) added, "14,000 people lived" in New Orleans' lower Ninth Ward, "and authorities expect the death toll will be great." People "are so bitter, so disenfranchised in this neighborhood, they actually think the city did it, blowing up the levee to save richer neighborhoods like the French Quarter."

Suburban Parish Allows Residents To Return To Homes Temporarily. The Los Angeles Times (9/6, Barry, Gold, Zucchino) reports, "Between 20,000 and 30,000 evacuees from suburban Jefferson Parish, just outside New Orleans, returned to their homes at dawn today, taking advantage of an offer by parish officials to stay for four days. Thousands came supplied with coolers crammed with food and water to sustain them until parish sheriff's deputies force everyone to leave again Thursday. … The residents' return came as parish officials were condemning the Federal Emergency Management Agency and other national and state relief organizations for failing to offer assistance. On Monday, a week after the hurricane, the parish still had not received outside aid, officials said." The Los Angeles Times (9/6, Zucchino) adds, "The parish's temporary return offer, which was criticized by some parish officials as too dangerous, began at 6 a.m. sharp, when police removed cruisers that had blocked a four-lane highway at the western edge of the parish."

USA Today (9/6, O'Driscoll) reports, "Dubbed 'residents-in-exile' by parish council president Aaron Broussard, they won't be allowed home again until power, water and other key services are restored. That could take weeks. … Most who endured several miles of bumper-to-bumper traffic to get into Jefferson Parish early Monday found that neighborhoods were wind-blown and shredded but dry or only damp; the high waters have receded." NBC Nightly News (9/5, story 2, 2:10, Williams) reported, "It has now been a week since Katrina slammed into the Gulf Coast and today, some who got out were allowed to get back in to see what the storm has done and to salvage whatever may be left there. The line of cars was miles long as the folks of hard-hit Jefferson Parish, west of New Orleans, went back to what they used to call home."

Other Areas Remain Devastated. The CBS Evening News (9/5, story 3, 0:30, Roberts) reported, "We've got a camera down into Plaquemines Parish over the weekend, which is very much further south of here. And down there, the devastation is just almost complete, and city officials are coping with absolutely no resources from the Federal Government."

Some Gulf Oil Rigs Back On Line. USA Today (9/6, Davidson) reports, "Gulf Coast oil production rigs and refineries shuttered by Hurricane Katrina began to ease their way back into operation over the holiday weekend in moves expected to help relieve U.S. price run-ups and fears of shortages. Yet facilities generating 70% of the oil and more than half of the natural gas in the Gulf of Mexico remain closed down, the U.S. Minerals Management Service said. And though several Gulf Coast refineries restarted or were poised to do so this week, four others that account for more than 5% of U.S. capacity were expected to remain shut for weeks or months."

Electricity Restored To Some Parts Of New Orleans. The New York Times (9/6, Feder) reports that Entergy, the power company for New Orleans "has restored energy to "half of [its] affected customers by Monday evening, mainly in places well away from New Orleans. And even in New Orleans itself, the company had restored some power by nightfall Monday, including to the Convention Center, the warehouse district and the docks where cruise ships tie up. Electricity was also flowing to some parts of the French Quarter, Harrah's Casino and a few hotels near Canal Street. Entergy sent its first work crews into the city on Sunday to see how much could be restored using equipment that had not been flooded and the underground part of the network, made to withstand flooding."

Official Says Superdome Will Have To Be Torn Down. ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 9, 3:15, Koppel) reported, "The Superdome still stands. But according to an executive of the company that manages the facility, it will have to be torn down and rebuilt." Superdome official Walter Reuther: "The roof has been peeled back. It's still under water, as of right now." Koppel: "So, you're going to have to get a whole, new sports stadium in here?" Reuther: "Yes, I think so." Koppel: "The old French Quarter, still standing, still charming. But the hospitality industry that is the lifeblood of New Orleans, that is still months, if not years away, from welcoming any tourists back here."

New Orleans Residents Were Surprised By Gradual Flooding. The USA Today (9/6, O'Driscoll) reports, "The fall of New Orleans was a catastrophe with an added cruelty: hours of false hope, when it seemed the city had been spared the worst, not doomed to a sodden grave. By noon last Monday, people thought the crisis had passed; by noon the next day, they knew it had just begun. In between came that moment of exquisite horror when each person still in the city grasped that destruction would come not by great wind or mighty wave, but by water rising inch by inch."

Chertoff Notes "Tremendous" Challenge Of Moving New Orleans Residents. The Financial Times (9/6, Chaffin, McNulty, Roberts) reports, "It is becoming clear that the next phase of the tragedy may involve an exodus of people unparalleled in modern American history. 'We are basically moving the city of New Orleans to other parts of the country,' said Michael Chertoff, secretary of homeland security. 'This is a tremendous medium-term and long-term challenge.'" The Times adds, "Authorities are also scouring military bases, sports stadiums, hotels and other facilities for lodging. A s well as placing huge strain on state and federal resources, the disaster presents politicians with the sensitive question of how much rebuilding will take place in New Orleans and the surrounding areas."

More Than One Million Gulf Coast Residents May Be Homeless For Months. The Washington Post (9/6, A18, Kaufman) reports, "more than 1 million people who will be out of their Gulf Coast homes for months to come." Texas Gov. Rick Perry "declared that his state was full and could take no more. Electronic highway signs in Houston directed bus drivers with evacuees to Fort Chaffee, Ark., but that facility quickly filled up as 9,000 people arrived within 16 hours Saturday. Arkansas officials asked for the signs to be removed. With shelter space in the deep South filling up, the Federal Emergency Management Agency yesterday began to airlift storm survivors to states as far away as Michigan, Utah and California. … In all, FEMA officials said, more than a quarter million people are living in shelters set up by the American Red Cross, the National Guard, local churches and municipal officials in cities from Albuquerque to Memphis."

The CBS Evening News (9/5, story 2, 2:15, Roberts) reported Baton Rouge is "struggling to cope" with refugees from New Orleans. CBS (Strassmann) added, "Evacuees have doubled this city's population, overwhelming every city shelter, every church or charity, every hospital."

ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 3, :25, Woodruff) reported, "About half the people dispersed from the flood zone have been sent to Texas. But the Governor of Texas is now saying he cannot handle anymore people. And has ordered a major airlift to make the overflow of the people to other states. Arkansas has accepted 50,000. Tennessee 13,000. Tens of thousands more are scattered from Oklahoma to California. And many of the people say they have no reason to go back to New Orleans."

USA Today (9/6, Kasindorf) reports, "Federal, state and local officials are grappling with housing the homeless after a stumbling start. … What comes next for governments: Planning longer-term quarters for the most impoverished of the displaced, who may be dispersed to even more disorienting surroundings outside the Deep South." USA Today notes, "There are signs of local uneasiness, too. Unnerved by TV reports of looting and sniping in New Orleans, some homeowners near the Astrodome hired security guards. In Baton Rouge, the display cases for guns at the Wal-Mart in the Cortana Mall have been empty since Thursday." An employees said "buyers made a run on the weapons as evacuees began making the 80-mile trip from New Orleans. Wal-Mart stores have since stopped selling guns."

The Los Angeles Times (9/6, Moore) reports, "Displaced residents" of this New Orleans "especially the poorest blacks…are pondering whether they will try to return to a town…that has suffered decades of crime, corruption and grinding poverty."

FEMA Housing Elderly Victims On Docked Cruise Ships. The New York Times (9/6, Beck, Andrews) reports, "Phase 1 of the government's plan to provide desperately needed transitional housing for tens of thousands of hurricane evacuees is scheduled to begin this morning, when homeless elderly people from various Texas locations board 30 buses destined for two Carnival cruise ships in Galveston, Tex. … The two ships, each capable of holding 2,600 people, will remain docked in Galveston; another, with an occupancy of 1,800, will be in Mobile, Ala. They will be used primarily for elderly victims and people with special health problems, with families a second priority, according to James McIntyre, a FEMA spokesman."

DHS Delays Plans For DC Airlift. The Washington Post (9/6, B1, Harris, Labbe) reports, "The proposed airlift of 400 Hurricane Katrina evacuees to the D.C. Armory yesterday was temporarily delayed by federal officials who sought more time to develop a comprehensive national plan for placing victims across the country, authorities said. 'We temporarily paused some airlifts while we identified cities and states who were ready and willing to receive these evacuees,' said Russ Knocke, spokesman for the U.S. Department of Homeland Security."

Texas Struggles To Assimilate Hundreds Of Thousands Of Refugees. The Los Angeles Times (9/6, Perry) reports Houston "is the ad-hoc home to more than 100,000 evacuees in shelters, motels, hotels and private homes. Officials expect many of the evacuees will not return to their former homes. The impact on Houston…has been swift. The City Council met in emergency session. Two schools closed due to declining enrollment are being reopened to enroll children from evacuee families." USA Today (9/6, Reed) reports, "In Houston, Dallas and San Antonio, sports arenas and convention centers are hosting thousands of evacuees. In Fort Worth, they are settling into convention and meeting halls, a high school athletics complex, an unfinished jail and even a nearly deserted terminal at the an old general aviation airport."

NBC Nightly News (9/5, story 9, 2:00, Williams) reported, "Tonight, one week after Katrina hit, hundreds of thousands of evacuees are finding comfort a long way from home. The ripple effect of this disaster is now sending people to shelters all over the United States. So far, the state of Texas is shouldering the biggest burden and finding it more than the state can bear." NBC (Allen) added Texas has "been willing to do its part. More than 20,000 volunteers have stepped up in Houston alone. But in just a week, the city has lost $10 million in convention business. Governor Rick Perry plans an airlift in the next few days to other states willing to help, like Arizona."

Hurricane Could Spur Business Boom In Houston. The New York Times (9/6, Romero) reports, "Perhaps no city in the United States is in a better spot than Houston to turn Katrina's tragedy into opportunity. And businesses here are already scrambling to profit in the hurricane's aftermath. Oil services companies based here are racing to carry out repairs to damaged offshore platforms in the Gulf of Mexico. … The Port of Houston is preparing for an increase in traffic as shippers divert cargoes away from the damaged ports of Pascagoula, Miss., and New Orleans. Owners of office space here are witnessing a surge in leasing as New Orleans companies, including that city's oldest bank, scramble to set up new headquarters in Houston, helping to shore up its sagging property market."

Evacuees May Put Permanent Strain On Surrounding Regions' Economies. The Wall Street Journal (9/6, A1, Cordoba, Bandler, Zimmerman) reports, "The massive displacement is also creating new fault lines. Many refugees, having lost nearly everything or having had little to lose in the first place, are seeking more than shelter from the storm. They're seeking new lives, competing with locals for jobs and crowding their children into new schools. … Interviews with evacuees from New Orleans suggest that some have no intention of returning. Even a modest job in a new home may represent an improvement over what they left behind."

Arrival Of Displaced Poor Reveals Tension Within Black Community. The Washington Post (9/6, A19, Haygood) reports that Baton Rouge Mayor Melvin "Kip" Holden "issued a stem-winding warning that he would not tolerate 'lawlessness' from arriving Hurricane Katrina evacuees. … Many blacks here -- and those arriving from New Orleans -- were suddenly wondering whether this city was about to turn into a kind of ground zero of class warfare between blacks and blacks. Holden himself is black, which had the potency of lifting the debate above the usual black-white fault lines." According to the Post, "Holden's comments seemed to bring to the surface the reality that local resources may well be strapped; that the holding-on blacks of this community realize there is sudden competition, from other blacks, for help in escaping poverty."

About 10,000 Remain In New Orleans. ABC World News Tonight (9/5, lead story, 4:20, Woodruff) reported, "In New Orleans, the evacuation has become, at long last, a fairly streamlined operation. Only about 10,000 people remain in the city. Still, one week after Katrina hit here, the situation can be summed up by the headline of Louisiana's largest newspaper, which called this 'The 7th Day of Hell.' As the National Guard and relief agencies try to reclaim the city, it's abundantly clear that one of the commodities needed most is leadership. With the Army now here, the change, obvious. The evacuation of New Orleans has picked up speed. Outside the once-chaotic convention center, helicopters lined up in the air -- one behind the other -- flying out hundreds of people an hour, some of them sick and injured." The city "wants everyone out. New Orleans' police chief said today there is no longer justification to stay." Deputy Police Chief Warren Riley: "There are no jobs. There is no food. There is no reason to stay. The city has simply been destroyed."

NBC Nightly News (9/5, lead story, 3:20, Seigenthaler) added, "Seven days after this storm hit, rescue workers are still trying to save lives and, in some cases, pleading with people to leave their homes. They don't call them 'diehards' for nothing. In New Orleans today, rescue workers found plenty of men and women who can wait to leave."

The Los Angeles Times (9/6, Gold, Zucchino, Braun) reports, "Search teams pressing to evacuate the living and find the dead after a full week under the high-water sway of Hurricane Katrina found their efforts complicated Monday by the refusal of hundreds of residents to leave the paralyzed city. … A senior New Orleans police official said Monday that some 10,000 inhabitants remained in the city, hidden inside flooded residences, apartments and housing projects, surviving on foraged scraps and food drops by the military. Searchers have been frustrated by hundreds of holdouts who have refused to leave their homes, fearing possessions will be pillaged, pets will die and their way of life will be erased."

The Dallas Morning News (9/6, Hancock) reports, "By persuasion and by force, authorities worked Monday to complete the biggest evacuation of an American city in modern times. Despite a week of flooding, hellish conditions and slim prospects that the city would be livable for months, some people still didn't want to leave. … In the Garden District, police backed by California National Guardsmen stopped pedestrians and bicyclists at a major intersection and ordered them into vans even after some protested that they would be leaving friends and family behind." The Morning News adds, "In New Orleans, the effort to impose order involved about 4,000 U.S. Army troops and Marines, National Guardsmen and law enforcement officers from across the country." Mayor Nagin "declared that the city had the authority to force residents to evacuate. He would not say if authorities were doing that, but he announced that people who refuse to leave will no longer be given drinking water."

Many Still Ignoring Evacuation Order. The Christian Science Monitor (9/6, Jonsson) reports that thousands of New Orleans residents refuse to leave the city. "Such decisions perturb emergency-response officials, who warn that public-health risks posed by the fetid floodwater may worsen, and that two months of flood conditions may await residents who insist upon staying put. A stubborn resistance to leaving, they add, will only waste time and resources of an already-overtaxed search-and-rescue operation."

New Orleans Mayor Says Up To 10,000 May Be Dead. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution/AP (9/6, Simpson) reports New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin "upticked his estimate of the probable death toll in his city from merely thousands, telling NBC's 'Today' show, 'It wouldn't be unreasonable to have 10,000.'" ABC World News Tonight (9/5, lead story, 4:20, Gibson) reported, "The emphasis is gradually changing from rescues of the stranded, to recovery of the dead. The Mayor of New Orleans says the death toll could reach 10,000." NBC Nightly News (9/5, lead story, 3:20, Williams) reported, "The news today, more like a prediction, could not be more grim: Even as an army of relief workers now descend on the area, there are fears as many as 10,000 people may be dead." ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 10, 3:20, Sawyer) interviewed New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, who said the death toll will "be significant. And it will probably shock the nation." Sawyer: "When you look around, the kind of water you have still standing, are you looking at three months to get it out? Two months to get it out?"

The Miami Herald/Knight Ridder (9/6, Kavanaugh, Pompilio, Merzer) reports, "Ghastly new evidence of Hurricane Katrina's horror emerged Monday night when a sheriff reported the recovery of 22 bodies lashed together around a pole - a desperate, futile attempt to survive the storm. Sheriff Jack Stephens of St. Bernard Parish, just east of New Orleans, said rescuers found the bodies tied with rope and wrapped around a pole in the tiny village of Violet along the eastern bank of the Mississippi River. … And more: Biloxi Mayor A.J. Holloway said he expected the death toll in his Mississippi city to exceed that of Hurricane Camille, which killed 200 people in 1969." The CBS Evening News (9/5, lead story, 3:50, Schieffer) reported, "New Orleans tonight is a city of the dead. Nearly everyone in the city who survived the hurricane has been evacuated, but authorities are finding bodies everywhere: In attics, floating in the streets, crumpled in wheelchairs. No one really knows how many have died, but if the Mayor is right when he says 10,000, that will be more than three times the death toll on 9/11."

Small Town Hosting Mortuary For New Orleans Region Victims. The New York Times (9/6, Applebome) reports that at a warehouse in San Gabriel, LA "refrigerated trucks on Sunday began the task of bringing what is expected to be thousands of bodies to the temporary mortuary set up to process victims of Hurricane Katrina." Although Nagin claimed as many as 10,000 may be dead in New Orleans alone, "so far only 23 bodies have been brought to the mortuary, and the official death toll for Louisiana stands at 71." The Washington Post (9/6, A1, Dwyer, Fletcher) reports, "Although the storm's announced death toll was just over 200 on Monday, officials began to brace themselves and the public for a body count that could reach well into the thousands. … The bodies of those left dead in Katrina's wake were scheduled to start to arrive Monday in a massive warehouse outside Baton Rouge. Lifted from the fetid waters swamping this city, they will be transported in refrigerated trucks to the temporary morgue. A similar morgue has been set up in Mississippi."

Many Victims May Never Be Identified. The AP (9/6, Dahlberg) reports, "Most of the dead from Hurricane Katrina don't have names yet. Many will never be identified because their bodies decomposed in the floodwaters and heat before they were found. … Identifying the dead will be a daunting task, made even more desperate because many will likely be bloated and decomposed by the time they're taken away. FEMA officials said they would try to locate dental records, but urged family members to bring in photos, fingerprints or even a toothbrush or provide DNA samples."

Cholera-Like Disease Found Among New Orleans Evacuees. The Los Angeles Times (9/6, Gold) reports, "Authorities said Monday that some of Hurricane Katrina's evacuees have contracted a bacterial disease that is considered a more benign cousin of cholera, but is potentially fatal in people whose immune systems have been compromised. Officials at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta said the bacterium, vibrio vulnificus, may have been picked up by people with open wounds who were forced to wade through polluted floodwaters for a long time."

HHS Providing Vaccines, Emergency Medical Supplies. The Wall Street Journal (9/6, A10, McKay, Chase, Lueck) reports, "Doctors are seeing many patients with infected wounds and gastrointestinal illnesses, and worry that more are coming in the days ahead. … To prevent disease outbreaks, the federal Health and Human Services Department shipped 90,000 doses of tetanus vaccine, 22,000 doses of Hepatitis A vaccine and 36,000 doses of Hepatitis B vaccine over the weekend to states and health facilities, said HHS spokeswoman Christina Pearson. The department also has provided antibiotics as well as medications for chronic illnesses such as heart disease, diabetes and anxiety. Overall, the government said it has deployed 100 tons of medications and other supplies for victims of the hurricane."

Temporary Clinics Confront Array Of Challenges. The Washington Post (9/6, A10, Connolly) reports, "Legions of doctors and nurses are frantically patching together a new medical care network to handle the swelling flow of Hurricane Katrina's victims. The extraordinary process includes the task of converting basketball arenas, an abandoned Kmart and even the New Orleans airport into working hospitals and clinics. … With an influx of patients who are predominantly poor and in poor health, the emergency medical challenges are compounded by longer-term issues of managing chronic conditions such as high blood pressure, heart disease, diabetes and mental illness."

Nearly 50,000 National Guard, DHS Personnel Involved In Relief Effort. The Washington Post (9/6, A1, Dwyer, Fletcher) reports, "Federal agents, troops and law enforcement officers from around the country continued to pour into New Orleans, and police officials expressed confidence the city was mostly safe from the marauding gangs that had terrorized citizens in the storm's chaotic aftermath. The rapidly growing scale of the effort was evident in the official statistics of federal personnel involved as of midday Monday: 38,000 National Guardsmen, 6,000 FEMA responders and 4,000 from the U.S. Coast Guard, according to the Department of Homeland Security. The USS Iwo Jima, an amphibious assault ship, pulled into New Orleans port Monday and will assist in aid efforts."

USA Today (9/6, Johnson, Kelley) reports, "The surge of rescues of hurricane victims slowed to a trickle Monday as emergency workers steeled themselves for the shift from joyful rescues of those who survived to the grim task of recovering the bodies of those who didn't. One Army medical evacuation unit saw their rescues ebb from 200 Thursday to one Monday."

Iraq War Veterans Among Guard Troops Patrolling New Orleans. The Washington Post (9/6, A10, Tyson) reports, "Spec. Frank Atkinson, wearing his tan desert fatigues from his recent deployment in Iraq, alternately drove a Humvee through downtown New Orleans streets littered with debris and putrid garbage and held suspected looters at gunpoint with his M-4 rifle. 'It's just so much like Iraq, it's not funny,' said Atkinson, of Woodlawn, Ark … The Arkansas contingent is among the estimated 16,000 National Guard troops from 40 states flowing into greater New Orleans to help curb the rash of crime sparked by Hurricane Katrina. An additional 24,000 guardsman and 7,200 active-duty ground troops are committed to relief efforts across the Gulf Coast. Paratroops from the 82nd Airborne Division 'locked down' the historic French Quarter on Monday, according to city and military officials. But the massive military effort remains severely disjointed and hampered by a lack of basic communication between units, Army officers here say. Ground commanders for New Orleans have been functioning without the ability to track the location of some units reporting to them -- something unheard of in Iraq, the officers say." The USA Today (9/6, Johnson) reports, "Maj. Patrick Bossetta has been to Iraq and back, but the helicopter pilot with the Louisiana National Guard still has difficulty believing that the devastation spread below him on countless rescue missions is his beloved New Orleans."

One-Third Of New Orleans Police Force Not Reporting For Duty. The New York Times (9/6, Treaster, Desantis) reports, "The last week has been a series of nonstop rescue missions, shootouts in the night and forays into foul-smelling shelters in response to gunshots and reports of rape for…the New Orleans police force. And like most everyone else in New Orleans, police officers have been traumatized by the loss of homes and family members. Morale on the police force is in tatters. About 500 officers - a third of the force and far more than previously estimated - have dropped out of the daily lineup. Some of them may still be in houses cut off by the storm or may have simply gone off to help their families and will eventually return. But most of the missing officers have either told their superiors that they were quitting or simply walked off the job. Two officers have shot themselves to death."

Recovery Efforts In Mississippi Beginning To Meet Needs. ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 13, 3:05, Gibson) reported, "We have focused, mainly, tonight, on the problems of New Orleans, and the movement of evacuees. But Mississippi is not to be forgotten, for it suffered such a blow. Survivors in that state knew it would take many days for help to get to them, especially with a situation so dire in New Orleans. Still, thousands of people are sleeping outside. Cut off from the rest of the world. Waiting for food, water and medicine. Today, help began getting through." ABC (von Fremd) added, "For so many here still suffering, the calvary is no longer just on the way, it has arrived. By air, land and sea, the National Guard, FEMA and utility companies have thrown this devastated community a lifeline." Enormous "amounts of free food and water are piled high. And everyone here is welcome to help themselves. Electricity has already been restored to portions of Gulfport. And ice is literally spilling out of helicopters courtesy of the Mississippi National Guard."

Halliburton Subsidiary At Work On Navy Facilities Repairs. Kellogg, Brown & Root Services. Inc., a subsidiary of the Halliburton Co., "has begun tapping a $500 million Navy contract to do emergency repairs at Gulf Coast naval and Marine facilities damaged by Hurricane Katrina," reports the Washington Post/AP (9/5, A20, Baldor). KBR won the contract last July "to provide debris removal and other emergency work associated with natural disasters. Jan Davis, a spokeswoman for the Naval Facilities Engineering Command, said yesterday that KBR would receive $12 million for work at the Naval Air Station at Pascagoula, Miss., the Naval Station at Gulfport, Miss., and Stennis Space Center in Mississippi. KBR will receive $4.6 million for work at two smaller Navy facilities in New Orleans and others in the South."

Rice Defends Bush Against Charge That Katrina Response Was Racist. The AP (9/5, Jordan) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice defended President Bush on Sunday against charges that the government's sluggish response to Hurricane Katrina showed racial insensitivity. 'Nobody, especially the president, would have left people unattended on the basis of race,' the administration's highest-ranking black said as she toured damaged parts of her native Alabama." Later, during a service at the Pilgrim Rest AME Zion church outside Mobile, "Rice nodded in agreement as the Rev. Malone Smith Jr. advised the congregation, 'Wait for the Lord.'" The Washington Times (9/5) notes "it was a sort of homecoming for Miss Rice, an Alabama native and granddaughter of a Presbyterian minister." Her visit "came as some black leaders, including the Rev. Jesse Jackson, have complained bitterly about the slow response to the disaster, whose victims have been disproportionately black and poor."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (9/5, Broder) reports from Houston, "Many blacks voiced suspicions that thousands of people were left to suffer and die in the floodwaters because they were, for the most part, poor and black. … Interviews with African-American church leaders, local politicians and residents here made clear the damage that the faltering relief effort has had on their perceptions of the Bush administration." Bush "and his chief political advisers have mounted an effort to try to court more conservative black voters, particularly since the 2004 election, by encouraging black Republican candidacies and reaching out to black churches." But "their outreach efforts appear to have been significantly set back." The New York Times (9/5, Deparle) runs an additional story on the race issue, which says, "The white people got out. Most of them, anyway. If television and newspaper images can be deemed a statistical sample, it was mostly black people who were left behind. … What a shocked world saw exposed in New Orleans last week wasn't just a broken levee. It was a cleavage of race and class, at once familiar and startlingly new, laid bare in a setting where they suddenly amounted to matters of life and death."

Storm Said To Highlight Divide Between "Haves And Have Nots." The New York Times (9/5, Wilgoren) says the storm "cleaved a harsh chasm among the region's refugees, providing a stark portrait of the vast divide between America's haves and have-nots. … John Edwards, the former senator whose presidential primary campaign last year was based on the theme that America is a country torn in two by race and class, sent an e-mail to supporters last week, saying that the hurricane's destruction exposed 'a harsher example of two Americas.'"

Chertoff, Brown Criticized For Hurricane Response. All three news magazines feature Hurricane Katrina and its aftermath on their covers this week. All three state there's widespread criticism of the Federal response to the disaster. U.S. News and World Report (9/12, Mulrine) sees "an almost palpable sense of anger at the sluggish and, in some places, seemingly nonexistent government response to the crisis. 'We are extremely pleased with the response of every element of the federal government' to Katrina, said Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, in charge of coordinating Washington's plan. Reacting to the growing chorus of criticism the same day, Chertoff's deputy, Michael Brown, the director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, fumed: 'I think everyone in the country needs to take a big collective breath.'" U.S. News and World Report (9/12, Gilgoff) adds that FEMA and the Department of Homeland Security "came under fire for their management of the rescue effort. … Jane Bullock, a former FEMA chief of staff and 22-year agency veteran, says the current federal effort demonstrates a weakened FEMA in a post-9/11 world. … There was also criticism late last week that FEMA chief Michael Brown and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff lacked long-term experience in disaster preparedness." US News also reports, "Federal officials offered a vigorous defense," but, "among those who seemed miffed was President Bush," who, "expressed frustration at the response effort, saying 'the results are not acceptable.'" US News cover package also includes reports on healthcare workers who are trying to help victims despite shortages of nearly every necessity, and the Great Mississippi Flood of 1927.

Newsweek (9/12) adds, "FEMA's current head, Michael Brown, has appeared over his head and even a little clueless in news interviews. He is far from the sort of take-charge presence New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani conveyed after 9/11."

FEMA's Brown Under Fire. FEMA Director Michael Brown has been the focus of much criticism following his agency's response to Hurricane Katrina. NBC Nightly News (5/28, story 7, 2:40, Seigenthaler) last night ran a report critical of Brown's qualifications. NBC (Myers) added, "This was Michael Brown's biggest job before landing at FEMA, supervising judges at Arabian Horse shows. The embattled FEMA director doesn't mention in his official biography that for nine years he was commissioner of the International Arabian Horse Association. Association officials tell NBC News he resigned under pressure from that job." Brown was "brought into FEMA by his college roommate, President Bush's campaign director Joe Allbaugh. His only experiences with emergency services was in the mid 70's. He became FEMA director when Allbaugh left." John Capenhaver, former FEMA official: "His lack of experience in emergency management may have played a role." Myers: "Critics say he doesn't seem on top of the situation. The day the levees broke, he said 'I don't want to alarm anyone that New Orleans is filling up like a bowl, that isn't happening.' Then he said of those at the convention center." Brown: "The Federal Government just learned of those people today." Myers: "Tonight, Homeland Security officials defend Brown. They say he was a senior FEMA manager during 9/11 and is working day and night to save lives in the largest relief effort in American history."

The New York Times (9/5, Shane, Lipton, Drew) reports that while rescuers were still trying to reach people stranded by the floods, perhaps the only consensus among local, state and federal officials was that the system had failed." But" furious state and local officials insisted that the real problem was that the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which Mr. Chertoff's department oversees, failed to deliver urgently needed help and, through incomprehensible red tape, even thwarted others' efforts to help. 'We wanted soldiers, helicopters, food and water,' said Denise Bottcher, press secretary for Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco of Louisiana. 'They wanted to negotiate an organizational chart.'"

The New York Times (9/5, Applebome, Drew, Longman, Revkin) reports, "As flood waters rose on Tuesday, Senator Mary L. Landrieu tried to impress upon colleagues in Washington that this was America's tsunami, but she said that the more she pleaded, the more she felt she was not being heard. … 'I have been with Michael Brown since the minute he landed in this center,' Ms. Landrieu said Friday in Baton Rouge, referring to the director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, 'and I have been telling him from the moment he arrived about the urgency of the situation.' But, she said, 'I just have to tell you that he had a difficult time understanding the enormity of the task before us.' … By Wednesday, with little visible response from the federal government, Ms. Landrieu said that she talked to FEMA officials. 'I started to sense they were thinking I was a little overwrought, that maybe I was exaggerating a little bit,' she said. When she pressed Mr. Brown on when he was going to finally get buses to pick up the people who had been trapped at the Superdome, 'he just mumbled,' she said. Mayor Nagin said that he could not remember whether he spoke to President Bush on Wednesday or Thursday, but that the president acknowledged the federal government could have done more and promised to fix the situation."

Some Calling For Chertoff To "Get The Ax." Meanwhile, U.S. News and World Report (9/5, 9/12) reports that some in Washington are "calling for Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to get the ax. Administration officials, however, said that firing Chertoff would not be smart in the midst of the Katrina disaster."

Blame For Hurricane Response Placed On Officials At All Levels. Time (9/12, Gibbs) says Katrina shattered "a hope that four years after the greatest man-made disaster in our history, we had got smarter about catastrophe, more nimble and visionary in our ability to respond. Is it really possible, after so many commissions and commitments, bureaucracies scrambled and rewired, emergency supplies stockpiled and prepositioned, that when a disaster strikes, the whole newfangled system just seizes up and can't move?" Time adds that "the treatment of the living, black and poor and old and sick, was a disgrace." An "angry debate opened about how much the demands of the Iraq war, on both the budget and the National Guard, were eating into the country's ability to protect itself at home. Louisiana Republican Congressman Jim McCrery…argues that Katrina revealed how much doesn't work." Time (9/12, Ripley) adds that while deconstructing Katrina will take years, "it is already clear that the blame can be well distributed, from the White House to emergency-management officials at federal, state and local levels, all the way down to the cops who abandoned their posts in New Orleans. … New Orleans officials were supremely unprepared; that was never a secret among people in the disaster business. Meanwhile, throughout the state and Federal governments, much money and willpower had shifted to fighting terrorism, a major risk and vital effort but much less of a sure thing than natural disasters. Because of tax cuts and budget pressures at all levels, many emergency-response capabilities…have slipped. If Hurricane Katrina turns out to be the biggest disaster in U.S. history to date, it will also be the least surprising." Time notes, "On Friday, hours after even the President had shifted to calling the government's response 'not acceptable,' the No. 2 at FEMA sounded as though he had been monitoring a different hurricane. 'I am actually very impressed with the mobilization of man and machine to help our friends in this unfortunate area,' Patrick Rhode told TIME. 'I think it's one of the most impressive search-and-rescue operations this country has ever conducted domestically.'"

GOP Worries Hurricane Response Could Hurt Them In 2006. U.S. News and World Report (9/12a) reports in its "White House Week" column that several GOP strategists "worried that the slow federal response would seriously hurt the party in 2006."

Hurricane's Greatest Economic Impact Could Be On Auto Industry. U.S. News and World Report (9/12, Lavelle) says Katrina's "biggest economic impact could be on the form of transportation most Americans know best--the auto. General Motors…has been banking heavily o n a brand-new series of big utility vehicles, due next year, to help reverse a financial nose dive. But $3 gas…could end America's love affair with big haulers."

German Official Says Hurricane Was Result Of Global Warming. U.S. News and World Report (9/12, Hayden, Barnett) reports that Germany's environment minister, Jurgen Trittin, "suggested that the hurricane's severity was at least partly a result of global warming and charged that 'the American president is closing his eyes to the economic and human costs' of refusing to sign the Kyoto Protocol, which seeks to limit production of climate-warming greenhouse gases." While there have been "more Atlantic hurricanes recently," most scientists "agree that the increased frequency is caused by a natural cycle, not global warming. … Still, there is growing evidence that global warming is making the storms stronger and wetter."

SEC Extends Filing Deadline In Storm Zone. The Wall Street Journal (9/6, Solomon, Hughes) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission will extend filing deadlines and suspend requirements to deliver documents to areas affected by Hurricane Katrina." Meanwhile, "the agency warned that it is 'on the lookout for Katrina-related securities scams' and vowed to vigorously prosecute those who try to defraud hurricane victims."

Blair Sends Foreign Service Officers To US As International Aid Continues Flow. USA Today (9/6, Soriano) reports, "British Prime Minister Tony Blair, assailed for doing too little to help Britons caught in Hurricane Katrina, apologized Monday and sent foreign service officers to aid survivors." USA Today notes, "News of the disaster has dominated British and continental European media since Katrina struck last week." The Christian Science Monitor (9/6, Ford) adds, "Governments around the world rushed aid and relief teams to America's stricken southern states on Monday - some repaying past favors the United States has offered them to recover from natural disasters - while their citizens continued to express amazement and dismay at the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. In a dramatic reversal of usual roles, small nations such as Sri Lanka - badly hit by last December's tsunami - have extended their hands to the most powerful country on earth. And after initial ambivalence, American officials were accepting offers of help from over 50 countries with thanks."

Nuland Offers Thanks NATO For Support. Reuters (9/6) reports Victoria Nuland, the U.S. ambassador to NATO "thanked European allies on Monday for generous pledges of support in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, which has devastated New Orleans and U.S. Gulf Coast states."

Afghanistan To Give $100,000 For Hurricane Relief. The Washington Times (9/6, Harper) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "Impoverished Afghanistan will give $100,000 for Katrina relief efforts, the U.S. Embassy has announced. U.S. Ambassador Ronald Neumann thanked the Afghan people Sunday during a ceremony at which the aid was pledged by the government on behalf of the people of Afghanistan."

DC Fundraisers Planned To Aid Hurricane Victims. Roll Call (9/6, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column that "fundraisers galore have been planned all over town, mostly to benefit the Red Cross and all, of course, promising libations and entertainment for the recess weary. The biggie of the Big Easy parties is Wednesday night at the lobbying firm Jones Day, a joint fundraiser by the Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi and Florida state societies. The folk-funky group Down Dexter is opening for the popular Wil Gravatt Band. Organizers were hoping to convince former Louisiana Sen. John Breaux (D) to serve as VIP emcee for the event. Reps. Alcee Hastings (D-Fla.), Mark Foley (R-Fla.) and Charlie Melancon (D-La.) were among those who had RSVP'd as of Friday afternoon. Admission prices come in three ranges: $20, $1,000 and $2,000 per person. The party's fundraising goal is $50,000, all of which will go to the American Red Cross Disaster Relief Fund for victims of Hurricane Katrina. For the non-lushes who want to help disaster victims — or for those who can at least burn the candle at both ends — there will be a Gulf Coast Relief Run on Sept. 17 in Old Town Alexandria. The 5K race is being sponsored by Roll Call, the Great Harvest Bread Company and Mizuno USA. … The cost to enter the race is $25, which includes a T-shirt. Again, all proceeds will go toward the Red Cross relief fund."

Hurricane Creates Unique Problems For Non-Citizens. The New York Times (9/6, Urbina) reports, "Hurricane Katrina has left its victims feeling vulnerable and uncertain, but for many noncitizens trapped here, the anxiety is especially acute because they worry that they will jeopardize their legal status if they try to leave." Meanwhile, "The Mexican government has opened two mobile consulates in the affected areas, one in Mobile, Ala., and the other in Baton Rouge, La., to begin looking for tens of thousands of their citizens reported missing. The authorities in Mexico estimated that 145,000 Mexicans live in the area."

Insurance Premiums Expected To Rise Along Gulf Coast. The Wall Street Journal (9/6, D2, Francis) reports that with total economic losses expected to exceed $100 billion, Katrina could be "the costliest US storm on record." With that, "Home and car owners in the Gulf Coast states can expect to see substantial increases in their insurance premiums in coming months, while rate rises could spread more broadly if insurance-company losses from Hurricane Katrina continue to climb."

Bush Nominates Roberts To Be Chief Justice. President Bush yesterday renominated Judge John Roberts to be chief justice of the United States. Media consensus is that Roberts will be able to gain Senate approval with relative ease. Bush's move is being portrayed as a quick way to fill the post vacated by the death of Chief Justice William Rehnquist.

Last night, ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 6, 2:45, Moran) reported, "Roberts looks to be a pretty safe choice. And Mr. Bush needs that badly now. This morning in the Oval Office, President Bush said the man he'd already nominated to the Supreme Court was ready to serve as its leader." President Bush: "Both those who've worked with him and those who have faced him in the courtroom speak with admiration of his striking ability as a lawyer and his natural gifts as a leader." Moran: "The President also made clear he believes Judge Roberts can be quickly confirmed by the Senate." The "first reactions from Senate Democrats to Mr. Bush's move were cautious."

The CBS Evening News (9/5, story 5, 1:45, Andrews) reported, "This nomination to chief justice for Judge Roberts gives the President tremendous advantages" because "no serious political opposition has been raised" to his nomination. And so "the President and most Republicans believe he can be confirmed as chief justice relatively quickly in time for the court. It gives the President the justice he wants in the job that he wants when he wants him."

On the NBC Nightly News (9/5, story 6, 0:45, Brown), Washington bureau chief and moderator of 'Meet the Press,' Tim Russert said, "They will be robust hearings, but everyone I spoken to, Democrats and Republicans, believe Judge Roberts will be confirmed." Likewise, the Washington Post (9/6, A1, Baker) says that after Bush's announcement, "there was no indication" that Roberts' nomination "faces any significant threat."

The most contentious issue after Bush's announcement was the timing of the confirmation hearings. A Reuters (9/6, Ferraro) dispatch says "a congressional aide said the hearing would start next Monday." However, says USA Today (9/6, Kiely), "some liberal Democrats are arguing for a delay to let senators and the public better assess the impact that filling two vacancies will have on the nation's highest court." Sen. Edward Kennedy "said the Senate should postpone a decision on whether Roberts replaces the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist until President Bush announces how he plans to fill the other court vacancy."

Kennedy, says the Washington Times (9/6, Hurt), has called on "a highly trusted private lawyer" whom he used in the 1994 election battle against now Gov. Matt Romney "to dig up dirt on his opponent." James Flug "has rejoined Mr. Kennedy's staff and will advise him during the Supreme Court confirmation hearings for Judge John G. Roberts Jr. 'Jim Flug is the 8,000-pound gorilla who will be driving this thing,' said Makan Delrahim, former Judiciary Committee staff director for Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, Utah Republican." Flug "isn't the only operative brought back for Supreme Court vacancy fights. Michael O'Neill, former nominations counsel to Mr. Hatch, was hired earlier this year to be chief counsel to Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania."

The Washington Post (9/6, C1, Leibovich) notes Roberts "would be the youngest chief justice since John Marshall, who was 45 when he was sworn in 204 years ago. Fifty is Young Turk territory among Supreme Court justices, if not for the rest of us. Among chief justices, 50 is a Turk in diapers." Confirmation would fix "Roberts as a seminal figure in the annals of whiz kids."

Reuters (9/6, Vicini) reports Roberts "may succeed the late legal giant, who was one of his earliest conservative mentors. A generation ago, Roberts served as a young law clerk to Rehnquist, helping the then associate justice research and write court opinions." NBC Nightly News (9/5, story 5, 1:55, P. Williams) also reported it was "a bittersweet moment for Roberts, a Rehnquist friend and former law clerk." Judge Roberts: "If I am confirmed, I would succeed a man I deeply respect and admire, a man who has been very kind to me for 25 years." Pete Williams: "His hearings, scheduled to start tomorrow, have now been delayed a week at most in deference to the Rehnquist funeral services. While some liberal groups today said a nomination to chief justice should subject Roberts to even greater scrutiny, the ranking Democrat on the Judiciary Committee would not go that far." Sen. Patrick Leahy (D) Vermont: "I think you still ask the same basic question. Will this person protect your rights, my rights and everybody else's rights?"

The Legal Times (9/5, Mauro) reports, "The death of Chief Justice William Rehnquist late on Saturday ends his historic 33-year career on the Supreme Court and presents President George W. Bush with a rare challenge to fill a new vacancy just as John Roberts Jr., his nominee to Sandra Day O'Connor's seat on the Court, was about to face Senate hearings." The Times continues, "Bush answered part of that challenge swiftly, nominating Roberts on Monday to replace Rehnquist as chief justice. In an early morning announcement from the Oval Office, the president said he hoped the Senate would confirm Roberts before the Court sits for its next term Oct. 3." The Times adds, "The Senate is expected to begin Roberts' confirmation hearings as chief justice either Thursday or next Monday. The opening of his previously scheduled confirmation hearings, for the position of associate justice, initially was to be Tuesday, but that was canceled until after Rehnquist's funeral on Wednesday."

The New York Times (9/6, Greenhouse) also analyzes Roberts' experience as Rehnquist's clerk, at time when he "learned how not to be chief justice." Now "he will, if the Senate confirms him, have the rare chance to put those lessons into practice."

Some stories this morning note the similarities in both men's judicial philosophies. The Washington Post (9/6, A1, Lane) runs a story titled "Roberts Was Influenced By Critics Of The Warren Court," in which it says Roberts "has consistently espoused a clear view of federal judicial intervention: Less is more. This same principle was held dear by the man Roberts served as a Supreme Court clerk, the late William H. Rehnquist."

The Washington Times (9/6, Taylor) says "Ted Cruz, who clerked for Chief Justice Rehnquist during the mid-1990s, recalled that he and fellow clerks once asked their boss whom he considered to be the most superior Supreme Court litigator. 'He chuckled a little and said with a smile that he thought he could probably get the majority of his colleagues to agree that John Roberts was the best Supreme Court lawyer in the country,' said Mr. Cruz, now solicitor general of Texas."

The Washington Post (9/6, A4, Jackman) reports, "The flag-draped coffin of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist will be carried up the long marble stairs to the Supreme Court's main entrance this morning as two days of memorial observances begin. After a brief prayer service at the court at 10 a.m., the public may pay respects to the chief justice as his body lies in repose at the court from 10:30 a.m. to 10 p.m. today and from 10 a.m. to noon tomorrow." Ceremonies "will conclude with the chief justice's burial at Arlington National Cemetery tomorrow afternoon, which will be private. Rehnquist, 80, died of thyroid cancer Saturday at his home in Arlington."

As Many As 25 Democrats May Vote To Confirm Roberts. The Capitol Hill newspaper The Hill (9/6, Schor) reports, "Members of the Senate Democrats' K Street inner circle are predicting that as many as 25 Democrats will vote to confirm John Roberts as chief justice of the United States. Several attendees of the Monday Group, as Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid's (D-Nev.) biweekly lobbyist meetings are known, said the Democrats could suffer politically if their Roberts strategy misfires. … 'It's not a good thing for Democrats to be dragged into a visible, high-profile battle on him for weeks when Congress ought to be dealing with issues the public really cares about,' one key Democratic lobbyist said. 'That's the biggest danger for Democrats, if they get sucked into something like that because of the ideological left.'"

Democrats Plan To "Rough Up" Roberts During Hearings. U.S. News and World Report (9/12, Halloran) reports that Supreme Court Nominee John Roberts will likely win support from the Senate Judiciary Committee, but "the hearings may still have their share of drama. Will the nominee get any Democrats' votes? How will Democrats position themselves, especially those with an eye on congressional and presidential elections to come?" US News adds, "The down-and-dirty fight everyone expected over the first appointment to the high court in 11 years simply hasn't happened." U.S. News and World Report (9/12, Schulte) adds that Democrats on the panel "intend to rough him up a bit."

Newsweek (9/12) says in its "Periscope" column that Roberts "will confront 18 senators eager to score political points and rack up minutes on the cable news channels. While the senators will try to press Roberts for specifics on controversial topics like civil rights, abortion and congressional authority, Roberts will attempt to keep his answers as general as possible without seeming to stonewall. … Senators want to pin down Roberts's judicial philosophy, but they know the direct approach may not work." Committee Chairman Arlen Specter "says he plans to press Roberts on whether Roe…is a 'superprecedent' not to be tampered with. A source close to the prep who requested anonymity to speak more freely about the process says Roberts will likely follow the lead of Clarence Thomas, who confirmed a constitutional right to privacy encompassing contraception but steered clear of specifics on abortion in his hearings."

Colleagues Say Roberts' SG Role Not So Ideological. The Legal Times (9/5, Mauro) reports, "After weeks of document dumps and media scrutiny of John Roberts Jr.'s copious writings, the Supreme Court nominee goes before the Senate Judiciary Committee this week with one important part of his professional life still a mystery." The Times continues, "Roberts' three years and three months as principal deputy solicitor general (the so-called political deputy), from 1989 to 1993, produced easily as much paper as his earlier jobs in government. But except for briefs filed with the Supreme Court, all of it—including memorandums on cases—remains sealed, to the chagrin of Democrats and groups that oppose his nomination." The Times adds, "That part of Roberts' life is likely to provoke questioning from Senate Democrats who are intent on seeing if the conservative views he expressed as a young Reagan White House aide burned as brightly in his psyche a decade later. 'The SG materials may be the only real source that reflects his own mature personal thinking,' said Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) in an Aug. 10 statement. … Adds Nan Aron, president of Alliance for Justice, 'At this point, the American people know next to nothing about the legal views Judge Roberts expressed during the most important, most influential period of his career as a lawyer.' The group announced its opposition to Roberts last week. … So far, the only formal White House response has been to release a list of the Supreme Court cases Roberts handled— among them, 717 case recommendations, 77 briefs on the merits, and 31 petitions for certiorari. But the Bush administration won't release the texts, holding to the position taken during Miguel Estrada's bid for the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit in 2002: that releasing the memos he wrote in the SG's office would chill much-needed candor. … Beyond the posturing and politics of the dispute, however, some question how valuable the documents would be, asserting that the tussle results from a gross misunderstanding of the job Roberts held under Solicitor General Kenneth Starr during the first Bush administration."

Judiciary Committee Ready For Nomination Star Turn. The Legal Times (9/5, Goldman) reports, "This week's Supreme Court confirmation hearings promise to be as theatrical as Congress gets. But the telegenic John Roberts Jr. will, in some respects, be a supporting actor, sharing the stage with 18 senators who view the hearings as their own star vehicle." The Times continues, "More than simply trying to pin down the elusive Roberts on his jurisprudence, the Senate Judiciary Committee's 10 Republicans and eight Democrats will be putting their own ambitions and agendas on display." The Times adds, "Rival Democrats will be trying to electrify their party base by showing who can be the toughest on the nominee, while Republicans will be seeking to burnish their own national credentials, competing to place Roberts' more controversial statements in the most benign light. … It is a committee of extremes — both liberal and conservative — and, even by Senate standards, of powerful egos. Six members have either run for president or are contemplating a bid (or in Delaware Democrat Joseph Biden Jr.'s case, another bid) in the 2008 election. … And there's another dynamic at play: A Supreme Court confirmation gives Congress a rare chance to tell the Court what it thinks about its co-equal branch."

Specter Profiled. U.S. News and World Report (9/12, Samuel) profiles Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, reporting, "It is hard to know what to expect from Arlen Specter. Which is why it will be so fascinating to watch him this week as he chairs the Judiciary Committee's hearings on Supreme Court nominee John G. Roberts."

White House Says Bush Always Had Roberts In Mind For Chief Justice. The Washington Post (9/6, A1, Baker) reports that after Bush's announcement, "there was no indication" that Roberts' nomination "faces any significant threat." Bush, adds the Post, "always had Roberts in mind for the next chief justice, aides said yesterday." Roberts "was first secretly interviewed for a Supreme Court slot in April in anticipation that the cancer-stricken Rehnquist would retire or die. When O'Connor surprised the White House by announcing her retirement in July and Rehnquist declared that he was not stepping down, Bush decided to appoint Roberts to O'Connor's seat. Even then, aides said yesterday that the president intended to elevate Roberts to chief justice whenever the job came open. 'This had been something in the back of the president's mind in case such a scenario came into being, if the chief justice had retired,' said White House press secretary Scott McClellan. 'The president, when he met with [Roberts], knew he was a natural-born leader.'"

Columnist E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (9/6, A25), "Why did President Bush pull such a quick switch yesterday and name Judge John Roberts to be chief justice of the United States? There are several theories, but here's the most sensible: Bush had always planned to make Roberts chief someday. … Roberts's combination of a conciliatory personality with firmly conservative convictions made him the perfect choice to lead the judicial revolution Bush would like to unleash. Successful chief justices need to be good politicians, and Roberts's political gifts were much in evidence this summer as he seemed to be charming his way toward relatively easy Senate approval."

Motivation Behind Bush's "Safe" Choice Examined. Some reports in today's newspapers attribute Bush's choice of Roberts, a "safe" candidate, to what they saw as his weakened political standing. The Wall Street Journal (9/6, Cummings, Bravin), for example, reports this morning, "At a time of increasing political weakness, President Bush tapped John Roberts as his nominee for chief justice, choosing to avoid -- or at least delay -- a fresh ideological battle over the Supreme Court." The New York Times (9/6, Stevenson) also says that with his choice, Bush "avoided the fiery ideological fight that would have been ignited had he chosen to elevate Justice Antonin Scalia, a favorite of many conservatives, or turned to a sitting federal judge with a clearer and more extensive conservative record of opinions on social issues than Judge Roberts has." The theme was echoed by Democratic Sen. Charles E. Schumer, who "said there were signs that Mr. Bush was pulling his ideological punches because of political weakness. 'If he had been in a stronger position, he would have nominated Scalia as chief justice,' Mr. Schumer said."

Likewise, the Christian Science Monitor (9/6, Richey, Chaddock) says "Bush is seeking to avoid a Senate showdown," while the AP (9/6, Fournier) added "Bush chose the path of least resistance," acting "with unusual haste as the war in Iraq and Hurricane Katrina sap his political strength." Roberts "was the safest choice Bush could make."

In an analysis piece, USA Today (9/6, Biskupic) says "a key question in the coming weeks will be whether the White House…now has the appetite for a knock-down, drag-out fight over a Supreme Court nomination."

Comparing Roberts to Scalia, the Washington Post (9/6, A3, Lane) says Bush's nominee is "not only younger" but "also mellower." He is also known "for his astute political judgments in the Reagan administration and his cordial personal relations with many liberal attorneys."

Focus Turns To O'Connor Replacement. With Bush's decision to nominate Judge Roberts to be chief justice, attention quickly focused on who the President will nominate to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. The Financial Times (9/6, Waldmeir) reports this morning Bush said "he would choose a nominee 'in a timely fashion', and a White House spokesman said he called Justice O'Connor from Air Force One to discuss the decision." The Washington Post (9/6, A6, Becker) adds that "with conservatives and liberals alike saying that Roberts is on track to be confirmed, the focus was already shifting to what both sides believe will be the real battle: Bush's yet-to-be-named pick to replace…O'Connor." O'Connor's seat "is critical because she often provided a swing vote on such controversial issues as affirmative action, abortion and prayer in public places."

USA Today (9/6, Memmott) reports "a relatively quiet debate among interest groups is expected to become the more bitter, multimillion-dollar slugfest opposing sides have long anticipated. 'Watch for World War III,' conservative lawyer John Hinderaker wrote Monday on Power Line, his widely read Web log, or blog." Interest groups "plan to ramp up their rhetoric, TV ad campaigns and grass-roots lobbying even though Chief Justice William Rehnquist's death may not fundamentally change the court."

The CBS Evening News (9/5, story 5, 1:45, Andrews) reported, "The guessing is that the Democrats believe the President, because he's in trouble over Katrina, will be under pressure to name a centrist. Conservatives will push hard for a hard-line conservative." The Los Angeles Times (9/6, Savage, Weinstein) says that if the President chooses Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales or Judge Edith Brown Clement "from the federal appellate court in New Orleans, the change may not tip the balance of the court to the right. Both are seen as moderate conservatives, somewhat akin to O'Connor." But Bush "could select a nominee with more conservative credentials, such as Judges J. Michael Luttig and J. Harvie Wilkinson of Virginia, Edith H. Jones of Texas or Janice Rogers Brown, the former California Supreme Court justice who was confirmed this summer to the U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington. Any of those nominations would set off a political battle in the Senate." Bush also could turn to Judges Emilio Garza or Priscilla R. Owen, "both Texas conservatives, or to Larry D. Thompson, a former deputy attorney general who is highly regarded by Bush insiders and now serves as general counsel to Pepsico."

ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 6, 2:45, Moran) reported, "As he considers his options this time, Mr. Bush faces new political considerations." Former White House counsel Brad Berenson: "There's even more pressure now than there was back in July to pick a woman or a minority, for the simple reason this is the President's second at-bat and he chose a white man the first time around."

NBC Nightly News (9/5, story 5, 1:55, P. Williams) reported, "In announcing her plans in July, O'Connor said she'd stay on the court until her successor is confirmed. But with her replacement likely to come soon after the term starts, O'Connor's return would be largely symbolic." Fox News' Special Report (9/5) said the White House "expects that Sandra Day O'Connor will be on the Supreme Court when it starts the fall section in October and want Robbers in the chief chair. If there is a delay, the most senior judge would have to fill in. He is 30-year court veteran and liberal justice, John Paul Stevens."

The Wall Street Journal (9/6, Cummings, Bravin) says that "pleasing" the GOP conservative base "would risk alienating moderate voters already cooling to Republicans ahead of the 2006 mid-term elections. … Nodding to those sensitivities, the president could name his friend from Texas, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, to fill the slot."

USA Today (9/6, Kiely) quotes Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid saying, "Justice O'Connor has been a voice of moderation and reason on the court and should be replaced by someone… like her."

The AP (9/6, Hunt) refers to Bush's "historic opportunity to reshape the Supreme Court," while the Dallas Morning News (9/6, Jackson) adds "the eventual nominee, and perhaps Judge Roberts, may be more vulnerable to opposition because of Mr. Bush's weakened political state, analysts said, citing the Iraq war and criticism of the federal response to Hurricane Katrina."

The Washington Times (9/6, Sammon) also says "O'Connor, who had not seen Mr. Bush's televised announcement minutes earlier, reaffirmed her willingness to remain on the court until a successor is nominated and confirmed, said White House spokeswoman Dana Perino." Bush "is not expected to nominate another justice until Judge Roberts is confirmed."

Knight Ridder (9/6) adds O'Connor "may be expected to return to the bench while confirmation proceedings take place." But "that raises further complications: She can't hear cases in October or November and then have her successor vote on them when they're decided in January or later." The Los Angeles Times (9/6, Savage) makes the same point in a story headlined "O'Connor's Staying On Might Tie Up The Court."

Professor Says Ethics Questions About Roberts Are Unfounded. In a piece based on an ethics opinion he wrote at the request of Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, Ronald D. Rotunda, a law professor at George Mason University, writes in the Washington Post (9/6, A25), "Does John Roberts have an ethics problem? Three ethics professors argue that Roberts, whom President Bush has just nominated to be chief justice, should have disqualified himself from a case he helped decide earlier this year while serving as a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit. The case, Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, which concerns a key issue in the administration's war on terrorism, may be headed for the Supreme Court, and at the time of the appeals court ruling, Roberts was being considered for a vacancy on the high court, though it did not yet exist.' The professors say that "in not disqualifying himself, Roberts violated the 'appearance of impartiality.'" Rotunda adds, "Judges are offered other jobs all the time. A Supreme Court justice may become chief justice, or, like Justice Arthur Goldberg, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations. Appeals court judges may become Cabinet officers. Trial judges may become appellate judges. … Do we really want to give the president or attorney general the power to force recusal of one or more judges on a panel simply by asking the judge if he might be interested in a different position that is not yet open but that eventually will be? … Conflict-of-interest charges should not be raised lightly, and historical precedents and case law show the allegations against Roberts are unfounded."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (9/6) editorializes that elevating Roberts to Chief "was a logical decision, both politically and on the merits. The Senate and media have been investigating the nominee since July, and have found superlatives with nary a negative. The Judge is in a position to be rapidly confirmed and ready to preside by the time the High Court begins its new term on October 3." The Journal adds, "More importantly, what we have learned about Judge Roberts suggests that he shares Chief Justice Rehnquist's judicial philosophy. If Mr. Bush now follows with the nomination of an equally distinguished conservative for the Court's second opening, the Roberts Court will be able to continue the legal restoration that the late Chief Rehnquist began but was never able to finish."

The New York Times (9/6) writes in an editorial, "If Mr. Bush thought Mr. Roberts had already impressed both the public and the Senate with his intelligence and sincerity, he figured correctly." But "if he regards the judge as a known commodity whose confirmation should be a shoo-in, he is wrong. The Senate did not have enough information to make an informed judgment about Mr. Roberts when he was the nominee for just one of the nine seats on the court. Now it simply becomes more important than ever that he be questioned thoroughly about his views."

In its editorial, the Washington Post (9/6) says, "Before nominating Judge Roberts, Mr. Bush consulted widely and emerged with a candidate Senate Democrats have -- by and large, anyway -- treated with respect. As he once again considers a nominee to replace Justice O'Connor, Mr. Bush would do a public service by consulting widely and meaningfully."

USA Today (9/6) editorializes that "as impressive as Roberts has appeared, the most important question about him remains largely unanswered: How would a Chief Justice Roberts affect the country? As the youngest chief justice since 1801, Roberts, 50, would be a potent influence on society for a generation or more." USA Today adds, "Much will be made at the hearings of the doctrine that Roberts should not be asked to say how he might rule in cases coming before the Supreme Court." But "that should not deter senators from demanding to know how he views issues more generally and cases already decided -- and the standards he would use to overturn settled law. To suggest that the Senate should simply ignore the impact Roberts would have on constituents is to suggest that it stick its collective head in the sand."

The Los Angeles Times (9/6) says in an editorial Bush "has wisely nominated John G. Roberts Jr….to become the next chief justice. It's a smart move. Roberts has the intellect and temperament to lead the court and the federal judiciary," and selecting a newcomer "tends to preserve good relations among the nine justices. The elevation of either Scalia or Thomas would have proven highly contentious and divisive in Washington, and maybe even on the court." The Times states, "In their questioning of Roberts, senators should focus special attention on his views on the proper deference that courts owe the executive branch in a time of war. … The extent of presidential power in the war on terror is likely to loom large in the Supreme Court docket for years, and it's a subject that Roberts, a former White House lawyer, should be asked to address in his hearings." As for the new opening on the court, the Times argues that Alberto Gonzales "should be disqualified…for encouraging the administration to disregard international law in conducting the war on terror."

Randy E. Barnett, an author and law professor, writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/6), "As the president now decides who next to nominate, he would uphold the Constitution by selecting a person with a firm and demonstrated commitment to the Rehnquist Court's New Federalism legacy. Only such a choice would continue the movement to restore the 'first principles' of constitutionally limited government that William Rehnquist affirmed so eloquently."

Laurence H. Tribe, a professor of constitutional law at Harvard, writes in today's New York Times (9/6), "Rehnquist's goal of weakening the checks on presidential power happily met decisive opposition within the court, although I worry that the seeds he planted to that end might yet bear dangerous fruit. No pleasure in argument could overcome my sadness at the Supreme Court's performance in the 2000 election, or my disappointment at how far the chief justice succeeded in his goals of lowering the wall of separation between church and state, shrinking Congress's power and reducing the protections accorded the mostly poor people of color who are suspected or accused of crime."

House GOP Divided Over Social Security Reform Strategy. The Washington Times (9/5, Fagan) reports, "House Republican leaders, who weeks ago pledged to take the lead on Social Security, still say they will act this fall, but the party remains divided, as some of their members push for a personal accounts bill, some want a broader package and others don't want to act at all." House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas "has insisted on his broad retirement package, which emphasizes pension reform and private savings. It is expected to include a Social Security proposal, introduced by Republican Reps. Jim McCrery of Louisiana and E. Clay Shaw Jr. of Florida, that would use the system's surplus to create voluntary private accounts. Some Republicans and outside advocates would like a vote on the McCrery-Shaw bill by itself, and a few last week said House leaders have decided unofficially to do that." However House Majority Leader Tom DeLay said, "If it's done, it will be done as part of the retirement security package."

Cheney Reportedly Purchasing Home Near Rumsfeld's. The Washington Post (9/5, B1, Morse) reports, "They've grown used to having a secretary of defense in their midst. … Now, residents of this Eastern Shore retreat [St. Michaels, MD] are preparing for someone even bigger to buy a house down the road: the vice president. Whether it's true -- that Dick and Lynne Cheney are buying an estate here -- could not be confirmed. Those closest to the deal -- Cheney's office, the purported sellers, the listing agent -- aren't talking."

With New Judges, DC Circuit Gears Up For Full Judicial Slate. The Legal Times (9/5, Henning) reports, "The federal appeals court in Washington, where oral arguments resume this week after a nearly three-month summer hiatus, is facing a season of change." The Times continues, "The departure of Judge John Roberts Jr. to Capitol Hill for hearings on his nomination to the Supreme Court and the arrival of Janice Rogers Brown and Thomas Griffith on the circuit court's bench resulted in a reshuffling of panels and argument dates for the fall." The Times adds, "Lawyers with upcoming cases before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit say they've received oral argument dates later than usual. As of late last week, the court had posted its calendar through the end of October. … The court's argument calendar, which continues to take shape, opens with the pleas of Guantánamo Bay prisoners. Over the next two months the court will also hear cases involving immunity and liability for public officials such as police officers and will revisit long-running litigation that pits states and interest groups against the federal government."

The Legal Times (9/5, Henning) reports, "Nothing says welcome to Washington to a new judge like a case full of acronyms that only wonkish Beltway dwellers can appreciate. … That's how Janice Rogers Brown and Thomas Griffith will be initiated into the complex but largely nonideological work of refereeing federal agencies on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit." The Times continues, "Before Brown this month will be a dispute over a plan that would create a hunting season for the trumpeter swan, and Griffith will hear an appeal involving the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration. … But in other cases, the judges could have the opportunity to place a personal stamp." The Times notes, "In Gregory Thomas v. George Washington University, Brown will hear the case of a man with a paralyzed leg who is appealing a lower court decision that threw out a favorable jury verdict. Gregory Thomas, a medical resident at GW who lost his position, sued the university for race and disability discrimination. The school claims his performance was poor and that he has an impairment, as opposed to a disability covered by the Americans With Disabilities Act."

Report Criticizes Education Department PR Grants. USA Today (9/6, 7D, Toppo) reports, "Federal investigators probing the Education Department's public relations contracts have found a pattern of deals in which advocacy organizations received grants totaling nearly $4.7 million to promote Bush administration education priorities in newspaper columns and brochures, but didn't disclose that they received taxpayer funds, as required by law." USED Inspector General John Higgins recommended that "the department needs to do a better job monitoring how millions of dollars in grants are spent." U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spelling "agreed with most of the investigators' findings."

OTHER NEWS:

No Gasoline Supply Disruptions Over Labor Day As Price Reaches New High. The New York Times (9/6, Bajaj) reports as Americans "began heading home from the Labor Day weekend, gasoline stations today continued to report spot shortages, but the country appeared, at least as of this afternoon, to have avoided the massive supply problems that some had feared." Officials said they "continued to make progress in resuming the production and distribution of gasoline and other fuels, which was severely disrupted by Hurricane Katrina last week. But they noted that most refineries and oil production in and along the Gulf of Mexico remained shut down for the seventh day in a row."

USA Today (9/6, Woodyard) reports the national average price for gasoline "crossed the $3-a-gallon mark for the first time Monday in the latest AAA survey, tying the record for highest ever on an inflation-adjusted basis." Although motorists "in hurricane-whipped areas along the Gulf of Mexico faced gas lines, some resorts across the nation reported strong Labor Day crowds despite soaring fuel prices." A gallon "of regular-grade gas hit $3.057 a gallon Monday, up 19 cents from $2.867 earlier in the weekend, the AAA said. On an inflation-adjusted basis, that's equal to the peak of $1.417 set in March 1981."

The New York Times (9/6, Bajaj, Pérez-Peña) reports analysts and industry executives "warned that fuel prices were likely to remain high and that the nation's oil supply system might not return to normal operations for several weeks, perhaps longer." Even as the Federal Government "and other nations started releasing crude oil and gasoline into a thirsting world market and pipelines resumed sending supplies from the Gulf Coast, specialists said there were few quick fixes for the biggest remaining bottleneck: refining." As many as "four refineries, processing about 4 percent of the nation's oil supplies, might stay out of service for weeks or months. Of the remaining six refineries that shut down last week because of Hurricane Katrina, several were starting to resume production over the long weekend, but it will take them several days to get back to full speed."

States Move To Cut Gasoline Excise Taxes. The Wall Street Journal (9/6, Matthews) reports that to "soften the blow of higher fuel prices and disrupted supplies, the federal government took steps to increase the supply of diesel fuel as some states moved to suspend gasoline excise taxes." The Internal Revenue Service "said it will temporarily allow all vehicles, including commercial trucks, to use dyed diesel fuel without being subject to a penalty. Dyed diesel usually is restricted to farming and government activities that aren't subject to excise taxes. Under the IRS easing, the usual diesel tax still will be owed when dyed diesel is used in nonexempt ways, but an additional penalty will be waived. California and Michigan also lifted state penalties on the use of dyed diesel fuel." States that suspend gas taxes "stand to lose millions of dollars in revenues that are usually used for road and other highway projects. Even states that don't suspend gas taxes could see revenues drop if drivers cut back on gas purchases due to rising pump prices."

NYTimes Criticizes Bush For Long-Term Handling Of Gasoline Demand. The New York Times (9/6) says in an editorial, "The ability of the Gulf Coast's many refineries to turn the oil into gasoline has been devastated, as has the ability to transport the gasoline that does become available. Those supply bottlenecks are chiefly responsible for this past week's higher prices at the pump. President Bush's immediate response is to lend oil from the government's Strategic Petroleum Reserve to refineries and to streamline the refining process by temporarily relaxing environmental standards - sound stopgap measures to help ensure a steady supply of gasoline. The International Energy Agency, whose members are 26 rich nations, has also made a big contribution, pledging on Friday to supply world markets with an additional 60 million barrels of oil and gasoline over the next 30 days, half of which would come from the United States' emergency stockpiles." But it "would be wrong to think - and act - as if this crisis is fundamentally a supply shock. Rather, it is a supply shock on top of blatantly excessive demand. The near-term responses from Mr. Bush and the international agency, welcome as they are, will not solve the larger problems laid bare by Katrina. Worse, Mr. Bush's record on energy issues does not suggest that he is up to that task."

US Economy Seen As Demonstrating Resilience In Wake Of Katrina. The Wall Street Journal (9/6, A1, Hilsenrath, lp) reports in a front page story that the US economy's "shock absorbers kicked in within days of one of the worst natural disasters in its history, offering hope that the massive jolt to the country's energy and transportation systems won't produce a long-lived, serious economic contraction." The "release of emergency oil and gasoline from global stockpiles, created in the 1970s to counter supply interruptions, sent crude-oil prices down to about pre-hurricane levels in European trading." Long-term interest rates "fell despite the prospect of higher inflation, cushioning home buyers and businesses. Temporary-help agencies began to place some workers displaced by the storm. New Orleans's main newspaper, the Times-Picayune, kept publishing on the Internet when printing on paper was impossible. Computerized logistics enabled railroad CSX Corp. to reroute freight normally exchanged with Western railroads at New Orleans to be sent north." Hurricane Katrina is "the biggest test in years of the economy's resilience. But recent history offers encouraging, though by no means definitive evidence of the U.S. economy's ability to bounce back from shocks. Economic growth has become significantly less volatile during the past two decades, a trend some economists dub 'the Great Moderation.'"

USA Today (9/6, Jones) reports "dozens of Southern cities from Baton Rouge to Pensacola are coping with a displaced populace numbering in the hundreds of thousands and awaiting the spillover of billions of dollars in disaster aid." Natural disasters "whipsaw local economies as they move from devastation and into rebuilding. That's nothing new. But this time, the disaster was a coiled snake that has lashed out at the nation." Katrina and "the flooding triggered by levee failures will have a total economic cost of $100 billion, Risk Management Solutions, a catastrophe-risk-modeling firm, said Friday. Most of the damage done by the levee break is likely not insured. Still, bond-rating company Fitch said Friday that the insured portion of losses could go above $25 billion, surpassing the Sept. 11 terror attack ($20.1 billion in 2004 dollars) and Hurricane Andrew ($20.5 billion) as the largest insured loss in history."

With Port Of New Orleans Out Of Service, Farmers Face Shipping Problems. ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 14, 2:20, Gibson) reported, "It is now a week to the day after Katrina hit. And shipping along the Mississippi River and its tributaries is still at a standstill. $100 billion in goods move up and down the Mississippi every year. That's 25% of all US exports. And 17% of all imports. The storm hit one region. Its economic impact is affecting all regions." ABC (Reynolds) added, "From St. Paul to St. Louis and all along the big river, they sit on the water with no place to go. The corn, coal, steel or lumber that fuels the nation's commerce -- all stalled." Most "of the nation's industrial imports, such as steel, plywood and rubber, comes through the Port of New Orleans. And more than half of the nation's grain goes out through the port." It's "too soon to say how consumers will fare overall. But commodities like coffee and sugar in addition to gasoline, are expected to become more expensive."

The Wall Street Journal (9/6, Fialka) reports "Midwest farm interests represented by Republicans like" House Speaker Dennis Hastert and Rep. Roy Blunt "have a major stake in reconstructing New Orleans. Another port -- Gulfport, Miss. -- is crucial to Southern poultry interests, but New Orleans has a wider regional reach, handling 71% of corn and 65% of soybean exports last year." The disruptions "have hit Midwest farmers at a difficult time. Storage facilities already are strained from big crops last year, and commodity prices have been falling amid efforts to empty grain elevators in time for new crops. If sales can't be completed, there is a risk of grain being stored outside, thereby reducing its value and the return to the farmer." With "rising energy and fertilizer prices and a summer drought in the eastern Midwest, including Speaker Hastert's Illinois district, there are sure to be demands for expanded agriculture assistance as part of any disaster package."

States Reporting Increase In Unemployment Applications. USA Today (9/6, Armour) reports thousands of employees "are finding themselves suddenly without paychecks after Hurricane Katrina. Some are rushing to get state aid while others are looking for new jobs." Some states are "reporting an increase in residents requesting benefits." In Louisiana, those "who are not getting paid because of the hurricane can file for disaster unemployment assistance or unemployment benefits, says Ed Pratt, a spokesman with the Louisiana Department of Labor. They are eligible for up to $256 a week." Mississippi workers "are eligible for unemployment or disaster unemployment assistance of up to $210 a week," and Alabama residents "are eligible for unemployment or disaster assistance and can apply through call centers. They can get up to $220 a week."

WPost Calls Economic Recovery "Lagging And Uneven." The Washington Post (9/6, A24) editorializes, "The Census Bureau's annual report on income, poverty and health insurance in the United States" underscores "the lagging and uneven nature of the economic recovery since the 2001 recession. According to the new data, 4 million more people were living in poverty in 2004 than in 2001, and 4.6 million more people lacked health insurance." In addition, the "percentage of people with employer-based health insurance fell for the fourth year in a row," and "it's not at all certain that states will be willing or able to maintain coverage for working Americans hovering at the edge of poverty. In the wake of this data and the devastation caused by Hurricane Katrina, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist…was wise to postpone this week's planned vote to repeal the estate tax. Lawmakers need to remember in the weeks to come that this is an economic recovery that continues to leave too many Americans behind."

Russia Opposes Reporting Iran To Security Council. The Financial Times (9/6, Wagstyl, Khalaf) reports that Russia yesterday ruled out an early decision to report Iran to the Security Council. A senior Kremlin official "said Iran had not violated the rules of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty. Its nuclear programme, he said, should continue to be dealt with at the governing board of the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency, the UN's nuclear watchdog, without involving the Security Council." The Times notes that the move "undermines US and European efforts to build international consensus for a diplomatic reprimand this month."

Iran appears to be changing tactics in an effort to minimize the risk of UN Security Council action over its nuclear program, reports the Christian Science Monitor (9/6, Peterson). The Monitor says the Security Council "which in turn is undermining the carrot-and-stick approach used by the EU and Washington in recent years to convince Iran to end all nuclear efforts." Gary Samore, a nonproliferation official during the Clinton administration and vice president of the MacArthur Foundation in Chicago, said high oil prices "may give Tehran confidence that the council would not jeopardize the flow of Iran's petroleum into the market. ... Other factors include American preoccupation with Iraq, and the decisive victory of Mr. Ahmadinejad at the polls last June."

Palestinian Forces Get First Look At Abandoned Jewish Settlements. Palestinian security forces on Monday toured Jewish settlements razed during Israel's withdrawal from Gaza. USA Today (9/6) reports that the tour "of the settlements in southern Gaza by Palestinian commanders and Israeli military officials was the first time Palestinian officials had been allowed into the communities. Israel removed all 8,500 settlers from Gaza last month."

Egypt Vows To Help Make Gaza Foundation Of Palestinian State. Meanwhile, in an interview with the Washington Times (9/6, Phillips) Egyptian Prime Minister Ahmed Nazif "pledged to help make the Gaza Strip the foundation of a Palestinian state 'in every sense' and urged other countries to join Cairo in the push for Middle East peace. 'If we want Gaza to be the basis for a new Palestinian state long term, we have to provide [the residents] with homes and jobs, with security,' Mr. Nazif told The Washington Times. … Mr. Nazif said Cairo will make sure that Gaza has access to the outside world through Egyptian seaports and airports 'to prevent the strip of territory being a prison' for its residents."

Recent Elections Reverse Gains By Radical Islamists In Pakistan. In what the Christian Science Monitor (9/6, Khan) calls a "surprising blow to religious extremists" in Pakistan, voters in recent elections "reversed the gains made by radical Islamists who came to power in two out of the country's four provinces in 2002. They had played a strong opposition role in the federal parliament and posed a formidable challenge to President Pervez Musharraf's vow to bring 'enlightened moderation' to Pakistani society." The Monitor adds, "The unexpected defeat of the Islamists came in the North Western Frontier Province (NWFP), which neighbors Afghanistan. The province had been ruled since 2002 by the Muttahida Majlis-e-Amal (MMA), an umbrella group of six religious parties, including the vanguard radical party Jamaat-e-Islami."

India May Remove Troops From Kashmir. Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh's office said yesterday that India will pull troops back from Kashmir if militant infiltration and violence ends. The New York Times (9/6, Sengupta) reports that the announcement came "after a rare meeting with Kashmiri separatists."

Presence Of Hindu Militants In Kashmir Indicates Insurgency May Not Be Only Religious. The Washington Times (9/6, Rahman) reports the "killing last month of a Hindu militant and the arrests of two others are raising doubts about the government's assertion that the bloody insurgency in Kashmir is being fought simply in the interests of Islamic militancy." Indian forces "killed Uttam Singh, 23, and three Muslim jihadis on Aug. 19. The night-long gunbattle came during an attempt by a group of militants to kill or abduct an Indian Muslim soldier from his house in the border region of Kashmir." Police "later discovered that Mr. Singh, alias Saifullah, was one of two Hindu sector commanders in Hizbul-Kashmir, a rebel group that seeks to include all of Kashmir in Pakistan." A senior officer "at the Defense Ministry in New Delhi subsequently acknowledged that four other Hindu militants had been killed fighting alongside the Kashmiri jihadis in the past three years. However, he would not accept the notion they might have been willing combatants."

Lebanese President Faces Growing Pressure To Resign. Lebanon's President Emile Lahoud is facing growing pressure to resign. The New York Times (9/6, Fattah) reports that Lahoud "has clung to office even as his Syrian backers have been forced to withdraw from the country. … He keeps a low profile, rarely making public appearances or giving interviews. But as hard as he may try to remain out of sight, he has been on many minds here in recent days, as Lebanese have taken to predicting his imminent political demise." The Times adds "In a defiant statement last week, Mr. Lahoud insisted that he intended to complete his term in office, which ends in 2007. 'I will continue to fulfill my responsibilities to safeguard the Constitution, Lebanese laws and the integrity of Lebanese territory,' the statement said."

Business Groups Warn Doha Round Of Trade Talks On Verge Of Failure. A statement from a group of six business associations, including the US Business Roundtable, warns that the Doha round of global trade talks may be "on the verge of failure." The Financial Times (9/6, Beattie) reports that the statement "says delay in the agricultural talks is holding up progress in goods and services liberalisation, which is economically far more significant. … The warning comes as the WTO returns to work after its summer break, with four months remaining before December's ministerial meeting in Hong Kong. Progress in the talks has been slow. … Without a significant breakthrough in the agricultural talks and, particularly, a commitment from the EU and US to cut farm tariffs rather than the lesser goal of ending export subsidies, the big emerging markets such as India and Brazil are unlikely to agree radical liberalisation of their goods and services markets."

China, EU Reach Deal On Textiles. China and the European Commission reached an agreement Monday to end their dispute over the importation of cheap Chinese textiles. The Financial Times (9/6, Hall, Parker) reports, "After marathon talks in Beijing stretching into the early hours of Monday morning, Peter Mandelson, EU trade commissioner, and Bo Xilai, his Chinese counterpart, agreed to release Chinese garments impounded at Europe's ports 'as soon as possible.' Mr Mandelson said the two sides had agreed to 'sensible, reasonable, burden-sharing' regarding the fate of 77m Chinese sweaters, trousers and bras impounded at the EU's borders. The Commission proposes to wave through half of the impounded garments. China accepted that the rest would be deducted either from its 2006 textile quota, or switched to other unfilled-quota categories."

The Wall Street Journal (9/6, Browne, Bianchi, von Reppert-Bismarck, Champion) reports, "Both sides hailed the textile accord, which still needs the approval of EU member countries, as a fair compromise. … EU officials and diplomats expect European governments to approve the agreement today."

Chinese Oil Company Moves To Sell Kazakhstan Acquisition. The Wall Street Journal (9/6, Singer, Chazan) reports, "China National Petroleum Corp., which last month triumphed in a bidding war to buy a strategically important oil company with operations in neighboring Kazakhstan, is in talks to sell as much as half of the $4.18 billion acquisition to Kazakhstan's state-owned oil firm even before the first deal is closed, according to people familiar with the matter. A deal by CNPC, as China National Petroleum is called, to sell a 33% to 50% stake in PetroKazakhstan Inc., a Canadian company with operations in the oil-rich central-Asian state, to KazMunaiGaz, the state-owned oil company, is expected to be sealed in the next few weeks, these people said. The price tag on such a deal with KMG, as the state firm is known, wasn't clear."

Columnist Says Bush, Hu Have Urgent Issues To Discuss. George Melloan writes in his Wall Street Journal column (9/6), "The Katrina disaster offered the White House a plausible reason to postpone tomorrow's planned visit from Chinese President Hu Jintao, but the delay was unfortunate. President George W. Bush needs to discuss some important issues with Mr. Hu." Bush 'and Mr. Hu need to come to a better understanding, setting aside spurious issues and dwelling on ways the two countries can cooperate to keep China on the course it desires, to become a 'modernized, medium-level developed country.' Mr. Bush can offer wise counsel: To do that, it will have to become more democratic."

Ukrainian Official Resigns To Protest Alleged Corruption. A top aide to Ukrainian President Viktor Yuschenko said yester day he has resigned from the government because of corruption allegations around Yushchenko. The Washington Times/AP (9/6, Lisova) reports that Oleksandr Zinchenko, who resigned Saturday, was a chief organizer of the "Orange Revolution" protests. He said "the situation had grown 'even worse' than under former President Leonid Kuchma."

Report Says Chernobyl Caused Less Harm Than Anticipated. A new report has found that the after effects of the accident at Chernobyl nuclear power plant 20 years ago have proved less dire than predicted. The New York Times (9/6) says the report, which was prepared by a panel of more than 100 experts convened by United Nations agencies, "says huge compensation programs for people in the Chernobyl region have become 'a major barrier to the region's recovery,' both by creating a culture of dependency and by soaking up a high percentage of the region's resources. It recommends that the compensation programs be cut back."

The Washington Post (9/6, A22, Finn) adds that the report says the governments of Ukraine, Belarus and Russia, "the three countries most affected by radioactive fallout from Chernobyl, should strive to end the 'paralyzing fatalism' of tens of thousands of their citizens who wrongly believe they are still at risk of an early death." The 600-page report "found that as of the middle of this year, the accident had caused fewer than 50 deaths directly attributable to radiation, most of them among emergency workers who died in the first months after the accident."

The Wall Street Journal (9/6, Fialka) reports, "The 600-page report said that almost 99% of children diagnosed with thyroid cancer after the incident survived. It found 'no convincing evidence' that the incidence of leukemia rose among the population exposed to radiation in Russia and Ukraine."

At least 147 people died, many of them on the ground. Miraculously, as many as 16 passengers aboard the jet survived, including an 18-month-old child, wrapped in his mother's arms. She survived, as well."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Immigration Charge Dropped In Va. Terror Case (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 5, 2005

The scene was emblematic of the war on terror: a government helicopter clattering over a home in Burke as gun-toting agents smashed through the door and handcuffed the owner, a Lebanese immigrant.

Hassan Khalil, 37, was arrested by agents with a local terrorism task force this May and charged with immigration fraud. But now, officials say, the charge has been dropped. The reason: a mistake in Khalil's immigration records.

Khalil, a U.S. citizen and cell phone technician, said the experience has left him frustrated and bewildered. He said his attorney was told in July that the immigration charge was being dropped but that the investigation would continue.

"Overall I'm really angry at this," he said. "Even if they had anything on me, which I doubt, I haven't seen it. They didn't show it to me. They did all this, then dropped the case and walked away. And nothing."

Khalil's case was featured in a June article in The Washington Post about the government's increased use of immigration laws against people who have come under scrutiny in terrorism cases.

U.S. officials say that such charges sometimes are the easiest way to detain someone who could be a threat and that there is nothing wrong with prosecuting people who have broken immigration laws.

Authorities have declined to comment on what brought Khalil to their attention or whether he could face further accusations. He was charged in May with lying on his citizenship application by failing to note an arrest by U.S. officials in the early 1990s for being in the country illegally.

Khalil has said he is innocent. He acknowledges that he overstayed a student visa but said he later obtained temporary legal papers under a program for people affected by the Lebanese civil war. He then married a U.S. citizen in 1994 and was granted citizenship in 2000.

Frank Shults, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Alexandria, said that after an investigation, authorities discovered that Khalil in fact had not been arrested. Instead, Khalil had agreed with authorities to voluntarily leave the country after overstaying his visa in the early 1990s, Shults said. Khalil never left the United States, he said.

"The statements he made on the application about not being arrested were deemed accurate," Shults said. "So they dropped the charges."

Kareem Shora, of the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, said the case appeared to be part of what he called a pattern of dramatic anti-terrorism arrests that resulted in immigration allegations or other charges that were later dropped.

"The use of these high-profile raids, when it's not warranted, is a waste of my taxpayer money," he said. He said they also damage relations between the government and Muslim and Arab communities.

Dean Boyd, a spokesman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, said the agency used a helicopter during the raid to ensure the safety of the agents and Khalil. He said authorities believed that Khalil had military training and a black belt in martial arts. Khalil also had told the FBI that he knew members of Hezbollah, the armed Shiite Muslim movement that the U.S. government considers a terrorist group, Boyd said.

Khalil said in an interview that he did not know any Hezbollah members in the United States but that he did in his native south Lebanon, where it is a political party.

Janice Kephart, a former counsel to the 9/11 commission, said it was important for the government to use any kind of valid civil or criminal charges -- including immigration violations -- to protect homeland security. She emphasized that U.S. officials didn't act lightly in pressing such charges.

"Prosecutors don't like to lose cases," she said. "That doesn't mean the government doesn't sometimes make mistakes."

For Khalil, though, the mistake has had painful consequences. He said his 7-year-old daughter was so frightened by the dawn raid that she refuses to sleep alone. He and his wife jump at sudden noises. And he hasn't figured out how to retrieve his passport and other documents seized in the raid.

"I just don't feel secure, up to today," he said. "People come up to me and say, 'Congratulations,' and I'm like, 'Yeah, right.' I don't feel it's done."

Al Qaeda: A Link To London? (NSWK)

Newsweek

Newsweek, September 5, 2005

American and British investigators say a new video featuring a July 7 London subway bomber and Qaeda chief deputy Ayman al-Zawahiri is authentic. These counterterror officials, who asked not to be named because of the sensitive subject matter, say the tape, aired last Thursday by Al-Jazeera, appears to affirm a link between Al Qaeda and the July 7 attacks—but it doesn't prove Zawahiri or Qaeda head Osama bin Laden ordered them.

In the slick video, which the officials think was assembled from two separately shot tapes, suicide bomber Mohammed Sidique Khan says he is a "soldier" intent on "protecting and avenging my Muslim brothers and sisters." He asks Allah to "raise me amongst those I love," a group that includes bin Laden, Zawahiri and Abu Mussab al-Zarqawi, the Jordanian-born leader of the Iraqi insurgency. Khan does not say that the Iraq war was a motivation for the attacks. But Zawahiri does praise them as a "slap in the face" to Tony Blair's British government for its alleged collaboration with Washington in oppressing Muslims in countries including Iraq. The British official says authorities believe the tape may have been put together up to three months ago; they don't know if the video, in which Khan spoke in the soft accent of his native Yorkshire, was taped in Britain or Pakistan, which he reportedly visited several months before the London bombings.

The British investigation into the terror acts—four incidents on July 7 that killed more than 50, and another four attempted attacks on July 21 in which the bombs didn't explode—appears to have bogged down in past weeks. Though numerous suspects, including the would-be bombers themselves, were picked up and charged for the July 21 attacks, nobody has been arrested for the July 7 bombings. This lack of progress led some British investigators to claim recently that the July 7 bombers may have been a self-generated cell.

Justice Department Under Fire (WT)

By Nat Hentoff

The Washington Times, September 5, 2005

I thought I was inured to learning about further evidence of this administration's disregard for our system of justice as it abuses international law and our statutes in the CIA's kidnapping of terrorism suspects to be sent to other nations. But an Aug. 9 statement in Brooklyn federal court by Mary Mason of the Justice Department's Constitutional Torts Section astonished me by its breadth of disregard for what we prize as our rule of law.

The case was the first civil lawsuit to challenge the CIA's "extraordinary renditions," sending terrorist suspects to countries known for torturing their prisoners. Maher Arar, a naturalized Canadian citizen, is suing for damages in Maher Arar v. John Ashcroft, Acting Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson, et al. He was seized by American agents and shipped to his native Syria, where he was tortured for nearly a year after being picked up at Kennedy International Airport on Sept. 26, 2002, when he was changing planes to return to his home in Canada from a beach vacation in Tunisia.

As reported in the Aug. 10 New York Times (and confirmed to me by Georgetown University law professor David Cole, Mr. Arar's attorney on behalf of the Center for Constitutional rights) this is what Mrs. Mason, speaking for the U.S. government, said in federal court: "Foreign citizens who change planes at airports in the United States can legally be seized, detained without charges, deprived of access to a lawyer or the courts, and even denied basic necessities like food." Asked U.S. District Judge David Trager: "Would not such treatment of a detainee in any context, criminal, civil, immigration or otherwise violate both the Constitution and clearly established case law?" Mrs. Mason said it would not. All the government has to do is declare the seized passenger an "inadmissible alien" beyond the reach of the Constitution.

It's important to note at this point that Mr. Arar has not been charged with any crime despite his horrifying ordeal in a 3-by-6-by-7-foot cell, described by him as "like a grave," where he heard the screams of other tortured prisoners. After Syria finally released him, that government declared Mr. Arar completely innocent, said Imad Moustapha, Syria's high-ranking diplomat in Washington, on the Jan. 21, 2004, CBS "60 Minutes II." Mr. Arar did falsely confess after ongoing, savage bouts of torture that he had been to an al Qaeda trainingcampin Afgh-anistan. But he has neverbeenin Afghanistan. He confessed, he says, because he was ready to "do anything to stop the torture." Syria's Mr. Moustapha admits:"Wetraced links. We traced relations. We tried to find anything. We couldn't." Now back in Canada, Mr. Arar is a free man. In addition to suffering continual nightmares about his torture, and other resultant difficulties, he is afraid that he can never clear his name. Mr. Arar is suing Messrs. Ashcroft and Thompson, and other officials for compensatory and punitive damages.

In court papers, his attorneys note that the U.S. government removed him chained and shackled to Syria "with the full knowledge of the existence of state-sponsored torture in that country." Our own State Departmenthasrepeatedly confirmed the torture in that country. Moreover, as his attorneys add, this official kidnapping was committed "in direct contravention of the U.N. Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, a treaty ratified by the United States in 1994" and in violation of this country's subsequent Torture Victim Protection Act of 1991.

As usual, the Justice Department, as often stated by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, maintains that no suspect is sent to a country known for torture unless "assurances" are given that the prisoner, uncharged with any crime, will not be tortured. As I and other reporters, along with human-rights organizations, have documented, these "assurances" are a farce, and the Bush administration knows it, despite the president's frequent pledges that "we do not engage in torture." This government's papers in Mr. Arar's lawsuit actually say, as the New York Times reported, that when foreign citizens are seized and abused on our soil and then sent away to be tortured, "even if they are wrongly or illegally designated inadmissible... such aliens have at most a right against 'gross physical abuse.' " And, of course, no American official, up to and including the attorney general, is responsible for any "illegalities" resulting in that innocent victim being tortured.

The government claims it has classified information that Mr. Arar is an al Qaeda member, but it has invoked its "state secrets" privilege to refuse to release that "evidence," so that Mr. Arar can refute it. It's no longer a secret that, in these "extraordinary renditions," this administration has repeatedly and cynically been flagrantly lawless while Congress keeps abdicating its constitutional investigative responsibilities under the separation of powers.

PATRIOT ACT:

Patriot Act Meets With Opposition (LBPT)

By Jason Gewirtz, Staff writer

Long Beach (CA) Press-Telegram, September 5, 2005

LONG BEACH — The City Council will be asked Tuesday to oppose provisions of the controversial USA PATRIOT Act that a citizens' group says will threaten civil liberty protections.

Councilwomen Bonnie Lowenthal and Tonia Reyes Uranga will make the request, asking the council to support a recently adopted resolution in the State Senate that urges Congress to amend the act.

The Patriot Act was adopted after 9/11 to provide government officials with more ways to investigate potential terrorist leads. A number of the act's provisions are set to expire at the end of the year unless Congress renews them.

Several of those provisions allow the FBI to seize records from financial companies, libraries, doctors' offices and other businesses with limited approval.

Several cities, including Los Angeles, San Jose and San Francisco, have adopted similar measures in recent months regarding civil liberty aspects of the act. But whether the council will tackle the issue is unclear.

In the past, council members have had contentious debates over whether they should weigh in on various issues in front of the federal government. In March 2003, the council withdrew two contested resolutions after a debate over how, or whether, to address the war in Iraq. In June 2004, the council split 4-4 on a resolution to oppose the Federal Marriage Amendment.

Councilman Frank Colonna, who has opposed several past council efforts at intervention beyond the city's authority, said Tuesday's item falls into that category.

"I really don't think that this is the proper time to start to analyze the pros and cons of the Patriot Act," he said.

But Edith Pollach with the Long Beach Civil Liberties Defense Coalition said the council should take up the issue. She said nearly two dozen local groups will urge support for the measure Tuesday.

"What's the oath of office that the council members take?" she asked. "Aren't they supposed to take an oath that they're going to carry out and obey the Constitution of the United States and the state of California?"

Budget time

At a budget hearing during the council meeting, the council's Budget Oversight Committee will present its recommendations to the council regarding the proposed 2006 city budget. The city's fiscal year begins Oct. 1.

The city manager has proposed more than $20 million in cuts in the proposed budget.

The council is also expected to hear a report from Police Chief Anthony Batts on a plan to hire more police officers. Batts has said he will recommend that the city increase its police force by a minimum of 37 officers to a maximum of 309 officers.

Although a funding source for those officers has not been identified, the city is considering a potential ballot measure in April that could pay for the personnel.

Cap removed?

Also Tuesday, the council will consider rescinding an earlier action to approve all Redevelopment Agency spending of $1 million or more.

Over the past year, council members have been at battle with each other over who should control redevelopment.

RDA Board members have argued that the proposed cap effectively places another level of bureaucracy in the redevelopment process, further slowing a process that many complain is already burdensome.

Report bonanza

Meanwhile, city staffers could be busy in coming weeks if the council approves a slew of proposed reports on Tuesday.

Those requests include:

* A report on installing and operating downtown surveillance cameras to prevent and fight crime. The Redevelopment Agency recently approved $400,000 to purchase cameras, contingent on the city agreeing to operate and monitor the devices. The Downtown Long Beach Associates has also agreed to contribute $75,000 toward the effort. Lowenthal, Uranga and Councilwoman Rae Gabelich will request the report;

* A survey listing all buildings or structures in Long Beach that might be considered culturally or historically significant. Lowenthal, who is requesting the review, will also request that the Planning and Building Department develop a process to identify such properties before issuing permits for projects to replace them; and

* A survey listing all solar-powered buildings and projects in the city and a report on solar energy grants that the city has or is pursuing. Colonna will request the item to explore ways that the city can expand its solar energy use.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Anti-terrorism Program's Shortfalls May Hurt Safety (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, September 6, 2005

An airline anti-terrorism screening plan may not be able to tell the Department of Homeland Security how many passenger records are being screened or project the number of terrorist-watch-list "hits" to be sent to the nation's Terrorist Screening Center (TSC), according to a report.

The Justice Department's Office of Inspector General said the program shortfalls, found in a lengthy audit, have hurt the TSC's ability to plan its role in the government's new "Secure Flight" program, an initiative to let the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) compare the names of commercial airline passengers with TSC's consolidated terrorist watch list.

Secure Flight has been described as a critical part of Homeland Security's overall layered strategy to secure the nation's commercial air transportation system.

The system will compare data provided to airlines with information provided by companies that collect personal data for marketing and credit scoring, and then match it with terrorist watch lists.

Privacy advocates have challenged the program, criticizing attempts to use personal information to determine who can board aircraft. Some lawmakers questioned its effectiveness after high-profile colleagues were flagged for secondary screening, including Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat.

TSC is a multiagency effort administered by the FBI whose mission is to consolidate terrorist watch lists and provide available 24/7 responses for screening people against the list.

Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said that while the TSC had made "significant progress" in preparing for Secure Flight, neither it nor the TSA knows how many passenger records will be screened and cannot project how many watch-list "hits" it will forward.

Mr. Fine said the Secure Flight program likely would affect the TSC's space, staffing and funding needs and had delayed other TSC projects. But, he said, the TSC could not adequately estimate the cost of new programs that increase its range of operations, such as Secure Flight.

"Implementing the Secure Flight program requires substantial, cross-cutting modifications and enhancements to the TSC's infrastructure," Mr. Fine said, adding that TSC officials could not easily distinguish Secure Flight funding needs from those needed for unrelated system enhancements.

"We found that the TSC is attempting to plan for a program that has several major undefined parameters," Mr. Fine said.

"Specifically, the TSC does not know when Secure Flight will start, the volume of inquiries expected and the resulting number of resources required to respond, the quality of data it will have to analyze," he said.

The Inspector General's Office made five recommendations to the TSC to help it support the Secure Flight program, including enhancing the organization's budget formulation and execution capabilities and re-examining the Secure Flight resource estimates as soon as the program is implemented and workload figures established.

Mr. Fine said the TSC agreed with the report's findings and recommendations and would take the necessary action.

U.S. Muslims Craft Outreach Programs (WSJ)

By Suzanne Sataline

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

Calling the terrorist attacks on London a wake-up call, Muslim-American organizations have launched a number of programs that are designed, in part, to prevent or root out disgruntled Muslims who might be tempted to use their religion to justify violence.

The Islamic Society of North America plans to distribute tens of thousands of pamphlets at mosques and cultural centers that spell out the Quran's injunctions against violence.

Another broad-based organization, the Muslim Public Affairs Council, is expanding its program to teach local mosques to partner with local communities and law enforcement.

Muslim groups announced or publicized their efforts at the Islamic Society's annual convention, which drew an estimated 40,000 people to Rosemont, Ill., this weekend. The groups stressed ways for Muslims to gain more acceptance and to combat suspicion in the U.S.

"It really was the profile of the bombers in England that shocked everyone and made all of us really disturbed," said Ingrid Mattson, the Islamic Society's vice president. The British bombers were mostly the sons of immigrants isolated in poor enclaves. Though their lives were different from the middle-class world of most Muslim Americans, "it made a lot of people afraid," Ms. Mattson added.

Muslim leaders at the convention were quick to say the campaigns don't reflect philosophical changes, nor are they meant as apologies for terrorist acts. The conference carried a theme that U.S. Muslims must become more transparent and emphatic about their beliefs and intentions if they are to melt domestic distrust.

The London attacks also prompted a number of U.S. Muslim organizations to issue a fatwa -- an Islamic legal ruling -- in July, denouncing the violence.

"As Muslims, we must face up to our responsibility to clarify and advocate a faith-based, righteous and moral position with regard to this problem, especially when terrorist acts are perpetrated in the name of Islam," according to the pamphlet set for distribution by the Islamic Society.

Last month, the Muslim Public Affairs Council started the Muslim-American Project on 37 college campuses. It is an effort to teach Muslim college students that they are part of U.S. society and to guide them in participating in civic activities, such as elections, said Ahmed Younis, national director of the council, which has offices in Los Angeles and Washington. The council plans to add 20 mosques to the project, which is designed to teach mosque leaders transparency and the benefits of civic involvement.

Since May 2004, council officials have traveled to Muslim centers across the country, prompting Muslim leaders to work with local police and federal investigators who may be watching for terrorist cells.

Maha ElGenaidi, founder of Islamic Networks Group, a nonprofit education effort in San Jose, Calif., told those who attended the conference of many ways they could become more welcome Americans, such as "attend your children's school events. It's good for other parents to see you there, as well," she said.

Pentagon Pressed For 9/11 Answers (WT)

By Shaun Waterman, United Press International

The Washington Times, September 5, 2005

Members of the September 11 commission think they have been left swinging in the wind by the growing revelations about a secret Pentagon program that may have identified the ringleader of the hijackings as an al Qaeda operative more than a year before the attacks.

"Other people have questions they need to answer," said Al Felzenberg, spokesman for the commission's embattled successor body, the 9/11 Public Discourse Project.

"The American people deserve answers," Mr. Felzenberg said, adding that both the White House and the Pentagon had left questions about the issue unresolved for weeks -- something other commission sources say has exposed them to a fierce backlash.

"They are sitting on their hands and we are swinging in the wind," one former commission official said.

Others, including Rep. Peter Hoekstra, Michigan Republican and chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, say the commission is merely getting "a little bit of its own medicine," being second-guessed in hindsight, as it judged the actions of officials before September 11.

"In hindsight it is always easy to see people's mistakes," he said. "You have to be sympathetic to people in hindsight. More sympathetic than they were."

At the center of the controversy are claims that the secret project, code-named Able Danger, in 2000 produced a chart bearing the names -- and in some people's recollections, photographs -- of about 60 people thought linked to al Qaeda. Among the names was that of Mohamed Atta, the ringleader of the attacks.

If the claims turn out to be true, it will entail a major rewrite of the commission's accounts of the missed opportunities to thwart the attacks.

Rep. Curt Weldon, Pennsylvania Republican and a passionate advocate of data-mining technology, and the man who first publicized the claims about Able Danger, has said repeatedly that he gave a copy of the chart to Stephen J. Hadley, now the national security adviser, at the White House on Sept. 25, 2001, and that Mr. Hadley said he would show it to the president.

The White House has refused to comment on the claims or provide Mr. Hadley for an interview with reporters.

"It would be helpful if Mr. Hadley would answer those questions," Mr. Felzenberg said. "He could make this whole thing go away."

Two persons associated with the project have come forward to say they told commission staff about the project and its identification of Atta -- touching off a firestorm of criticism of the commission, including accusations from some victims' relatives of a cover-up.

Commission staff say that, in the absence of any corroboration, they did not believe the accounts they received.

"We had 2½ million pieces of paper we'd crowbarred out of the administration," said Mr. Felzenberg. "We'd interviewed 1,200 people. ... It was [their] story stacked up against these mountains of material -- none of which mentioned Atta before September 11 or this famous chart."

The Pentagon said last week that it had searched millions of documents, including many not turned over to the commission, but had found neither the chart nor any reference to it.

Covering All The Bases (LEGALT)

By Vanessa Blum, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 5, 2005

If any lawyer knows the Department of Homeland Security inside and out, it's Philip Perry.

DOJ_NMG_0002552

Three years ago, as a senior White House lawyer, Perry helped create the new department. Later, as a partner at Washington's Latham & Watkins, he actively lobbied the DHS on behalf of two Fortune 500 companies. Then, about three months ago, the 41-year-old completed the circle, joining the agency as its general counsel.

In many ways, Perry is following Washington's most common career path. Lawyers in the capital have always swung between the federal government and law firms. But if you want to get off on the right foot with Perry, you better not refer to that flight pattern as the "revolving door."

"The term 'revolving door' implies people going in and out of government in order to obtain monetary gain," Perry says. "The reason people go into government is to serve their country. It's not appropriate to describe that as a revolving door."

Perry, who is married to Vice President Dick Cheney's oldest daughter, Elizabeth, has held three jobs in the Bush administration. In his current post—the first to require Senate confirmation—Perry oversees roughly 1,500 lawyers. In addition to its usual portfolio, his office is now handling legal aspects of the government's response to the devastation caused by Hurricane Katrina. And, in fact, Perry canceled a planned Labor Day weekend fishing excursion with his father-in-law to deal with the crisis.

Perry's work ethic seems to match that of his notoriously intense boss, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. During August, when much of official Washington tends to dawdle, Perry pushed his staff to complete work on 30 separate regulations.

Whether it matters to him or not, mastering the workings of the DHS is almost certain to open doors for Perry when he returns to the private sector. But Perry can also catalog the sacrifices involved in government service. As a partner at Latham, he pulled in more than $700,000. At the DHS, he makes about $140,000—a salary cut of at least 80 percent.

Perry first met Chertoff roughly 10 years ago, when both worked at Latham. DHS Chief of Staff John Wood says that the two lawyers have a similar temperament. "They're both extremely bright and have very quick minds that can focus intensely on a problem until they come up with a solution."

Perry's wife, Elizabeth Cheney Perry, is the State Department's No. 2 diplomat in the Middle East. The couple have four children: 11-year-old Katherine, 7-year-old Elizabeth, 5-year-old Grace, and 1-year-old Philip. In both the 2000 and 2004 campaigns, the couple led Cheney's preparation for the vice presidential debate, with Perry sometimes playing the part of the moderator.

Republican political consultant Mary Matalin was part of Cheney's debate prep team. She describes Perry as "very, very, very strategic."

"Asking questions is as hard and as important as coming up with answers," Matalin says. "You could tell he was always thinking on multiple levels."

PUBLIC PLATFORM

Perry's progression through the private and public sectors has a similarly strategic feel.

After George W. Bush took office in January 2001, Perry went almost overnight from being a junior partner at Latham to taking the No. 3 post at the Justice Department. Lawyers who worked with Perry at Main Justice say he was known for his dry sense of humor, which would come out when he briefed the group on important civil cases.

After the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Perry worked with a small team of lawyers who were developing a framework for the September 11th Victim Compensation Fund, overseen by mediator Kenneth Feinberg. In his new book, What Is Life Worth?, Feinberg calls Perry an "unsung hero."

According to Feinberg, it was Perry who settled the issue of which family members would be able to receive compensation from the fund—a detail not addressed by Congress. Perry suggested that in the 80 percent of cases where the victim left no will, the proper beneficiaries should be determined under the inheritance laws of the victim's state.

"The solution was brilliant in its simplicity," Feinberg says. "Any other approach would have had us acting as family counselors trying to determine who should receive compensation."

In early 2002, Perry left the Justice Department to become general counsel of the highly influential White House Office of Management and Budget. The appointment, which requires no Senate approval, placed Perry at the hub of executive branch rule-making. It allowed him to get deeply involved in a broad range of policy issues and to ensure that agencies developed regulations consistent with the views of the White House. "Industry knows they can knock on OMB's door and effectively lobby the White House," says Robert Shull, who monitors the agency at OMB Watch.

One of Perry's projects at the OMB was to work on the president's proposal for a new Department of Homeland Security and to lay the groundwork for implementation of the Safety Act—a measure that protects government contractors from being sued in the event of a terrorist attack.

"Phil was one of those can-do lawyers," says General Electric Co. top lobbyist Nancy Dorn, the OMB's former deputy director. "As opposed to giving you 150 reasons you can't do something, he would tell you how you can do it. And how to do it right. And usually how to do it quickly."

PRIVATE LESSONS

When Perry returned to Latham in September 2003, he brought with him an enhanced understanding of how government regulations are developed and written, and how they can be most effectively defended in court. On the flip side, he also knew how corporate clients could most effectively attack such regulations through lobbying and litigation.

"When Phil came back, he wasn't the junior partner anymore," says Everett "Kip" Johnson Jr., a partner in Latham's Washington office. "He came back with a much broader perspective of how government works, how government views things and approaches cases."

While at Latham, Perry lobbied the DHS on behalf of government contractors General Electric and Lockheed Martin Corp. As a result of that work, Perry says he has recused himself from all specific matters involving the two companies. According to Senate lobby registrations, Lockheed paid Latham roughly $140,000 for Perry's work. The firm did not file a disclosure form for Perry's representation of General Electric, indicating that lobbying work constituted less than 20 percent of his services to the company.

But Perry says that nothing in the government ethics laws bars him from working on DHS regulations that might affect his former clients, because regulations involve issues of general policy, not particular cases or controversies.

Perry's lobbying work for GE and Lockheed involved applications for liability protection filed under the Safety Act. Perry has made no secret of the fact that he would like to adjust that application process to make it less burdensome on business.

He says encouraging private industry to develop counterterrorism technologies by cutting red tape makes sense for the country.

"We shouldn't just be sitting back and taking applications from people," Perry says. "We should be using it as a tool to encourage industry to come up with the technologies that will help protect the country."

FAMILY FOCUS

Perry was born in 1964, in San Diego, Calif. His family moved to Palo Alto when his father, a naval officer, went to Stanford University to earn an advanced degree in economics. After graduating from high school in the San Francisco suburb of Orinda, Perry attended Colorado College.

Colorado College was also the alma mater of Dick Cheney's wife, Lynne, and daughters Elizabeth and Mary, but Perry didn't meet Elizabeth until 1991, at an alumni happy hour in Washington, D.C. By that time he had a law degree from Cornell University and was working as an associate in the D.C. office of Squire, Sanders & Dempsey. The couple were married in 1993.

While his new wife attended law school at the University of Chicago, Perry spent three years in the Chicago office of Latham & Watkins. The couple moved back to Washington in 1996, and Perry transferred into Latham's D.C. office. In 1997, Perry took a year off to work on the Senate probe into campaign finance abuses during the 1996 campaign.

At the time, Perry's father-in-law was the chief executive officer of Halliburton Inc. and a former secretary of defense. Still, it was not a subject Perry spoke about, says friend Gus Puryear IV, who met Perry while working on the investigation.

"For the longest time I didn't know the Cheneys were his in-laws," says Puryear, now general counsel of Nashville's Corrections Corp. of America. "I don't think it ever came up until I actually met Liz."

No matter how Perry handles his relationship with Cheney, he will probably always face critics who believe he got where he is because of his father-in-law. After Perry was nominated to the DHS post in April 2005, the Toledo Blade ran an editorial blasting the pick as "a pure form of nepotism."

DOJ_NMG_0002554

While Perry concedes that he has had opportunities because of the family he married into, he says he has succeeded through hard work. Friends like Puryear maintain that any suggestion to the contrary is unfair to Perry.

"He's all substance," Puryear says. "If you look at the roles he's taken on, they're not glamour roles. He's taking on get-in-the-trenches, do-the-work roles."

Shull of OMB Watch says nepotism is beside the point. He says the Bush administration demands such loyalty from political appointees that they all seem to form one collective brood: "You almost don't even need family ties in this administration."

WAR NEWS:

U.S. Troops Cordon Part Of Iraqi Town To Trap Insurgents (WP)

By Jonathan Finer, Washington Post Foreign Service

TALL AFAR, Iraq, Sept. 4 -- Under the cover of a moonless night, U.S. soldiers on Sunday strung nearly a mile of razor-sharp concertina wire across the northern edge of a neighborhood dominated by insurgents to prevent them from fleeing without a showdown.

Several small teams of five or six troops quickly uncoiled spools of wire and fastened it along the deserted sidewalk of a broad thoroughfare. The cordon was intended to prevent insurgents from blending in with the hundreds of people who fled the city during heavy clashes Sunday.

"The idea is to trap them in Sarai or force them toward our checkpoints to the south," said Col. H.R. McMaster, commander of the Army's 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment, referring to the neighborhood that U.S. forces believe has served as a launching point for many attacks in the city. "We don't want them to slip out."

More than 5,000 U.S. and Iraqi soldiers entered Tall Afar on Friday in a broad sweep for insurgents who have held sway in the northern city since a previous U.S. invasion, and subsequent withdrawal, last September. In three days of fighting, as many as 200 insurgents have been killed, McMaster said. Two U.S. and four Iraqi soldiers have been wounded, none seriously.

The assault in Tall Afar, considered a transit point and logistics hub for insurgents operating across northern Iraq, is the largest on an Iraqi city since the invasion of Fallujah in November. Commanders say they believe that perhaps a few hundred insurgents remain in the city, but acknowledge that they do not know the exact number. Other than in Fallujah, where entrenched fighters battled advancing U.S. troops, most assaults on Iraqi cities have met little resistance, as insurgents have fled to surrounding areas or blended into the local population.

Soldiers here are hoping to prevent that from happening by converging from all directions on Sarai, the commanders say. Weeks before the invasion, the troops set up checkpoints on the roads to town and built an 80-mile berm around the city to stop vehicles from leaving.

About 500 people attempted to leave the city this weekend through the U.S.-manned checkpoints. At least one man suspected of kidnapping and beheading several residents in recent weeks was apprehended when he tried to leave the city with a group of children, McMaster said. When soldiers interviewed the children, they said they did not know the man but went with him because they had been threatened.

A cacophony of gunfire and explosions filled the air around Tall Afar on Sunday, the heaviest day of fighting since the invasion began. Soldiers continued methodically searching homes and questioning residents, frequently coming under small-arms fire that whistled overhead as they passed from house to house or leapt across gaps between rooftops.

Much of the shooting came from a series of deep, grooved valleys that divide the city. The valleys, dipping as low as 40 feet below street level, allow insurgents to stash weapons and move undetected. Soldiers have found large caches of explosives in the valleys and begun firing warning shots when they spot men of military age descending into them.

"With the geography and the buildings so close together, it's a complex terrain to fight in," said Capt. Noah Hanners, 26, of Chillicothe, Ohio, commander of the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment's Blue Platoon, Eagle Troop, 2nd Squadron, which cleared several homes along the edge of a valley northeast of downtown Sunday.

Just after 9 a.m., Hanners's platoon used a sledgehammer to knock down the door of a two-story house made of large stone blocks. A woman wearing a purple abaya , or full-length cloak, and holding a baby ran toward them. "Already my husband is dead and you are breaking my house!" she shouted.

When shots rang out in the streets, she clutched her baby close to her chest. As a series of explosions grew closer, she sat down, rocked her baby and began to cry.

"Um, that's close. Very close," said Pfc. Hector Rodriguez, 20, of Buffalo, after an explosion rattled the windows.

Soldiers scrambled to set up shooting positions on the roof.

"We are receiving sniper fire," a voice over the platoon's radio said.

"Where from?" someone answered. No one knew. The platoon's machine gunner began shooting staccato bursts into the valley from the next roof.

"Who is that shooting?" Hanners asked over the radio.

"Blue saw team, we saw muzzle flashes from the south," came the response.

Another call over the radio said a Tall Afar resident working with the Army had identified an arms dealer in a house across the street. The soldiers gave the woman with the baby a voucher for $300 to repair her gate, redeemable at a nearby military base, and dashed next door.

By the time they reached that house, the suspected arms dealer and two other men had already been handcuffed and blindfolded by other members of the platoon.

"This is my nephew. He does not even live here," a woman in the house said as the men were led away.

"He was identified. That's what you get for selling weapons," a soldier said.

The soldiers continued to the last house on the block. They herded a family of nine into a living room and searched their belongings. A drawer of silverware crashed to the floor, startling the children.

"I am scared. We are all scared, but what are we supposed to do?" said the father, Shimsdain Muhammed, 40, an electrician, according to an account of his remarks provided by a military interpreter traveling with the unit. Muhammed told his children to wave and smile at the soldiers, who responded in kind. "I cannot tell them to leave, so we will do the best we can."

Suddenly, an explosion outside shattered the windows of the house, eliciting screams and confusion. It turned out to be a passing U.S. M1-A1 Abrams tank firing its main gun into the valley.

"This place is too much," another soldier said later, recounting the story to a friend.

Elsewhere Sunday in Tall Afar, an Iraqi army unit freed 35 hostages held in a house south of downtown, according to Maj. Gen. Khorsheed Salim, commander of the army's 3rd Division, which is heavily involved in the operation.

Soldiers in the western part of the city found a laboratory rigged with explosives, McMaster said. The lab also contained a chemical that burned the troops' throats and eyes when they entered. The Army is trying to identify the substance.

[Early Monday, as many as 30 gunmen in 10 cars opened fire on Iraq's Interior Ministry, killing two policemen and wounding five, the Reuters news agency reported.

An Interior Ministry official said gunmen used rocket-propelled grenades, mortars and automatic rifles in the attack.]

Iraq Sets Date For Saddam Trial Next Month (FT)

By Steve Negus, Iraq Correspondent

Financial Times, September 5, 2005

Saddam Hussein, the former Iraqi president, would go on trial on October 19 on charges related to the repression of Shia in a central Iraqi town in 1982, an Iraqi government spokesman said on Sunday.

The spokesman was subsequently quoted as saying that Mr Hussein could be executed shortly after his trial - possibly raising objections from the Kurds and other groups anxious to see crimes against their communities brought to trial.

"In view of recent leaks to the press and in the absence of an official spokesman for the tribunal, I have been authorised to announce that the trial of Saddam Hussein will begin on October 19," Laith Kubba, the prime ministerial spokesman, told a news conference.

The deposed leader's co-defendants would include Barzan Ibrahim, his half-brother and then-chief of intelligence, Taha Yassin Ramadan, former vice-president, former top judge Awad Badar Al-Bandar, and four former local members of the ruling Ba'ath party, Mr Kubba said.

The trial will open four days after an October 15 referendum on >Iraq's newly drafted constitution, although Mr Kubba said there was no relation between the two dates.

The charges relate to the aftermath of a 1982 attempt to assassinate the former president in the predominantly Shia town of Dujail, after which Mr Hussein's followers are said to have embarked on a campaign of collective punishment against the town in which hundreds were executed.

The defendants could receive the recently reinstated death penalty for their role in the repression.

The Iraqi special tribunal in charge of trying former regime officials has divided the charges against Mr Hussein and his associates into a dozen cases covering specific places and periods of time.

Iraqi officials have indicated that the Dujail case would be among the first as the scale is relatively limited and the case less complex than larger-scale killings such as the 1987-88 Anfal campaign against the Kurds and the repression of the 1991 intifada.

Mr Kubba was quoted by AFP as saying the sentence "will be implemented immediately . . . He could be executed after the first round."

This raises a possible conflict of interest between Shia parties, many of which want quick justice, and Kurds, many of whom want a drawn-out process to publicise the extent of their persecution under the former regime. Many Kurds cite waves of persecution such as the Anfal campaign, in which they claim some 182,000 people were killed, as a key argument behind their demands for independence.

Mr Hussein's defence team is expected to contest the tribunal's competence to try a former head of state in a case likely to last about a month.

The news came as Iraqi hospital sources announced a third day of fighting in the north-western town of Tal Afar, an alleged transit route for insurgents near Syria.

Hussein Trial In '82 Deaths Set To Begin Next Month (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, September 5, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Sept. 4 - The trial of Saddam Hussein will begin in six weeks, the government said Sunday, when he and seven aides face a special tribunal on charges of massacring almost 150 residents from the town of Dujail, the scene of a failed assassination attempt against Mr. Hussein 23 years ago.

Laith Kubba, a spokesman for the prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, said the trial would begin Oct. 19, four days after a national vote on a proposed new constitution. The trial raises the possibility that Mr. Hussein, who faces the death penalty if convicted, could be hanged within months.

Four days ago, Iraq carried out its first court-ordered execution since the fall of Mr. Hussein's government, hanging three people convicted in May in the southern city of Kut of rapes and killings.

Great efforts will be made to "ensure the transparency of the trial" of Mr. Hussein, Mr. Kubba said at a news conference.

"We should view this trial as a national event, and not just as a trial for Saddam on the killings he committed," he said.

Mr. Kubba said Mr. Hussein would be tried with seven associates, including Barzan Ibrahim, a half-brother of Mr. Hussein and a former top official of the Mukhabarat secret police, and Taha Yassin, who was vice chairman of the Baath Party's Revolutionary Command Council. The charges stem from the killing of 143 people and the imprisonment of hundreds of families after the assassination attempt in Dujail on July 8, 1982, he said.

After the failed attack on Mr. Hussein, Iraqi officials executed men and boys from Dujail, a largely Shiite town 35 miles north of Baghdad. Investigators for the special tribunal that will try Mr. Hussein have said another 1,500 Dujail residents were later ordered incarcerated in a prison in a desolate stretch of desert near the Saudi Arabian border.

One of the lawyers for Mr. Hussein's family contended Sunday that a trial so soon would give too little time to prepare an adequate defense, and he said he doubted that the trial would start by Oct. 19.

In an interview with The Associated Press, the lawyer, Abdel Haq Alani, said the trial date was the "wish of the ruling group in the Green Zone, but certainly not the court" - an allusion to the Iraqi government leaders who live in the heavily fortified compound in central Baghdad.

"We haven't been served an official notice about the date of trial," Mr. Alani told The A.P. "It was only a statement made by an Iraqi government official to the media, which absolutely has no value in the law."

The United States military said 13 insurgents were killed in heavy fighting on Sunday in the city of Tal Afar in northwestern Iraq, as troops from the Third Armored Cavalry Regiment continued efforts begun in May to take control of the city, where insurgents have controlled many neighborhoods since late last year.

Seven of the insurgents were killed by American helicopter fire after American troops were attacked with rocket-propelled grenades and machine guns fired from a mosque in Tal Afar, the military said.

Iraq to Reopen Embassy in Kuwait

CAIRO, Sept. 4 (AP) - Iraq plans to reopen its embassy in Kuwait within weeks, for the first time since it closed after Saddam Hussein ordered the invasion of Kuwait in 1990, Hoshyar Zebari, the Iraqi foreign minister, said Sunday.

"We reached the final agreement with the Kuwaiti government to resume our diplomatic activities and we will reopen our embassy within the few coming weeks," he said by telephone from Baghdad.

Asked if Kuwait would reopen its embassy in Baghdad in return, Mr. Zebari said the issue "is left to the Kuwaiti government itself and its estimation about the situation in Iraq."

Iraq and Kuwait have been working to normalize ties since the American-led invasion in 2003 that toppled Saddam Hussein.

Iraq May Forgo Multiple Trials If Hussein Is Convicted In First (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer, Washington Post Foreign Service

BAGHDAD, Sept. 4 -- The Iraqi government is considering waiving further proceedings against former president Saddam Hussein if he is convicted at his trial on charges stemming from the massacre of 143 Shiite Muslims in 1982, a senior spokesman said Sunday.

Hussein could face execution in that case. The trial is scheduled to begin Oct. 19.

The former president had been expected to face a dozen or more proceedings for alleged crimes committed by his government. But Laith Kubba, spokesman for interim Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari, said Sunday that if Hussein is convicted in the first case, any sentence is likely to be carried out as swiftly as possible.

"My guess is if the court passes judgment, it should be implemented without further delay," Kubba said. He added that it was not possible to forecast how long the trial would last.

The case concerns the aftermath of an attempt to assassinate Hussein in the northern town of Dujail in 1982. The government retaliated for the plot by killing at least 143 people and razing much of the town, the interim government says.

The Shiite-led interim government is believed to have chosen the case in part because of its narrow focus and the possibility of tracing the killings back to Hussein. Other accusations against him, including state-orchestrated massacres of thousands of Kurds and Shiites, are much broader.

"The charges against Saddam are so many. Regardless of how many years he is going to live, the charges and trials would not end," Kubba told reporters at a news conference.

Kubba said seven members of Hussein's government would face trial with him. They include Barazan Ibrahim, a former intelligence chief and Hussein's half brother; former vice president Taha Yassin Ramadan; and Awad Hamed Bandar, a former Baath Party official in Dujail.

Iraq's U.S.-led interim administration suspended capital punishment in 2003. But the country's interim leaders made reinstating it a priority and recently carried out the country's first executions in the post-Hussein era by hanging three men convicted of murder, kidnapping and rape.

Also Sunday, members of the Shiite-dominated interim National Assembly criticized Arab governments for what they said was a lackluster response to a stampede Wednesday in Baghdad that left hundreds of Shiite pilgrims dead.

The pilgrims were headed to a shrine and had crowded a bridge over the Tigris River when panic broke out. The official death toll from the incident stands at 1,005, the Reuters news service reported Sunday.

Shiite lawmakers contrasted the Arab world's response to the stampede with its offers of aid for victims of Hurricane Katrina in the United States.

"Why would Spain and other countries send us their condolences while these so-called Arab countries did not even say a word?" said Jalaladeen Sagheer, a cleric and leading lawmaker. He added that, in any case, words of sympathy from Arab states would be hollow.

Relations between Iraq and the Arab world have been edgy recently, particularly since the 22-member Arab League faulted the interim government for failing to specifically refer to Iraq as part of the Arab world in the country's draft constitution, which was submitted last month.

On Sunday, negotiators continued to work on a compromise over that designation.

Separately, Iraq's interim foreign minister, Hoshyar Zebari, told the Associated Press that Iraq intended to open its embassy in Kuwait in coming weeks for the first time since Hussein ordered the 1990 Kuwait invasion.

Asked whether Kuwait would reopen its embassy in Baghdad, Zebari said that decision would be "left to the Kuwaiti government itself and its estimation about the situation in Iraq."

Insurgents Assert Control Over Town Near Syrian Border (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And Jonathan Finer

BAGHDAD, Sept. 5 -- Fighters loyal to militant leader Abu Musab Zarqawi asserted control over the key Iraqi border town of Qaim on Monday, killing U.S. collaborators and enforcing strict Islamic law, according to tribal members, officials, residents and others in the town and nearby villages.

Residents said the foreign-led fighters controlled by Zarqawi, a Jordanian, apparently had been exerting authority in the town, within two miles of the Syrian border, since at least the start of the weekend. A sign posted at an entrance to the town declared, "Welcome to the Islamic Republic of Qaim."

In other developments Monday, the U.S. Army warned noncombatants to leave a portion of the northeastern city of Tall Afar ahead of an expected assault on an insurgent stronghold there. Car bombs and other political violence around Iraq killed at least 33 Iraqi civilians and security force members. A U.S. soldier and two British troops also were killed, officials said.

The report from Qaim, about 200 miles west of Baghdad, marked one of insurgents' boldest moves in their cat-and-mouse duels with U.S. Marines along the Euphrates River. U.S. forces have described border towns in the area as a funnel for foreign fighters, arms and money into Iraq from Syria.

Insurgents have occasionally made similar shows of force, such as the takeover of a Baghdad neighborhood for a few hours late last month by dozens of gunmen. They then slipped away, having made the point that they can muster men as well as plant bombs. The weekend takeover of Qaim extended already heavy insurgent pressure on the people there and came after the U.S. military said it had inflicted heavy bombing losses on foreign-led fighters.

Marines conducted heavy airstrikes in the past week on suspected insurgent safe houses in the area. Ground fighting has also been reported between Zarqawi's group and Sunni Arab tribes more open to the Iraqi government and U.S. military.

Capt. Jeffrey Pool, a Marine spokesman in Ramadi, capital of the western province that includes Qaim, said he had no word of unusual activity in Qaim. Marines are stationed just outside the town, and no Iraqi government forces are posted inside, Pool said.

Witnesses in Qaim said Zarqawi's fighters were killing officials and civilians whom they consider to be allied with the Iraqi and U.S. governments or anti-Islamic. On Sunday, the bullet-riddled body of a young woman dressed in her nightclothes lay in a street of Qaim. A sign left on her corpse declared, "A prostitute who was punished."

Zarqawi's fighters have shot and killed nine men in public executions in the city center since the start of the weekend, accusing the men of being collaborators with U.S. forces, said Sheik Nawaf Mahallawi, a leader of the Albu Mahal, a Sunni Arab tribe that had clashed earlier with the foreign fighters.

Dozens of families were fleeing Qaim every day, Mahallawi said.

For local fighters now, "it would be insane to attack Zarqawi's people, even to shoot one bullet at them," the tribal leader said. "We hope the U.S. forces end this in the coming days. We want the city to go back to its normal situation."

Many of the towns along the river have been subject to domination by foreign-led fighters, despite repeated Marine offensives in the area since May. Residents and Marines have described insurgents escaping ahead of such drives, and returning when the offensives end.

The U.S. attacks are credited with helping disrupt insurgent networks and reducing the number of car bombings and suicide attacks in the rest of Iraq.

U.S. and Iraqi officials in recent weeks have welcomed reports of local Sunni Arabs challenging the presence of foreign fighters. But the accounts from Qaim indicated a setback.

The Albu Mahal tribe remained in control of its village outside Qaim, residents said. However, a car bomb placed by Zarqawi's fighters killed a tribal leader, Dhyad Ahmed, and his son on Sunday, said a resident, Mijbil Saied.

Fighters loyal to Zarqawi openly patrolled the streets of Qaim with AK-47 assault rifles and grenade launchers. The fighters included both Iraqis and foreigners, including Afghans. They draped rooftops with Zarqawi's al Qaeda in Iraq banner of a yellow sun against a black background.

Residents said insurgents in recent weeks had begun enforcing strict Islamic law, burning shops that sold CDs and a beauty parlor, and lashing men accused of drinking alcohol. They said Zarqawi's fighters were killing government workers but had spared doctors and teachers.

Karim Hammad Karbouli, 46, said he had stood among small crowds of nervous residents watching the insurgents, waiting Sunday for his brother to come with a pickup truck so they could load up his household and leave. Karbouli said he feared both Zarqawi's fighters and U.S. bombs.

The director of the town's hospital has ordered patients to leave the facility, said Muhammed Ismail, a physician at the hospital. Zarqawi's fighters had taken control of the hospital, and the director feared it would come under U.S. attack, Ismail said.

In Tall Afar, U.S. and Iraqi soldiers entered the fourth day of an offensive against insurgents who have controlled large sections of the city for nearly a year. On Monday night, soldiers dropped leaflets from helicopters in the eastern neighborhood of Sarai, where commanders believe insurgents are entrenched, warning noncombatants to evacuate the area.

About 5,000 soldiers from the Army's 3rd Armored Reconnaissance Regiment and the Iraqi army's 3rd Division continued advancing toward Sarai from all directions, searching homes, confiscating weapons and interrogating residents.

Early Monday morning, six members of an elite U.S. special operations unit were wounded in what was to have been a raid on the home of a suspected insurgent leader, according to U.S. commanders. Members of the unit, which is charged with searching for high-level insurgents, and the Army in Tall Afar would not provide details.

Tall Afar, a city of more than 200,000 about 40 miles from the Syrian border, is considered a logistical hub for insurgents operating across the country.

A roadside bomb killed one soldier in the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment in Tall Afar on Monday, and two British troops were reported killed by another roadside bomb in southern Iraq.

In Baghdad, insurgents launched a dawn attack on the Interior Ministry, killing two police officers, officials said. Other political violence Monday in Baghdad killed at least 13 civilians, the Associated Press reported.

A roadside bomb and other attacks killed four oil workers associated with a northern oil company in Kirkuk. Insurgents have mounted frequent attacks to disrupt Iraq's oil exports.

Mortar fire hit a residential neighborhood in the central city of Baqubah, killing six civilians, said Ahmed Fouad, a hospital physician. Eight other civilians were killed by a car bomb in the western town of Hit, the AP said.

In ongoing political negotiations, President Jalal Talabani said in a statement that he and the other top Kurdish leader, Massoud Barzani, had agreed to changes in the draft constitution. The changes would ease concerns among Arab countries that the wording of the draft loosened Iraqi ties to the Arab world.

The language at issue describes Iraq as an Islamic -- but not Arab -- country, a concession to non-Arab Kurds, who form about 15 percent of the Iraqi population.

Militants Attack Interior Ministry (USAT/AP)

USA Today, September 6, 2005

BAGHDAD — Insurgents launched a daylight assault Monday on Iraq's Interior Ministry. Two police officers were killed and five were injured.

Thunderous explosions and volleys of heavy gunfire rattled downtown Baghdad soon after sunrise as about four carloads of insurgents staged a raid on the Interior Ministry, which is responsible for police and paramilitary units nationwide.

The insurgents, who fired automatic weapons and rocket-propelled grenades, withdrew after about 15 minutes. There was no report of insurgent casualties.

A statement posted Monday on an Islamic website claimed responsibility for the attack in the name of al-Qaeda in Iraq, led by Jordanian Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

Sunday, al-Qaeda's Iraq wing launched multiple attacks against U.S. and Iraqi targets in Hit, 85 miles west of Baghdad. The U.S. military and Iraqi government said Monday that 12 people, including eight civilians and three suicide bombers, died in Hit.

In Doha, Qatar, U.S. Central Command said U.S. jets launched airstrikes Sunday on insurgent positions near Balad, 50 miles north of Baghdad, dropping two bombs on a suspected insurgent staging area. The statement also said that an Air Force Predator aircraft fired two Hellfire missiles against a mortar firing position near Balad.

In southern Iraq, two British soldiers died when their armored Land Rover was destroyed by a bomb near Zubeir, a Sunni Arab enclave about 12 miles west of Basra. The deaths brought to 95 the number of British military personnel killed in Iraq.

U.S. and Iraqi officials had hoped Iraq's new constitution, which goes to voters in a referendum Oct. 15, would help lure Sunni Arabs away from the insurgency.

However, Sunni negotiators rejected the draft constitution and vowed to defeat it in the referendum. About 1,500 people, mostly Sunnis, rallied Monday near the Sunni city of Ramadi to protest the document.

Iraq's president said Monday that he and Massood Barzani, head of the Kurdistan Democratic Party, had agreed to changes in the draft constitution to address concerns that wording loosened Iraqi ties to the Arab world. The language at issue describes Iraq as an Islamic — but not Arab country — a concession to the non-Arab Kurds who form about 15% of the Iraqi population.

President Jalal Talabani said he and Barzani agreed “to accept some amendments deemed vital for the Islamic and Arab worlds concerning the Arab League because Iraq is a founding member in the Arab League.” Talabani did not specify the changes.

Talabani also expressed frustration that no Arab government has designated an ambassador to Iraq.

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- Insurgents launched a daring daylight assault Monday against the Interior Ministry in Baghdad, killing two police in a surge of attacks by al-Qaida's arm in Iraq. Two British soldiers died in a roadside bombing in the south.

U.S. Marines said Monday that al-Qaida in Iraq launched multiple attacks the day before against U.S. and Iraqi targets in Hit, 85 miles west of Baghdad. Eight civilians, an Iraqi soldier and three suicide bombers died in the Hit attacks

Elsewhere, at least eight Iraqi civilians _ including five children _ were killed in fighting Monday in Tal Afar, said Dr. Abdul-Aal Kamal of the northern city's hospital.

There was no report of casualties among the combatants, including the U.S. 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment, which is trying to wrest control of Tal Afar, 260 miles north of Baghdad, from insurgents and foreign fighters.

However, Iraqi authorities said the bodies of three community leaders who had refused insurgent demands for help were found Monday in the city. Iraqi officers said gunmen swept through the victims' districts over the weekend as fighting around the city escalated.

In Baghdad, thunderous explosions and volleys of heavy gunfire rattled the downtown area soon after sunrise Monday as about four carloads of insurgents staged a lightning raid on the Interior Ministry, which is responsible for police and paramilitary units nationwide.

The insurgents, who fired automatic weapons and rocket-propelled grenades, withdrew after about 15 minutes, leaving two policemen dead and five wounded. There was no report of insurgent casualties.

A statement posted Monday on an Islamic Web site claimed responsibility for the attack in the name of al-Qaida in Iraq, led by Jordanian terror mastermind Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

U.S. Apache and Black Hawk helicopters flew over central Baghdad after the firefight, and U.S. Army patrols in armored vehicles combed the streets looking for the attackers.

The two British soldiers died when their armored Land Rover was destroyed by a bomb near Zubeir, a Sunni Arab enclave about 12 miles west of Basra.

Elsewhere, Iraqi officials said that al-Qaida-linked foreign fighters had taken control of large areas of a strategic city on the Syrian border after weeks of fighting between an Iraqi tribe that supports the insurgents and one that opposes them.

The officials, speaking on condition of anonymity for fear of reprisal, said much of Qaim, 200 miles west of Baghdad, had been abandoned after weeks of tribal fighting.

U.S. Marines operate around Qaim but have privately complained they don't have enough American or Iraqi forces to secure the area properly.

The attacks in the Hit area began Sunday morning when two suicide car bombs exploded at security barricades on the northwest side of town, a Marine statement said.

Shortly afterward, a vehicle car bomb exploded on the Hit bridge across the Euphrates River, rendering it impassable, the Marines said.

The Marine statement said three insurgents and one Iraqi soldier died in the Sunday attacks. The government in Baghdad said eight civilians also died.

In Doha, Qatar, the U.S. Central Command said U.S. jets launched airstrikes Sunday on insurgent positions near Balad, 50 miles north of Baghdad, dropping two 500-pound bombs against an insurgent staging area.

The statement also said an Air Force Predator aircraft fired two Hellfire missiles against a mortar firing position near Balad.

Also Monday, gunmen seized one of the sons of the governor of insurgent infested Anbar province, Mamoun Sami Rashid al-Alwani, officials said on condition of anonymity for fear of insurgent reprisal. The abduction occurred in the provincial capital of Ramadi west of Baghdad.

U.S. and Iraqi officials had hoped the new constitution, which goes to the voters in a referendum Oct. 15, would in time help pacify the insurgency by luring Sunni Arabs from the movement.

However, Sunni negotiators rejected the constitution and vowed to defeat it in the referendum. The bitter, protracted negotiations appeared to have raised tensions among the country's ethnic and religious communities.

About 1,500 people, mostly Sunnis, rallied Monday near the Sunni city of Ramadi to protest the draft charter.

On Monday, Iraq's president said he and the other top Kurdish leader had agreed to changes in the draft constitution to mollify concerns among Arab countries that the wording in the charter loosened Iraqi ties to the Arab world.

The language at issue describes Iraq as an Islamic _ but not Arab country _ a concession to the non-Arab Kurds who form about 15 percent of the Iraqi population.

In a statement released by his office, Jalal Talabani said he and Massood Barzani agreed "to accept some amendments deemed vital for the Islamic and Arab worlds concerning the Arab League because Iraq is a founding member in the Arab League."

Talabani did not specify what changes in the language had been agreed to by him and Barzani, head of the Kurdistan Democratic Party.

Some Iraqi officials said last week that the changes could keep the description of Iraq as an Islamic state but add wording about Iraq having been a founding member of the Arab League. Sunni Arab negotiators said at the time that such language might satisfy the Arab League but not them.

As U.S. Tries To Secure An Iraqi Town, Insurgents Respond (NYT)

By Michael Moss

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

FARIS, Iraq - The American military recently moved into this small town 10 miles south of Falluja, one of the most violent locales in Iraq, to secure it for the coming elections, and the insurgents took all of a day to respond. They fired a rocket that missed the Americans and landed instead in a nearby playground, killing a 12-year-old boy and wounding eight other children.

"We were playing football," Ahmed Hamad Ali, also 12, said from his hospital bed the next day. "They made a big bombing."

Some residents are directing their anger not at the insurgents but at the marines, whose arrival, they say, drew the attack.

"They are like two people chasing each other," Baha Abbod, 28, a teacher.

It is hardly an unknown reaction in Iraq, where many civilians have been killed and wounded in cross-fire. But the military is bracing for a surge of situations like this one as American and Iraqi forces race to establish security for the referendum on the new Iraqi constitution to be held on Oct. 15.

"Security preparations in support of the referendum are under way throughout Iraq," said Brig. Gen. Donald Alston, a military spokesman in Baghdad.

The Marine operation was created to re-establish the presence of the Iraqi police in this town and a nearby village, Ameriya, which sits on the Euphrates River south of Falluja. The area is dominated by Sunni Arabs, who have balked at joining the Kurds and most Shiite factions in accepting the proposed constitution.

Faris and Ameriya have been without police officers since February, when the police force collapsed in the face of withering attacks by insurgents, who then used the communities as safe havens from which to mount their attacks, Marine officers said, and to intimidate civilians.

The roads from Falluja to Faris are pockmarked by craters left by makeshift bombs - improvised explosive devices, in military jargon - and on the wall at one checkpoint a scrawl in black paint urges American troops to stay alert: "Someone out there wants to kill you. Are you going to give them the chance?"

A few minutes after driving past the sign, Sgt. Tim Lawson, 24, from Shaver Lake, Calif., swerved his armored Humvee onto the shoulder as he pointed across the road to an upturned chunk of asphalt. "There's a possible I.E.D. there," he said.

Faris started out as a planned community built in the 1980's to house 30,000 engineers and others who worked in nearby munitions factories; those have been converted to construction facilities.

The marines set up headquarters in an abandoned building here and in a new house in Ameriya. For a few days they worked with no air-conditioning in 115-degree heat, with little running water and exposure to higher buildings nearby. They surrounded their buildings with giant dirt-filled wire mesh containers called Hescos and posted lookouts on the roofs.

A contingent of newly trained Iraqi troops is with the marines, building patrol experience, and they appeared poised and enthusiastic in their new uniforms and American-made body armor.

"Psst," Mustafa Kamil, 24, one of the Iraqi team leaders, said to another soldier as they moved through Ameriya in a staggered formation. "Replace me here, quickly."

He was a soldier in Saddam Hussein's army, earning about $2 a month in dinars, and after a spell cleaning streets during the start of the war, he joined the new Iraqi Army in April of last year. As an officer, he earns more than $300 a month.

He said he worried that the 24 Iraqi soldiers who had arrived in Ameriya would not be able to hold the area when the marines left. Ultimately, the marines say, they want to turn these communities over to the Iraqi police, who may face the greatest danger. Perhaps as a warning, insurgents bombed the empty police station in Ameriya.

The marines say they feel welcome in Faris and Ameriya, compared with the hostility they sensed in some other Iraqi locales where they established camps. Cpl. Brian Andrews, 24, from Austin, Tex., said the townsfolk were "very accepting of the coalition forces, at least to the naked eye."

But the rocket attack, which struck on the last weekend of August, devastated many in Faris.

Younis H. Johan, assistant director of the town's hospital, said the rocket had killed Omar Muaid, 12, whose chest and abdomen had been ripped open by the blast. He died 10 minutes after arriving at the hospital. Eight others were wounded, four of them significantly, Mr. Johan said.

"We had casualties before, but during the last month, when U.S. troops came to the area, there has started to be more," he said. "I expect a rise, pressure on the hospital."

Mr. Abbod, the teacher, says that residents who have family elsewhere will leave until the situation improves, and that even some grim places now seem attractive. His neighbor, he said, has gone to Falluja.

At the town's hospital on Aug. 29 , a Marine captain visited one of the boys wounded in the attack and vowed to find the insurgents who had fired the rocket. But as the boy's father, Qutaiba Fajir, 42, a officer in the Iraqi Army, watched the Marine officer walk from the room, he said, "We hope they leave."

Leader Says Other Arabs Are Insensitive To Iraq's Plight (NYT)

By Robert F. Worth

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Sept. 5 - In an unusual public rebuke, President Jalal Talabani angrily criticized other Arab states on Monday, saying they had insulted Iraq by not sending diplomats to Baghdad and had not sent condolence letters about the stampede last week in which almost 1,000 Shiite pilgrims were killed.

Mr. Talabani spoke just after two dozen insurgents staged a brazen dawn raid on the heavily guarded offices of the Interior Ministry in Baghdad, killing two police officers and wounding five. Two British soldiers were also killed by a roadside bomb in southern Iraq.

Speaking at a news conference, Mr. Talabani, a Kurd, amplified complaints by other Iraqi leaders about the Arab states' failure to recognize the stampede, which caused the highest one-day death toll since the American-led invasion. The complaints, aimed at mostly Sunni leaders, hinted at a sectarian bias against Iraq, where Shiites are about 60 percent of the population.

"We stood with our Arab brothers in their hard times," Mr. Talabani said. "For instance, we sent a letter expressing our condolences on the terrorist attack which claimed a lot of innocent lives in Sharm el Sheik," an Egyptian resort.

Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, a Shiite, hinted at similar criticism on Monday when asked about the emir of Qatar, Sheik Hamad bin Khalifa al-Thani, who donated $100 million to the American victims of Hurricane Katrina but nothing to the victims of the stampede. "I'm not condemning what he did, but he should think of Iraq," Mr. Jaafari said.

The comments by Mr. Talabani and Mr. Jaafari came at a time of heightened tension with other Arab nations. Last week Amr Moussa, the secretary general of the Arab League, issued a public criticism of Iraq's new constitution - largely written by Shiites and Kurds - in which he echoed the criticisms by some Sunni Arabs in Iraq. The Sunnis have opposed two provisions in particular: one that would form largely autonomous federal regions, and one that describes Iraq as an Islamic country but not an Arab one.

Some Iraqi leaders asked why Mr. Moussa was willing to denounce the new draft constitution now, after the Arab League had been notably silent about Iraq's lack of a constitution under Saddam Hussein.

Mr. Talabani also said the two major Kurdish political parties had agreed to support Sunni demands for language in the constitution declaring Iraq an Arab nation. Although the charter was presented to the legislature last week, there have been recent talks aimed at making final revisions that might win Sunni support.

If the document is not modified, some leading Sunni Arabs have said, they will organize a campaign to defeat it in a national referendum, planned for Oct. 15.

A delegation of Sunni Arab leaders visited the Kurdish region on Monday to discuss the constitution and the Kurds' role in future elections, Mr. Talabani said.

Mr. Talabani also complained about the lack of Arabic diplomatic representation in Baghdad, calling it "an insulting issue for the country." Iraq and the United States have urged other Arab countries to send diplomats here, in hopes that the gesture would bolster the Iraqi government's legitimacy and undermine support for the insurgency.

But risk is also clearly an issue. In July, two Algerian diplomats and an Egyptian diplomat were abducted and killed by insurgents. Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, the terrorist group led by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, claimed responsibility , and has threatened to kill any Arab diplomat in Baghdad.

The attack in Baghdad on Monday began at 6:30 a.m., when four black BMW sedans raced up to a checkpoint outside the Interior Ministry, officials said. Firing belt-fed machine guns and rocket-propelled grenades, the group of about two dozen insurgents fought the ministry guards for 15 minutes before driving away. American Black Hawk and Apache helicopters could be seen flying over central Baghdad for hours afterward as American foot patrols hunted for the attackers.

Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia took responsibility for the attack in a statement posted on Islamist Web sites.

The two British soldiers were killed when a bomb detonated near their patrol in southern Iraq, British officials said. The bombing took place in Zubayr, a town just south of Basra that is a stronghold for Sunni Arab militants and was the site of many earlier attacks.

Fighting continued near Tal Afar, in the north, where American and Iraqi troops had begun a sweep for insurgents on Friday. Residents said mortar attacks could be heard on the city's outskirts.

Mohsin Qabagh, 40, a car mechanic from Tal Afar, described it as "a city of ghosts, where all signs of life have stopped and the residents have fled to other towns."

In other violence, gunmen driving through a Shiite neighborhood in western Baghdad opened fire on a group of bystanders on Monday evening, killing three and wounding three, Interior Ministry officials said. The motive for the attack was not clear.

West of the capital, in Falluja, Iraq's finance minister was attacked by insurgents armed with grenades as he drove through the center of town in a convoy. An Iraqi police officer was wounded, but the minister escaped unscathed.

United States military officials also announced Monday that they had captured Ayad Adnan Away Samir, a Falluja-based fighter and senior aide to the insurgent leader Sheik Abdullah al-Janabi.

Annan: War Spread Terrorism (WT)

By From combined dispatches

The Washington Times, September 6, 2005

LONDON -- The U.S.-led invasion of Iraq has turned the country into a new hub of terrorism worse than Afghanistan under the Taliban, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said yesterday.

Mr. Annan also said in an interview with the British Broadcasting Corp. that he expected to face blame over the Iraqi oil-for-food program when investigators deliver a report this week.

Hours before he spoke, carloads of Iraqi insurgents staged an audacious daylight assault against the Interior Ministry in Baghdad, killing two policemen before escaping.

Mr. Annan told BBC World Service radio that the war was contributing to Muslim anger throughout the world.

"I think there are many Muslims that are extremely unhappy today. Unhappy because they feel victimized, they feel isolated, they feel victimized in their own society, they feel victimized in the West, and they feel this profiling against them. And the Iraqi situation has not helped matters," he said.

"In fact, one used to be worried about Afghanistan being the center of terrorist activities. My sense is that Iraq has become a major problem, and in fact, it's worse than Afghanistan," he said.

Regarding the oil-for-food investigation, Mr. Annan said he believed chief investigator Paul Volcker would criticize him and others involved in the $64 billion program.

"I suspect that there will be lots of criticism [for] myself as chief admin officer, probably something on the [supervisory] committee, the Security Council, the government of Iraq," he said. "When it comes to Iraq, on this issue, no one is entirely covered in glory."

Mr. Volcker, a former U.S. Federal Reserve chairman is expected to deliver a major report on the program tomorrow.

"Oil for food was an extra program we were asked to undertake. Honestly, I wish we were never given that program, and I wish the U.N. would never be asked to take that kind of a program again," Mr. Annan said.

In Baghdad yesterday, thunderous explosions and volleys of heavy gunfire rattled the downtown area soon after sunrise as about four carloads of insurgents staged a raid on the Interior Ministry, which is responsible for police and paramilitary units nationwide.

The insurgents, who fired automatic weapons and rocket-propelled grenades, withdrew after about 15 minutes, leaving two policemen dead and five wounded. There was no report of insurgent casualties.

A statement posted on an Islamic Web site claimed responsibility for the attack in the name of al Qaeda in Iraq, led by a Jordanian terrorist Abu Musab Zarqawi.

U.S. Marines said the same group had conducted multiple attacks the day before against U.S. and Iraqi targets in Hit, 85 miles west of Baghdad. Eight civilians, an Iraqi soldier and three suicide bombers died in the Hit attacks

Elsewhere, at least eight Iraqi civilians -- including five children -- were killed in fighting yesterday in Tal Afar, said Abdul-Aal Kamal of the northern city's hospital.

Bush Makes Better Case For Iraq War, But Needs Troops (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, September 6, 2005

President Bush has made an important shift as he tries to bolster public support for the Iraq war, moving from idealism to a hard national security argument. He needs to stress the new message more.

Unpopular though the idea may be, he may also have to increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq in order to have any hope of defeating the insurgency.

And, for sure, he has to get the Pentagon to stop talking about drawing down U.S. troop levels next year and get with Bush's own program: The United States stays until Iraq is secure.

Bush's new public case for Iraq was unveiled Aug. 24 in Idaho and repeated in his V-J Day anniversary speech six days later in San Diego.

Both speeches contained the familiar assertions that Iraq is a key front in the war on terrorism and that the best way to fight terrorism is to bring democracy to that country and the rest of the Middle East.

In the past, those arguments — plus optimistic reports on training of Iraqi security forces and political progress — have failed to arrest a sharp drop-off in public support for the war.

As a writer for National Review Online, Andrew C. McCarthy correctly puts it: "The American people did not go to war for the goal of advancing freedom. ... [They] went to war to protect the national security of the United States from current and gathering threats which they understood after Sept. 11, 2001, could no longer responsibly be waited out.

"What the American people care about is defeating militant Islam. ... They know that leaving when terrorism runs rampant would be a victory for militant Islam. It would encourage our enemies toward more terrorism."

That's essentially the case Bush made in the recent speeches, emphasizing the stakes involved for the United States and what will happen if the insurgency succeeds in Iraq.

"During the last few decades, the terrorists grew to believe that if they hit America hard, as in Lebanon and Somalia, America would retreat and back down," he said in Idaho.

"Before Sept. 11, Osama Bin Laden said that an attack could make America run in less than 24 hours. So now they are trying to break our will with acts of violence. They'll kill women and children, knowing that the images of their brutality will horrify civilized people."

He should have added, "And they and the followers of Saddam Hussein are killing American soldiers in hopes that the death toll will undermine support for the war here at home."

But he did say, "Their goal is to force us to retreat. See, they have a strategy. They want us to retreat so they can topple governments in the Middle East and turn that region into a safe haven for terrorism."

In San Diego, he said that "if Zarqawi and Bin Laden gain control of Iraq, they would create a new training ground for future terrorist attacks. They'd seize oil fields to fund their ambitions, they could recruit more terrorists by claiming a historic victory over the United States and our coalition."

Bush might have added — and should add in future speeches — that "if the United States is driven out of Iraq, our leadership role in the world will be sorely shaken. Adversaries will be emboldened. Friends will be discouraged. Our ability to persuade fence-sitters will be impaired on a broad range of issues."

It's doubtful that the new message has taken hold in the public's mind yet, but polls indicate that public disapproval of the war and Bush's policy in Iraq may have bottomed out.

Despite increased U.S. casualties and the massive publicity garnered by war protester Cindy Sheehan, the latest Gallup poll shows that support for her position — an immediate U.S. pullout — has fallen from 33 percent to 26 percent.

The Washington Post/ABC News poll showed that only 13 percent hold that position and that a majority of 56 percent supports increasing U.S. forces (21 percent) or keeping current levels (35 percent).

Support for Bush could get a boost if Iraqi voters approve the country's new constitution Oct. 15, but it's likely to be as temporary as it was after the Jan. 30 elections.

What Bush policy needs is progress in defeating the insurgency — and to get that, he may well need to increase U.S. forces.

A Bush supporter I trust who has made multiple visits to Iraq is convinced that Iraqi security forces are unlikely to be able to contain the insurgency for the foreseeable future and, as matters now stand, the United States is losing ground to the insurgents.

This official says that combined U.S. and Iraqi forces are capable of driving insurgents out of cities such as Fallujah or Ramadi, but don't have the manpower to hold them — so Saddamists and jihadists return and kill or intimidate those who "collaborated" with us.

This point of view has been compellingly confirmed on the ground by Knight-Ridder correspondent Tom Lasseter, who has been embedded with U.S. Marines and Army units in Sunni-dominated Anbar province.

On Aug. 25, Lasseter reported that "in Fallujah, a city that Marines and soldiers retook from insurgents last November in the heaviest urban combat since Vietnam, [insurgent] fighters have begun to return and renew their intimidation campaign."

He quoted one Marine colonel as saying, "I don't think of this in terms of winning" and another as saying, "if you go into an area and you don't stay in that area, the insurgents will return and intimidate the local population."

Lasseter quoted one platoon commander who said, "There's no way I can control this area with the men I have." American officers said it would take "years of preparation" for Iraqi forces to take over.

But there's total confusion, based on statements from various top commanders, about whether American troop levels will increase, decrease or stay the same. For a time, the Pentagon even tried to abandon Bush's declaration of a "global war on terror" and replace it with "global struggle against violent extremism."

Bush put the kibosh on that. He continues to make it clear that America is at war. What he must do now is make it unmistakable to the American people what the stakes of the war are and provide adequate forces to win it.

An Uncertain Dawn On A Scarred Street (WP)

BAGHDAD Last of three parts

On June 23, 2005, a war more than two years old arrived at the busy commercial district of Karrada, where Amal Salman, now 16, lived with her family.

DOJ_NMG_0002567

For months, hardly a day had passed without a car bomb somewhere in Iraq; the scenes unleashed in Karrada by the explosion at 7 a.m. were so familiar as to have become routine. Twisted wreckage smoldered, its acrid smoke mingling with the stench of seared flesh. Water cascaded over the fires, then, turning black, mixed with pools of blood. Shattered glass danced along the buckling asphalt like a hailstorm.

Left in the bomb's wake were the ruins of the Abdel-Rasul Ali Mosque, a neighborhood place of worship entered through wooden doors graced by a blue, floral-tiled portico and decorated by calligraphy invoking God, Muhammad and Imam Ali. In quieter months, under lazy fans and chandeliers, Amal, her mother and sisters had gathered there to celebrate the religious holidays of Shiite Muslims.

"I woke up terrorized by the powerful explosion, with my heart beating fast, fearing that someone might have died or been wounded," Amal wrote in her journal that day.

With her sisters and mother, she clambered onto the balcony of their three-room apartment. Surprisingly quickly, police had arrived, vainly trying to direct dazed bystanders, some of their faces frozen in the blank stares of shock. From the third floor, Amal heard the shouts of others -- cries of anger and, more frequently, helplessness.

Minutes later, in a tactic that had become more and more common those days, another car bomb detonated, then another, all along her street as Amal watched. Before the spasm ended, four in all exploded, killing 17 people and hurting many more.

"For a moment, I thought I had died," Amal wrote in a long entry. "Then I realized I was not dead, but I was so scared. In a moment the police car was burned and those inside it were dead, burned. A young man who had only recently announced his engagement died, along with a good old man who lives in the neighborhood, named Abu Karrar, and Khalil the Kurd, who owns a shop in one of the small shopping centers here."

Since she had begun keeping her diary in 2003, Amal had witnessed the events of a lifetime: an invasion and the only government she knew toppled in a few weeks; an occupation; promises of prosperity and the disappointment that followed; an insurgency and the specter of civil war. That Thursday morning was the first time she had seen death.

"It was a true disaster which I will never forget as long as I live. Total destruction, not only in the Karrada district, but inside me, my family and among our neighbors," she wrote. "I was really in pain over this scene which I hope no one would ever have to see."

Residents sometimes remark that Baghdad is cursed by how little is ordinary. It is a city that Karima, Amal's mother, calls forsaken, tempered perhaps only by its resilience -- the city's best and, in these days, most valuable trait. On a hot summer day, as a sandstorm cast the capital in a sickly glow, Amal recovered from the latest disaster. She helped care for her sister, Hibba, whose right arm was torn by flying debris. She traded gossip with neighbors about who lived and who died. She watched police clear the streets, then saw the Americans arrive. A military truck brought bottles of water; people lined up to receive them.

"It was a scene that was hard to describe, as if the Iraqis were beggars standing in line in a humiliating way," she wrote. "During the dispensing of the water bottles, the American woman soldier gave a camera to the translator to take a few pictures."

By nightfall, the dead were buried, carried to their graves in funeral processions.

"Women were crying," Amal wrote, "and many people with grief on their face seemed bewildered and unable to understand why so many people have to die."Coping With Hardship

Amal had turned 16 on March 23, her hair still pulled back in a ponytail. But she looked older, having passed abruptly to adulthood from an abbreviated adolescence.

Her sisters, too, wore the years of hardship. The twins, Hibba and Duaa, were now 14. Hibba wore a hijab over her hair, while Duaa braided hers. During the invasion, they had been friendly, even effervescent, eager to show off their Koranic recitation, chants for Saddam Hussein and snippets of elementary school English. With their faces and bodies no longer boyish, tradition now dictated that they keep a distance from men.

Fatima, at 18 the oldest, had long ago left school to help Karima, a widow, raise the children. In the time since then, her literacy had faded, as had some of her confidence.

Zainab, the quietest and most beautiful of the girls, had married in the spring at 17. Her husband, Ali, had been a police officer, earning $300 a month. In July, though, he received the leaflet that so many of his colleagues dreaded: a death threat from shadowy insurgents. "They told him either you quit or we'll kill your wife," Amal recalled. He quit.

A year before, Karima had finally found work as a maid at the Palm Hotel, since renamed the Rawabi, cleaning eight rooms from 8 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. In a racket of sorts, the local employment agency took a third of her wages. That left her with about $33 a month.

Ali, 22, a former soldier and Karima's oldest son, had secured a job, too. He was now serving tea in a nearby real estate office, working from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. He made about a dollar a day, "depending on the baksheesh ," or tips. His younger brother, Mohammed, 20, was long without work. A ne'er-do-well, he spent most of his time prowling the streets; even his family suspected he was up to no good. Mahmoud, at 11 the youngest, sold soft drinks in the street during summer. At his best, he could bring in nearly $2 a day. Already, the time outside had given him a precocious street sense.

With the exception of Mohammed, their trials had brought them closer; as their city collapsed, they looked inward, their isolation a source for their strength.

"My family is my country," Amal said.

The words that danced that summer across Baghdad's landscape, a panorama washed of color by the sun and time, were almost always confusing.

Billboards along highways with heaps of trash marketed the mobile phones of Asia Cell. "Now your voice is heard," they declared. Another pictured a fingerprint, the hoped-for symbol of the January election, when voters dipped their index fingers in dye to certify they cast ballots. "Iraq," it intoned. Those faded posters were now dusty, some of them torn. Graffiti on a dirty wall in the capital's Sadr City slum spoke to the present: "You traitors, we don't want elections, we want electricity." In Amal's neighborhood, another poster, its meaning ambiguous, suggested the past: "Today is the same as yesterday."

"Today was quiet, and no one spoke about anything except electricity, which comes only for short times," Amal wrote in her entry on July 4. "Water is not available because the terrorists are targeting water pumping plants every day. The rich can live outside Iraq very comfortably, but the poor who can't have to stay suffering."

As they had during the war, Amal and her sisters still filled buckets of water each day from a leaky faucet in the courtyard, then lugged them up two flights of stairs. The summer before, her family sometimes had as many as 12 hours a day of electricity -- cycles of two on, two off. For an entire week in June this year, they had just two hours. It was one hour a day for stretches in July. In August, it had doubled to two hours.

As they sat in the dark on one sweltering day, the lights flickered on. "God's prayers on Muhammad and the family of Muhammad!" they shouted, with weary smiles. In 10 minutes, the lights dimmed again. "Is this real?" Karima asked, shaking her head.

In one of the bedrooms, a visiting Zainab was gathering blankets from the floor, where Karima's five daughters had slept together. From the kitchen, Amal brought in tea and a single fried egg. The others shared this, along with Iraqi bread known as samoun .

Their conversation that morning turned to money, then to their lack of it. Neighbors had purchased a small generator, but a share of its power was expensive: $10 a month, along with $1.50 a day for the fuel. The Karrada bombing had damaged the nerves in Hibba's right forearm; she could no longer grip a pencil. A doctor's appointment cost $5, and physical therapy ran $2 a day. Given the family's budget, they would let her try to heal on her own. The money would go instead to put the youngest daughters through school.'Death Is All We Hear'

Like many in Iraq over nearly three years, Amal's family was locked in a cycle of moments of optimism, followed by long months of brutality and dejection. There were turning points -- Hussein's fall, the formal end of the U.S. occupation in 2004 -- and Iraqis often greeted them with anticipation and hope. Disappointment typically followed. One of those turning points was the election in January, when Karima, Ali, Mohammed and Fatima defied insurgent threats and walked cheerfully to the polling station.

"I regret that I went to the elections and voted," Karima said seven months later, as she sat with Amal and her sisters over breakfast. "What did we elect? Nothing."

"If we voted or didn't vote, it's still the same thing," said Fatima, her oldest daughter and most pessimistic. "If the Americans want to do something, they'll do it."

Karima nodded, her veiled head cast to the ground. It was a gesture that seemed to mean: What more can be said? Her city was mahjura -- forsaken or abandoned.

"I feel sorry for Baghdad," she said softly.

In the worst days of the invasion, Karima once said something as Amal and her sisters sat around her. "It's like we're part of a play on a stage," she said, her voice reflective. "Life's not good, it's not bad. It's just a play."

As Iraq entered a third year of war, those words acknowledging her powerlessness seemed to take on new meaning. The script was already written. People like Karima sat as spectators, watching a performance.

Violence, now mundane, was reshaping their lives. Its pervasiveness was breeding distrust and fear as amorphous as Hussein's repression was pervasive.

"While I was downstairs, my brother Mahmoud came and said the road was blocked. Everyone was asking why and some said they had arrested terrorists," Amal wrote on July 5. "The truth however was that police had found a bag, and at first thought there was a bomb inside it, but in fact they found a girl of 16 years -- dead, beheaded, and naked. She was thrown on the street, inside a bag, raped by someone unknown."

"Death is all we hear in the news everyday," she wrote in another entry, a few pages later. "Death, slaughter, murder, kidnappings and robberies. Nobody knows why."

At times in the summer, Amal's street would assume a veneer of normalcy. Lines of cars still stretched miles from gas stations. But markets along the sun-soaked sidewalk overflowed with goods piled on rickety stands: socks imported from China and T-shirts from Syria. Down the street were children's toys. There was a "Super Mega Heavy Metal Fighter" action figure and a doll that, when squeezed, played "It's a Small World."

In the family's apartment, though, the daily mayhem cast a long shadow. Weeks after the Karrada bombing, Amal and her siblings recalled its scenes in almost photographic detail.

"The dead have become cheap," Mahmoud, the 11-year-old, said dispassionately.

He recalled one piece of burning shrapnel that sliced through five people. Abu Karrar, he remembered, stumbled across the street, his shirt bloodied. Then he died. A bone of Abbas Rubaie's leg flared through his pants. The flesh of another neighbor's arm was seared off. A car's engine, the boy said, fell on top of a corpse.

"Only the best people die," Mahmoud said. "They always pick the best fruit."

In her diary, Amal recounted the police raids that followed, as officers forced their way into apartments and searched for suspects. She and her sisters watched passively, in silence. Two people were arrested; neighbors said they were innocent, "poor laborers at a soap factory." More raids ensued that summer, sometimes every few days.

"God knows who is telling the truth or not these days," Amal wrote in July. "No one has trust in anybody else, whether the police, the National Guard or even our own folks."Liberation and Contradiction

In 2004, a year after the invasion, Amal had sat with her mother, confused about occupation and liberation, unsure about the fortunes of her country. Some blamed the Americans for their plight, she said then; others blamed Hussein, or even the Iraqis themselves.

At the time, Amal shook her head. "I don't know what to say," she confessed.

Another year on, though, Amal was no longer the young girl who parroted the hollow slogans of Hussein's state and, as it crumbled, directed prayers to God. She no longer deferred to her sisters, formulating her tentative opinions but often too shy to deliver them. The conflict around her had become more than a simple struggle to survive. Karima, her mother, now listened to her, as did her sisters. They might disagree with her, but they witnessed in Amal liberation measured in the most personal of terms: She saw for herself.

"All the government officials say, 'What do I want,' " her sister Fatima said one afternoon in August. "They don't care about the people. They don't care about the nation."

Amal interrupted her. "I feel like it's going to change," she countered.

The girls sat together in the apartment, where iconography had proliferated over the months. More posters had gone up of Shiite saints, placid portraits. A blue porcelain plate still hung. "God," it read simply. The electricity was on, and the dank stairwell was lit. Inside, enough sun filtered through the window, and the girls left the lights off.

DOJ_NMG_0002570

"The intervention of the Americans in Iraq has brought about the biggest revolution the world has ever seen," Amal insisted.

"It's an occupation," her older sister answered.

"Did the Americans change the regime or not?" Amal said.

She was speaking neither in support nor opposition; she was simply reflecting fact. She didn't try to reconcile contradictions; she understood there were ambiguities.

"It's an occupation," Fatima answered again. "When the Americans move, we have to stop in the streets. We have to pull over. If we don't stop, they'll hit us. It's our country. Why do we have to stop for them? We should be giving the orders."

"It's going to get better and better," Amal countered confidently. "This is just my opinion," she said, "and I'll say my opinion freely."

"The people who died, did it get better for them?" Fatima asked, a little frustrated.

Amal turned her palms up and smiled.

She talked about the insurgency. Guerrillas fighting American troops in the western province of Anbar were honorable, she said. "I respect them, but it's not resistance to kill someone working for the Americans. That's not what we call resistance."

"The American presence has positives and negatives, but it was a revolution," she said. Amal pointed her finger at her older sister. "It changed the regime. We don't say it's all good now. We don't say it's all positive. But we hope, we hope."

Occasionally in her diary and more often in conversations, Amal speaks of what she calls the contradiction -- pessimism and hope, sentiments seemingly irreconcilable.

In that contradiction is perhaps one of the truths of her city: Baghdad, its residents often say, deserves better, and they mourn the perpetual loss of the most fabled Arab capital. Resilience, a truly Iraqi quality in its defiance, somehow propels it forward.

"There's no answer to our problems. If you look for one, there is none," Amal said. Her family had turned quiet, listening. "The situation is bad. It's true, it's really bad. It's true that every day is worse than the one before. But we don't ever want to be hopeless.

"I always want to leave something for tomorrow," she went on. "The sun will set today, but it always rises again. Everything rises again. Even without life, there is hope."

She stopped for a moment and smiled at the attention the others were paying her.

"I don't know how to express it," she said softly, "but I understand it."

In The Realm Of War, Words Don't Fail An Iraq Veteran From New Jersey (NYT)

By Tina Kelley

WHEN his world feels torn apart, José Díaz puts words together.

He writes a line about the night in Iraq when his captain lay wounded on the ground with no life in his eyes: "No answer could be given; the shrapnel could not tell us why we bleed."

By describing his reality, his descriptions affirm it somehow. War, he writes, "is easy enough to leave physically, but almost impossible to depart emotionally."

Mr. Díaz , 35, who came to the United States from Cuba on the Mariel boatlift in 1980, has written a poem included in "Voices in Wartime" (Whit Press, 2005), an anthology that explores the experience of war through literature.

Mr. Díaz , an information technology manager for a New Jersey chemical company, lives in Rutherford, N.J., and writes wherever and whenever: using a notebook in a bouncy Humvee in a convoy in Iraq, using a recorder in a car on the Garden State Parkway, punching poem fragments into his cellphone when he was floored by the differences between New York and Abu Ghraib, where he was stationed for nine months in 2004.

"Before, the city always meant joy, fun and laughter," he said of New York. "But I couldn't tear myself away from that little patch of land very far away, and that night." He has memories of hearing his captain asking another friend to take care of his children.

Of the memories, he said, "Writing poetry is a way of making them safer and not letting them run away with you."

He said he came back from Iraq more cynical, aggressive and on edge.

"On the one hand you're disturbed by the very things that make you stronger, unique, different and insightful about this world."

Mr. Díaz began writing poetry with a club that met at Havana Bay Coffee in North Bergen, N.J., starting with love poems. "I can't do that anymore," he said, recalling children in Iraq living off the garbage of Americans stationed there. "Love seems like a trivial subject to write about."

He shows fragments that will become his next poem, "Had We Known."

He has changed the word "inhale" to "hum" in this line about the call to prayer, which often preceded mortar attacks: "Once more, it was our fate to hum the call of the muezzin."

In the final version, he looks at his friend's eye, and sees it move.

It's green, thank God! Exhale! Inhale!

And forget what lies beyond the line of sight.

Confine it now and then to the realm of our repose.

U.S. And Afghan Forces Kill 25 Suspected Taliban In Two Raids (LAT)

By Paul Watson

The Los Angeles Times, September 6, 2005

KABUL, Afghanistan — U.S. and Afghan forces killed 25 suspected Taliban fighters and captured dozens more in operations in two southern provinces over two days, Afghan and U.S. officials said.

On Monday, U.S. and Afghan forces killed 12 suspected militants and detained nine others in a raid in Zabol province, the U.S. military said. Soldiers were brought by helicopter into a remote area where militants were believed to be gathering before launching attacks. No casualties were reported among the Afghan and U.S. forces.

The operation in Zabol followed a raid in neighboring Kandahar province in which U.S. and Afghan forces killed 13 suspected Taliban fighters, and captured dozens more, in a remote area where a political candidate was kidnapped and executed last week, a provincial official said.

U.S. and Afghan troops dropped by parachute from American aircraft in the operation, which began Sunday, Kandahar Gov. Asadullah Khalid said by telephone from Kandahar city, the provincial capital. None of the coalition troops was injured.

The assault targeted insurgents suspected of killing Khan Mohammed, a candidate for Kandahar's provincial council in the country's Sept. 18 election who was abducted Friday, the governor added. A district commissioner and three policemen were killed along with Mohammed.

At least four other candidates have been killed in the weeks before the election for the lower house of Afghanistan's parliament and provincial councils. It is Afghanistan's first parliamentary election since U.S.-led forces toppled the Taliban's hard-line Islamic regime in late 2001.

Backed by U.S. attack helicopters, the American and Afghan troops, and local police, landed Sunday in the Lal valley, about 50 miles northwest of Kandahar, the governor said. More than 40 suspected insurgents were detained. They are being interrogated, U.S. Col. Jim Yonts, spokesman for the coalition forces, told reporters in Kabul, the Afghan capital.

Khalid said some of them might be released soon, while the rest would be put on trial as Taliban militants.

"I think this was a group that was hiding and getting ready to conduct operations to bring chaos to the process of the elections in Afghanistan, so this [assault] will decrease the danger of the Taliban insurgency," the governor added.

Yonts denied there was any link between the offensive, which was still underway Monday, and Friday's kidnappings and executions.

"What you have here is when coalition forces are notified, through intelligence means, that there are enemy forces in an area, we will quickly and aggressively take the fight to them," Yonts said.

Taliban and allied guerrillas have killed at least 51 U.S. troops in Afghanistan this year, the heaviest combat losses for American forces since the war against the Taliban and its allies in the Al Qaeda terrorist network began in 2001. More than 1,000 Afghans, many of them civilian victims of insurgent attacks, have died.

But the international security force led by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in the country considers the militants' attack rate similar to that for the period before last year's presidential election, said Maj. Andrew Elmes, a British spokesman.

Millions of Afghans defied Taliban threats and turned out to vote in an election won by President Hamid Karzai, a strong U.S. ally.

United Nations organizers say that with more than 5,800 candidates from 72 parties running in the upcoming election, their task is several times more complicated than last year's vote.

In other recent attacks in southern Afghanistan, insurgents killed five Afghan police officers in an ambush Sunday. The previous day, guerrillas killed three Afghan police officers guarding a supply convoy headed to a U.S. military base.

Despite daily attacks by guerrillas across large swaths of southern and eastern Afghanistan, Yonts said the U.S. military saw the attacks as local or regional operations without any national coordination.

"In our assessment, it is not connected to any kind of a network," he said. "You will see an individual attack here, you may see an individual attack in this [other] province over here. But there is nothing that we see that fuses that together from any sort of an infrastructure, or coordinated program."

The insurgents mainly operate in cells of one to five fighters, Yonts said.

13 Insurgents Killed As U.S. And Afghans Mount Drive (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 5 - Afghan and American forces have mounted an operation in recent days in a remote mountainous district of southern Afghanistan in pursuit of a group of insurgents, Afghan and American officials said Monday.

They said that 13 insurgents suspected of ties to the country's former Taliban rulers had been killed and more than 40 people had been detained.

The area of combat is the same district, Ghorak, where suspected Taliban insurgents kidnapped, and claimed to have killed, five people on Saturday - a local election candidate, a government official and three police officers. An American spokesman, Col. James Yonts, said the operation was not directly linked to their abduction, but was based on intelligence about enemy activity.

The governor of Kandahar province, Asadullah Khalid, said the 13 insurgents had been killed Sunday in American-led airstrikes on the area.

One Afghan soldier was wounded in the operation as troops were brought in by Chinook helicopters, said the Afghan Army spokesman, Gen. Muhammad Zaher Azimi.

The fighting came after several days of increased violence that left two candidates for the Sept. 18 parliamentary elections dead, as well as 16 other people. The dead include a British engineer, two Japanese tourists, a government official and his son, a cleric and six police officers. Afghan officials blamed Taliban insurgents for the violence, saying the Taliban are trying to disrupt Afghanistan's parliamentary elections.

Pakistan Builds Its Forces on Border

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Sept. 5 (Reuters) - Pakistan has sent thousands of troop reinforcements to its western border to help choke off the Taliban-led insurgency in the weeks before Afghanistan's parliamentary elections, a military spokesman said Monday.

About 5,000 more troops have been sent to North-West Frontier Province and 4,500 more to Baluchistan Province, bringing the total of troops near the border to almost 80,000, Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan said.

Last year, the Taliban were unable to mount a credible threat to the election for president because of a squeeze put on the border areas by the Pakistani Army, American-led forces and the Afghan Army.

But since March, the Taliban and their allies have intensified their campaign of violence. The insurgents have suffered the heaviest casualties, officials contend, but dozens of civilians, Afghan security personnel and American troops have been among the hundreds of people killed.

After The Fall, Amal Surrenders Her Illusions (WP)

BAGHDAD Second of three parts

On April 10, 2003, the day after the fall of President Saddam Hussein, the veil had been lifted but no one was sure what it revealed.

Conquered no less than 15 times in its history, Baghdad was called free, but the city was a furious storm set down. Emotions -- euphoria, vindictiveness, desperation, confusion -- surged up from the people after years of silence and restraint. The city seemed like a dazed inmate stumbling out of his cell and squinting into the harsh sunlight. Some spoke of anarchy: Armed civilians had begun to crack the monopoly on violence held only weeks earlier by Hussein's government and the American military forces now occupying Iraq. Thousands of residents hurried to plunder everything from trucks and wooden carts to the urinals, copper pipes and electrical wiring of public buildings. Hospitals and embassies fell prey, along with ministries, government offices, Baath Party headquarters and the stone mansions, faced in onyx, of Hussein's lieutenants.

"The hospitals are being looted and no one is protesting! Why does the St. Rafael Hospital have an American tank protecting it? Is it because it is a Christian hospital? What about the Alwiya Maternity Hospital? What about the pregnant women there?" 14-year-old Amal Salman wrote in her journal on April 11. "Why has it befallen Iraqis? Wasn't it enough to loot government offices? Now the hospitals and even homes?"

She asked a question heard often in Baghdad in those days: "What are the Americans going to do with us?" The entry ended succinctly: "God, have mercy on us."

Like others, Amal, her sisters and her mother confronted a city that was collapsing as living conditions worsened. Few parents let their daughters walk alone in the streets, and the members of Amal's family spent most of their time in their apartment, huddled in a stuffy living room, sweating. In time, power was restored, but it remained intermittent, sorely inadequate as temperatures climbed. Phones were still not working, the networks shattered by bombing. Money, each denomination bearing Hussein's portrait, was scarce. Prices soared further, and shortages were everywhere. Overnight, tens of thousands lost their jobs as the bureaucracy disintegrated, some offices in flames.

There was an attitude in Iraq in those months, shared by Amal and her family, that seemed to condemn the occupation from the start. Many in Baghdad had been in awe at American technology during the war. Especially during the conflict's first days, the U.S. assault was as devastating as it was precise. Hussein had ruled for 35 years; the Americans had toppled him in less than three weeks, and relatively few of their soldiers had died in the task. How could these same Americans be so feeble in the aftermath?

"Where is the help that Bush spoke about?" Amal wrote. "No one knows."

Through those days, she stayed far from the gear-laden U.S. soldiers now in the streets, peering at them from her balcony and even returning waves, but reluctant to speak. Her effervescent twin sisters, Duaa and Hibba, were more curious. On a Saturday in the occupation's first month, a tank was parked on the street, and the girls went to say hello to the soldiers, who gave them chocolates. A few minutes later was the crack of gunfire.

"Hibba tried to ask the soldier what was happening. He told her, 'Go! Go!' But Hibba didn't understand the American language. Out of fear for Hibba, he carried her to our building. They are nice, but they are misled by Bush, the dangerous one," she wrote.

Two days later, the twins saw another group of U.S. soldiers in the streets, their desert camouflage melting into the city's palette of browns. "They wrote their names on the children's palms. Hibba's hand had names of Americans soldiers on it. Hibba and Duaa were very happy. They said the soldiers were very friendly and they were delighted with them. Is it true they are good?" she asked.Reconciling With Reality

Ever so slightly, Amal's writing began to change in those turbulent months. During the war, infused with the government's propaganda, she had spoken with the force of a loyalist. Precocious, the smartest of Karima Salman's daughters and an enthusiastic inductee in her school's Baath Party group, she had competed with her sisters in pledges of fealty to Hussein, even if her diary was more reflective. In April, a week after his fall, as her fellow Shiite Muslims celebrated his demise, Amal still held tenaciously to received views. Hussein was all she knew. "Until now," she said as she sat with her family, "we still say his excellency, the president."

But privately Amal seemed baffled, and she gave voice to her confusion in the diary. A war she dreaded was over and a revolution she did not understand just beginning; she tried to reconcile her experience with reality, as churning, unpredictable and menacing as it was.

"We used to have trust in President Saddam Hussein," she wrote on April 11, two days after his fall, "but now we don't know whom we trust."

Hussein still cast many shadows in Iraq; he would do so for months and years to follow. Almost immediately, the mass graves of those he had persecuted began to be unearthed, the victims numbering in the tens of thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands. With their discovery came an accounting of the dead. Days after Hussein's fall, photocopied pictures of men missing or executed and now celebrated as martyrs began to crowd for space in markets, offices and mosques. Their dark eyes, lonesome, stared ahead.

Quieter was the process of demystifying Hussein. His name was still whispered; who knew if danger remained, if somehow he might still be listening, waiting? "No one knows where President Saddam Hussein's whereabouts are, or when he will appear with his army," Amal wrote in an entry on April 16. "They say Saddam Hussein is in Baghdad with a big army, built for the final battle between Iraq and America. No one knows if this is true or not. They are just rumors, true or not."

Secrets soon poured out, and Amal digested the horrors of the government she had once seen as indestructible. Weeks after Hussein's fall, she and her family watched some of the 50-cent videos that flooded the market. They detailed the ornate palaces in a style of kitschy Arabesque that Hussein built -- "all with gold and silver," she wrote -- the gassing of 5,000 Kurds in 1988 in the northern Iraqi city of Halabja, and Uday Hussein's notorious abduction of women whom he fancied.

"Saddam's eldest son, Uday, is the biggest corrupt person on earth," she wrote after watching the videos over two days, their viewing interrupted by blackouts. "Any girl he liked, he would take. No one could say anything because he is the son of President Saddam Hussein. His other son, Qusay, is also cruel, like his father and brother."

The same, she wrote, went for Hussein's other relatives.

"No one realizes they are gone, all of them, forever," she wrote.An Open-Ended Collapse

The U.S. invasion that toppled Hussein and brought the occupation never had a real name. The Bush administration called it Operation Iraqi Freedom. Predictably, Hussein's own name for the invasion, Marakat al-Hawasim, Defining Battle, was similarly grandiose.

Like many in Iraq, Amal and her family simply called the war the suqut -- "the collapse" or "the fall," a name that probably made more sense than any other. It designated the end of 35 years of pitiless Baath Party rule. In a way, it suggested, too, that another beginning had yet to be inaugurated. Through 2003 and 2004, Marakat al-Hawasim lingered in the wreckage of the government's fall. It remained open-ended, its muddled aftermath as inconclusive as Hussein's fall seemed climactic. For Iraqis, suqut meant an end without renewal, a seemingly endless interim. It was a life imposed, not chosen.

"Everybody is asking about the future, the future of Iraq," Amal wrote in the summer of 2003. "Some are asking where is the future. Others say Iraq has no future anymore. These are all opinions, but no one knows what the truth is."

Amal's diary was becoming more and more tattered. The writing itself was filled with highs, the glimmers of hope that had passed, and the more enduring lows that always seemed to return.

"God is greatest! Praise to God!" Amal wrote in one entry when occasional electricity flickered through their apartment. "There was rejoicing in the whole building, people saying to each other, 'Electricity is back, thanks be to God.' We slept, feeling happy because of the electricity."

And then, a few pages later: "We are now sitting, waiting for electricity to come back. What happened to the promises?"

In Amal's building, the water remained off for months, so the children took turns lugging buckets from a faucet that still worked in the entryway downstairs, near a pool of black, brackish water. For days at a time, the family had no kerosene for cooking. On the occasions it was available, it would sometimes sell for 20 times its prewar rate. Prices for food skyrocketed: Karima groused that cucumbers had tripled in price since the war's end and tomatoes had more than doubled. The family staved off hunger only by way of monthly food rations that were still distributed to each family. Rent was always two months or more late, and the landlord was stopping by the apartment every few days, angrily demanding money.

The pressure was taking its toll on Karima, a widow who was just 36. Her oldest son, Ali, had survived the war, deserting the army before the conflict ended and making his way to Baghdad. But he was jobless. She looked for work at the city's main hotels -- the Meridien and the Sheraton -- but could not make her way through security. She spoke no English; often the U.S. soldiers manning the entrance spoke no Arabic. Their interpreters dismissed her as more riffraff from the street.

As her family's circumstances spiraled downward, Karima, in desperation, went to the family of her late husband's sister along Abu Nawas Street. Karima needed help -- money for rent and food. After fighting and humiliating Karima, the relatives tried to get U.S. soldiers stationed down the street to arrest her, but the interpreter with the troops was a neighbor of Karima's and sided with her. Karima returned home.

"Why would my aunt do that?" Amal asked. "She is our aunt and we are like her children. But the times have changed. Life has no mercy on anyone in this world. Even the same family won't have mercy on each other. Why? Why? I think of this every day. She is the sister of my father. Why did she do all that? Because of money? She is a teacher and she is in no need, but we are. If my aunt has no compassion to us, who will?'"What Else Can We Do?'

In Amal's writings, the meaning of liberation was personal. Her mind was flowering, her raw intelligence exercised by her consideration of her country's experience. Amal's hard-won wisdom seemed the quietest of triumphs in the long months after Hussein's fall.

In a society that equated wisdom with age, the once-impressionable girl had begun thinking critically, first about Hussein and then the invasion, the occupation and the ambitions that drove the Americans forward. There was an irony in her awakening: She was free to speak, but it was her liberators whom she criticized with her new candor.

"People are exhausted and conditions are harsh. We are now living on false dreams and in a failed democracy," she wrote. "Satellites were banned in the past, and they are now permitted, but who can buy a satellite? Those who have money can buy, but those who don't can't buy anything. This is democracy."

Well-intentioned U.S. officials would often remark that they were there to throw open the gate to a democratic, pluralistic future, but stressed that the Iraqis themselves would have to walk through it, on their own. Time and again -- often oblivious to history and unmindful of the consequences an occupation inspired -- the Americans were frustrated when Iraqis, battered and beaten down by wars and dictatorship, didn't start to walk through the gate.

But the Americans had to take, or at least share, responsibility for raising the people's expectations in the first place. Iraqis might forget the date, perhaps even the person who spoke the words, but they always remembered the pledge uttered on March 6, 2003, by President Bush when he promised that "the life of the Iraqi citizen is going to dramatically improve."

One of those who remembered was young Amal:

"Please, tell us, when are we going to live a life of security and stability? Listen to us, hear us, you people out there, we have cried and shouted. What else can we do?"

Although her entries became less frequent through the year, Amal's writing became clearer, her sentences longer and more complex, her vocabulary more sophisticated. She gained confidence in her ideas as she observed life around her. "They talk about democracy. Where is democracy? Is it that people die of hunger and deprivation and fear? Is that democracy?"

When the damp, sometimes gusty cold of winter arrived, Amal's family sat on mattresses and shabby brown blankets around a kettle of tea, brewed by eldest sister Fatima, and a plate of cheese called Abu Thufira served on a dented metal tray. Pictures of Arabic pop stars lined the walls, along with the usual religious portraits and invocations.

The twins attached stickers of soccer players to their school notebooks. The other children traded copies of leaflets that were circulating in the streets at the time. "An American soldier cries in Baghdad," one of them declared over a picture of an American fighter with his hand held to his eyes. The leaflet was from one of the numerous insurgent groups, and it catalogued the opposition's latest, if fictional, triumphs: three planes and 14 U.S. tanks destroyed on a single day. Another, handed out by the U.S. military, featured a picture of a fighter clad in black with a ski mask, carrying a rocket-propelled grenade. It implored Iraqis "not to permit terrorists or loyalists of the previous regime to take away your new freedom."

Amal's family believed one, not the other. They talked about the fear they had seen in the eyes of U.S. soldiers near their home. They exchanged rumors of desertions in the U.S. military. Conspiracies ran rife.

"All the explosions are their fault," Karima said of the U.S. officials ensconced in the Green Zone. "They are the reasons for the bombing."

"It's apparent," Ali said, as an Egyptian serial, "Alexandria," its volume loud, played on the television. "Only Iraqis die in the explosions. No Americans ever die."

Karima shook her head. "Saddam did not do good things," she said. "He made the people suffer. But there was fear. And with fear, there was security. He was strong."

Ali called civil war a prospect. "It's possible," he said. "It might happen."

Amal interrupted, raising her voice for the first time that day.

"I don't think it will happen," she countered.

Growing ever more confident, Amal, approaching 15, volunteered her own view of the country's confusion. "If I say the Americans are better, someone asks what have the Americans done. What have they done for us? All the Americans have done is bring the tanks," she said. "If I said the time of Saddam was better, they say, what? If he didn't like you, he would cut off your head. He was a tyrant.

"I don't know what to say," she admitted.

A few days later, as she sat near a space heater casting a yellow glow over the room, Amal had thought about the previous conversation.

"People must be optimistic," she said. Sometimes her dark brown eyes were cast to the floor. At moments, though, she looked up, her voice clearer, her ideas more insistent. "There must be hope. Even the Koran says we should be optimistic."

She looked down to the floor again. There was a suggestion of defiance in her words. "If not for my generation," she said, "then the generation that's coming."

Karima sat next to her. She spoke softly, though Amal seemed to hear her. "They're still young," she said, shaking her head. "They don't know what's ahead."

Return Of Former Communists Stirs Up Afghan Elections (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

KHOST, Afghanistan, Aug. 31 - The outriders decorated their motorbikes with sunflowers, and at every stop people tossed flowers at their convoy and offered prayers.

The former Communist general Shahnawaz Tanai was returning to his home district after 32 years to make a political comeback, and the Tanai tribe accorded him the traditional greeting.

The political return of dozens of former Communists, among them General Tanai, 54, who was Afghan chief of staff, then defense minister in the brutal Soviet occupation in the 1980's, is one of the most contentious issues of this election campaign.

General Tanai is perhaps most infamous for leading a coup in 1990, with the renegade mujahedeen commander Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, against President Muhammad Najibullah. The coup failed and he fled to Pakistan, where he lived in exile until Aug. 7.

The general is not running in Afghanistan's parliamentary and provincial elections on Sept. 18, but he is calculating on winning a sizable bloc in Parliament with candidates from his Afghanistan Peace Movement Party and two other parties of former Communists who have joined him in a coalition. They are fielding 200 candidates around the country, most of them former Communists and some Soviet-era ministers and participants in the half a dozen coups of the last three decades.

"Our party is a national political party based on Islam and national unity," General Tanai said in an interview. "Above all we want the rule of law." He denied plotting the 1990 coup and said Mr. Najibullah had planned it against his own ministers.

President Hamid Karzai has encouraged many of the rogues of Afghanistan's recent history to take part in the elections in an effort to unite the country and foster political stability. A senior security official, who asked not to be identified to avoid angering the political factions, said that he saw little threat from the former Communists because they had no military power, but that the jihadi leaders were still a menace. Yet the return of the Communists to public life is reopening the violent struggle between Communists and Islamists that tore this country apart in the 1980's, and made it the arena for the last proxy conflict of the cold war.

The mujahedeen, who were backed by the United States in their struggle against the Communists, are watching with anger and some confusion as their enemies regain positions in the government and may win a sizable bloc in Parliament in American-supported elections.

Nevertheless, the mujahedeen are also entering the political race, to fight their old foes at the ballot box. A week into the election campaign in this unruly eastern province, Khost's voters have been presented with a bewildering array of candidates. In all, 214 have registered, with 91 competing for just five seats from Khost in the Wolesi Jirga or lower house of Parliament, 121 competing for the nine-seat provincial council, and 2 Kuchis, nomads who have a separate seat allocation in Parliament.

Afghans here are expected to vote along tribal lines, many say, but within each tribe they have a choice between the former Communists on one side and the traditional tribal leaders and mujahedeen commanders on the other. Added to the mix are Westernized candidates who have returned from two decades in exile in the United States or Western Europe, and members of the local educated elite, who offer a complete break from the political and military figures of the last two decades.

Campaigning in Khost is far from the Western experience, with most candidates dealing directly with the tribal elders, knowing that they will tell their communities how to vote.

One candidate, Shir Khosti, who returned from 20 years in the United States, where he ran cellphone shops with his brother, to work for the governor of Khost, is running a relatively Western-style campaign, focusing on younger voters. He is visiting high schools, where he urges 18- to 20-year-olds, who are still in school making up lost years of education, to make their own choice, rather than follow the decision of their elders, as tradition dictates.

Mr. Khosti, the son of a former parliamentarian who was executed by the Communists, dislikes the Communists and the Islamic fundamentalists among the mujahedeen.

"The trouble here is the people don't know what they need," he said. "It's not enough just being a good guy. A representative has to have the mental capacity to deliver a lot of goods."

One of the leading female candidates, Sahera Sharif, knows better than to tell tribal elders what to think. When meeting villagers in Bak, Ms. Sharif, a teacher and development worker, vows to work for Islam, and to help women "within the parameters of Islam."

Another former Communist, Maj. Gen. Sayed Muhammad Gulabzoi, 54, who is widely expected to win a parliamentary seat, was receiving supporters in a rented house in Khost, the provincial capital, a few days ago. "Lots of tribal people are coming to see me here," he said. "I have no plans to go out. If you are not at home, that is considered very bad here."

General Gulabzoi took part in the overthrow of King Zaher Shah in 1973 - and virtually every coup since - and was aide de camp to the ruthless Communist leader Nur Muhammad Taraki and then interior minister for all of the Soviet occupation. He returned to Afghanistan 16 months ago after 17 years in exile in Russia.

"People died and were wounded, and I am very sad for that," he said of his years in power. "But I did not do anything bad to the people of Khost."

He spoke with a district leader, a former mujahid, who pledged his vote and those of his district to General Gulabzoi. "We will vote for an educated person, a good person, who will do something for the people," said the district leader, Shahazar Khan. "In all his life, he has not owned a house or a car, so that means he is honest."

Many of the mujahedeen have been branded warlords, especially in Kabul, and accused by human rights groups of abuses in the civil war of the 1990's and of graft and land grabbing since they returned to power in 2001 after the fall of the Taliban. Yet in Khost, some voters voiced hatred for the Communists and enthusiastic support for local mujahedeen leaders, saying many had served the people honestly.

The communists "put me in prison for five and a half months," said Hajji Mazub, the elder of a village in Yakubi district of Khost Province. "They were the reason we all had to live as refugees in Pakistan for 20 years. We will never vote for the Communists." Hajji Mir Dil Spin-Zadran, a well-known mujahedeen commander and tribal leader who is running for the Wolesi

Jirga, said: "Khost is the home of the mujahedeen, and the people are the supporters of the mujahedeen. Most people in the cities were Communists and in the villages the people support the mujahedeen."

"They should not have taken this opportunity to seek power," he said of General Gulabzoi, who is from his own village, and General Tanai. "They should just sit at home and live quietly."

Hajji Spin-Zadran gathered more than 200 tribal elders on a hilltop outside his home on Wednesday to seek their support for him in the elections. "May God give our country back into our hands. During the jihad we had to win our country back; now we have to rebuild it," a cleric said in introducing him.

"I did not plan to run for Parliament, but I am running because of the jihad and for Islam," Hajji Spin-Zadran told the gathering. "I am not thinking about money, or having a good time, only about my people, my nation and my tribe."

As he spoke, tribesmen stood and called him to stop, assuring him of their support. "Inshallah," said Hajji Sherzad, a tribesman from a nearby village. "He is the one. We have put our hands on him."

Attackers Kill 9, Including Candidate

By The New York Times

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 4 - Another election candidate and eight other people were killed in Afghanistan in several attacks, officials said Sunday, blaming Taliban militants. It was the second day of attacks and raised fears the Taliban were continuing to step up violence in an effort to disrupt elections on Sept. 18.

Habibullah Khan, a candidate from the Garmser district in Helmand Province, was killed when his car hit a land mine, said the deputy police chief of Helmand, Col. Muhammad Ayub. "He lost his leg, and we brought him to the Emergency Hospital in the capital and he died at noon," Colonel Ayub said.

Mr. Khan was the fifth candidate to be killed. An additional candidate was abducted Saturday in Kandahar Province and is thought to have been killed, a police officer in Kandahar said. The Taliban claimed responsibility for abducting and killing five people on Saturday, including the candidate and a local district chief.

In Helmand on Sunday morning, a district police chief, Amanullah Khan, his son and two bodyguards were killed in an ambush by men suspected of being Taliban insurgents in Doshi, Colonel Ayub said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Tip-Line Bind: Follow The Law In U.S. Or EU? (WSJ)

By David Reilly And Sarah Nassauer

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

In the wake of scandals at Enron and WorldCom, the Sarbanes-Oxley Act directed companies listed in the U.S. to set up so-called whistle-blower hot lines for employees everywhere to confidentially report potential corporate abuses.

But those anonymous tip lines now pose unforeseen problems in Europe, where data-protection laws make it difficult to accuse someone of impropriety anonymously. These laws go beyond basic privacy concerns: They hold that citizens have a right to know who is collecting data about them, and they also may include restrictions on revealing corporate information to outsiders.

A French agency, for example, has ruled that anonymous whistle-blower tip lines don't guarantee adequate protection for people accused of wrongdoing.

As a result, many U.S. and European companies are in a legal bind: If they set up whistle-blower hot lines in subsidiaries in France, and possibly elsewhere in Europe, they might run afoul of local laws. If they don't, they might violate Sarbanes-Oxley, the 2002 corporate-governance law enforced by the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Companies are being told "I have to either chop off my left hand or my right hand," said Christopher Kuner, a partner at law firm Hunton & Williams in Brussels who specializes in international privacy and data-protection law.

The impasse underscores the far-reaching, and often unanticipated, impact of Sarbanes-Oxley, which executives on both sides of the Atlantic have complained is overly restrictive and has even led some European firms to seek to "deregister" their U.S. stocks.

Two U.S. companies -- McDonald's Corp. and Exide Technologies -- are the first test cases of the potential whistle-blower impasse. In late May, both companies were told by France's Data Protection Authority, known as the CNIL, that planned ethics hot lines at units they operate in France were illegal. Both companies declined to offer specific detail about how they are addressing the decision.

"We're studying our options and the French ruling," said Alan Chapple, a spokesman for Exide, which makes automotive and industrial batteries.

"Like many other public companies [McDonald's] is working to ensure compliance with Sarbanes-Oxley as it relates to operations outside the United States," the hamburger chain said in a statement.

Regulators in France and the U.S. have yet to find a way out of the conflict. The CNIL has twice written to the SEC notifying it of the problem and asking that U.S. regulators delay taking action against companies that haven't set up hot lines in France, according to copies of the letters provided by the CNIL.

In a July 29 letter to the SEC, CNIL Chairman Alex Türk also said his agency was talking with companies to see whether there was a way to devise a system that would preserve the anonymity of a whistle-blower while also "preserving the right of the denounced persons to the protection of their personal data."

In a reply sent Aug. 10, Ethiopis Tafara, the SEC's director of international affairs, said the rule requiring "integrity lines" is "drafted broadly so that companies can implement it as best suits their needs and/or local legal requirements," according to a copy of the letter provided by the CNIL. Mr. Tafara also suggested that the SEC and the CNIL discuss the matter. The regulators have yet to hold talks but are expected to in coming weeks, CNIL officials said.

"For the time being, it's probably impossible for a company that is subject to both laws to be 100% sure that it's in compliance on both sides of the Atlantic," said Fabrice Baumgartner, a partner in the Paris office of Cleary Gottlieb Steen & Hamilton LLP.

That is clearly a source of corporate anxiety: The CNIL receives up to 10 phone calls, letters or emails a day asking for guidance on whistle-blower lines.

Although France's rules are based on EU data-protection laws, regulators in each of the trade bloc's 25 member countries interpret and enforce the laws, meaning they can play out differently in different countries.

In the United Kingdom, which has more companies with U.S. stock-market listings than any other EU country, the Information Commissioner's Office doesn't "see anything wrong with these hot lines," a spokeswoman said. As long as companies conduct a proper investigation into any whistle-blower allegation and the accused is informed and has due-process rights, such hot lines shouldn't pose problems, she added. But British laws could be breached if a company took an anonymous tip "at face value" without conducting an impartial investigation.

But waiting until regulators sort out the conflicting directives could carry significant risks for companies. Hunton & Williams's Mr. Kuner said he knows of firms that turned off their hot lines in France in the wake of the CNIL decision.

"Obviously if you then had a big corporate scandal occur in France and it turned out later you could have prevented it through a hot line, that could be a potential liability," he said. "But no one really knows how the SEC or the courts would interpret an excuse saying, 'We didn't have a system there because it's illegal.'"

CRIMINAL LAW:

Cuban Spy Case Poses Dilemma For U.S. (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 5, 2005

MIAMI — They're known in Cuba as the Five Heroes and their faces, names and the details of their seven-year legal drama are familiar to schoolchildren and sugar cane cutters across the Communist island.

The Cuban Five, as they are known in the U.S., were convicted four years ago here in Miami of spying for President Fidel Castro and sentenced to maximum-security prisons for terms of 15 years to life. Cubans' reaction to the case rivals the collective fury that mobilized them to demand the return of castaway Elian Gonzalez in 2000.

Since a federal appeals court overturned the quintet's espionage convictions last month on grounds that their trial venue was tainted by fierce anti-Castro sentiments, the U.S. government must decide whether to request a retrial.

The case has been one of the most divisive issues between Washington and Havana since the five were arrested in 1998. The men admitted to being Cuban agents but have insisted throughout that they were only gathering intelligence on radical and sometimes violent exile groups to protect Castro and their Cuban homeland.

U.S. prosecutors, who contended the five were spreading disinformation, posing a threat to exiles and trying to steal military secrets because one of the men worked as a laborer at a Key West naval air station, won convictions in June 2001. The Miami federal court also found alleged ringleader Gerardo Hernandez guilty of murder conspiracy, based on allegations that he provided intelligence to Havana that led to the deaths of four Cuban exiles shot down by Cuban MIGs in international airspace in 1996.

Deemed amateurs even by some of Castro's harshest critics here, the five, if not retried, could instead be expelled to Havana or swapped for U.S. fugitives long sheltered in Cuba, according to their attorneys and foreign policy analysts.

The 11th Circuit Court of Appeals' reversal of the convictions of Hernandez, Antonio Guerrero, Fernando Gonzalez, Ramon Labanino and Rene Gonzalez, can also be appealed to the same court, said Alicia Valle, spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in Miami. She declined to say how the prosecution would proceed.

Last week, a group of Nobel laureates and intellectuals including Desmond Tutu and Noam Chomsky, released a letter to the U.S. government calling for the release of the five men.

Castro used the occasion of his 79th birthday on Aug. 13 to visit the family of Hernandez, who coincidentally called his wife from custody in a U.S. prison while Castro was at his Havana apartment.

"The best they could do would be to free you," Castro told the prisoner, according to Cuban reporters who were present. Castro also warned that a retrial could prove embarrassing to the U.S. because it would allow defense lawyers to present evidence of American support for terrorism against Cuba, alluding to the case of Luis Posada Carriles, a radical anti-Castro exile accused of blowing up a Cuban airliner.

U.S. immigration authorities arrested Posada in May and charged him with entering the country illegally two months earlier. He remains detained at an El Paso facility pending a court decision on whether to extradite him to Venezuela to face trial in the airliner bombing, allegedly planned in Caracas.

Castro calls the months of indecision on extradition evidence of hypocrisy by Washington in its global war on terrorism. The 77-year-old Posada was convicted by a jury in Panama in connection with a plot to assassinate Castro in 2000 but was freed a year ago by outgoing Panamanian President Mireya Moscoso, an action that Castro claims was orchestrated by the White House.

Some Cuba analysts predict that the United States probably won't use the appellate decision as an opportunity to advance relations with Havana. Since Washington pulled out of twice-yearly migration talks with Cuba two years ago, there are no remaining forums for official contact or dialogue between the two countries.

FBI media liaison Judy Orihuela said the agency does not maintain a formal list of wanted fugitives believed to be living in Cuba, nor has it made any requests for extraditions.

Civil rights attorney Leonard Weinglass, who represents Guerrero, one of the men sentenced to life, said the Justice Department had asked for a 30-day extension of the usual 21-day period for requesting that the appellate court reconsider its decision.

Noting that no classified documents were involved in the case brought against the five for being unregistered agents, Weinglass said he is convinced the federal prosecutors "recognize privately" the weakness of their case and that convictions would be unlikely in a more neutral venue.

"There's never been a 93-page decision on venue," Weinglass said of the appellate decision. "Any lawyer would say you don't retry this case."

Cuba-watchers at the Council on Hemispheric Affairs contend that the Bush administration is bent on maintaining the status quo of total disengagement in hopes of undermining Castro, who has held power for nearly half a century.

Larry Birns, director of the Washington-based think tank, said he has met with three Cuban diplomats since the Aug. 9 appeals court decision and "the subject came up about a political settlement or a joint release of people. They are extremely prone to negotiate a solution to this problem."

Among the longtime U.S. fugitives in Cuba are financier Robert Vesco, convicted cop-killer and Black Power figure Joanne Chesimard and one of the FBI's 10 Most Wanted, Victor Gerena, sought in connection with a $7-million armed robbery and hostage-taking in Connecticut in 1983. At least 70 suspected criminals are believed to be taking refuge in Cuba.

But Birns doubts any such resolution will emerge.

"This thing is so churned up by ideology and domestic politics that even though there is a compellingly rational path to a solution, the United States doesn't want to do anything that would portray Cuba as anything but a nation of beasts," said the director of the left-leaning think tank.

Longtime Castro critic Joe Garcia, former head of the right-wing Cuban-American National Foundation, predicts that the U.S. government will pursue a new conviction, even though the Cuban Five represent no threat to U.S. security and are of limited symbolic value because most Americans outside Cuban exile-heavy Miami know nothing about them.

"It's impossible at this stage to just deport them," said Garcia, now a Democratic Party advisor. "The return of these people would be a victory for Fidel."

The Bush administration could also seek to exchange the Cuban Five for Castro's promise to release dozens of dissidents and independent journalists jailed in Cuba, Garcia said. But that action would backfire on the Cuban opposition by linking it with the U.S. government, he added, validating Castro's claims that his domestic critics are paid lackeys of Washington.

Moreover, Castro is not likely to give up a prominent U.S. fugitive, Garcia said. Vesco is jailed in Cuba on conspiracy charges and knows too much about Cuban government dealings to be trusted, Garcia said, and it would be politically difficult to turn over Chesimard or other Black Power radicals wanted in the United States for murder.

"Joanne Chesimard is a symbol in Cuba. To turn her over would be a betrayal of the left, and Fidel is the last leftist. It's tough for him to give up symbols," said Garcia.

Damian Fernandez, director of Florida International University's Cuban Research Institute, sees little hope of the Cuban Five prompting either Havana or Washington to change their adversarial postures.

"I don't sense either the United States or the Cuban government having the will to change the status quo. They like it the way it is," he said. "The five are a cause celebre for Castro. For the United States, they're a symbolic repudiation of Castro's Cuba."

The National Committee to Free the Cuban Five objects to the idea of using the men as political trade goods. The private support group instead has lobbied for their release without conditions.

"We feel the Cuban Five have already suffered enough," said the group's New York spokeswoman, Teresa Gutierrez. "As for a swap between prisoners, we don't think that's fair at all. It's apples and oranges."

PARANOIA RUNS DEEP AT CITY HALL AS FBI CORRUPTION PROBE WIDENS (NFR)

By Mike Hudson

Niagara Falls (NY) Reporter, September 5, 2005

The widening federal corruption probe of Mayor Vincenzo V. Anello has City Hall employees edgy as more grand jury subpoenas draw an increasing number of civil servants into the tawdry case.

On Aug. 25, city Law Department Clerk Donna Winstanley was summoned to testify in the scandal. Winstanley, who is responsible for the department's time/date stamp machine, was ordered to bring Anello's financial disclosure statements for the years 2002, 2003 and 2004, along with any charts or other records designed to track when the documents were actually filed.

Sources familiar with the original documents say that some filings, for different years, appear to have been done at the same time and with the same pen. Federal agents are particularly interested in the filing for 2004, the year when Anello accepted more than $45,000 in unsecured "loans" from prominent downtown developer "Smokin'" Joe Anderson and Kathy Kajfasz, sister of John Kajfasz, a principal in the group Anello gifted with 18 holes of the Hyde Park Golf Course.

At the time, Anello was serving as a city councilman and the payments were made just before and immediately after his election as mayor. None of his disclosure forms was stamped with the time or date, and the public documents only came to light following Freedom of Information Act requests by the Niagara Falls Reporter and the Niagara Gazette.

Interestingly, the 2004 form had been dated by Anello as 4/11/04 until someone changed it to 4/11/05. The filings are now in the hands of forensic document examiners at the Federal Bureau of Investigation's laboratory in Washington, D.C. Some believe the documents were filed only after the media's FOIA requests.

Anello never disclosed his fiduciary interests with either Kajfasz or Anderson to the public or the City Council, even as he introduced legislation beneficial to those he owed a substantial debt.

The unusual financial arrangements came to light only after a May 3 Reporter expose uncovered documents showing he'd taken the money. At first, Anello chose to deny the story, calling it "totally unfounded, false and defamatory." Later he admitted to taking the money, and even later admitted he hadn't yet paid back a dime. He hired noted criminal defense attorney Joel Daniels to represent him as federal agents, smelling blood, began to circle.

"A lot of times in Niagara County, it's difficult to tell whether someone had a criminal intent or was just being stupid," one source told the Reporter. "Clearly, though, in this case, we're not talking about lunch money. "Is what's been discovered so far indictable? Personally, I'd say yes," he added. "The question now is whether this was an isolated case or part of a larger pattern."

The federal grand jury seated in Buffalo began hearing evidence in the case on June 9, when Niagara County Elections Commissioners Scott Kiedrowski and Nancy Smith were called upon to appear, and produce all financial records submitted by the Friends of Vince Anello Committee between Jan. 1, 2003, and Dec.31, 2004. Neither the Anderson nor Kajfasz "loans" are listed on those records.

In addition to Winstanley, Kiedrowski and Smith, others known to have been interviewed by the FBI or testifying before the grand jury include Anderson's ex-wife Gail Anderson, City Council members Babe Rotella and Candra Thomason, former Anderson associate John Caputo, NFC Development Corp. Director Ralph Aversa and members of the Reporter staff.

Rotella said he is particularly troubled by the burgeoning scandal.

"It bothers me because this is another black eye for Niagara Falls and it's another black eye for the Italian-American community here," he said. "This is the last thing we needed."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Paul Campana has been assigned to direct the case. A tough prosecutor, Campana has been involved in a number of high-profile Justice Department cases going back to the 1980s, including the prosecutions of former Buffalo Bill Robb Riddick in 1991, Albion Police Chief James Prioetty in 2000 and the extradition back to Germany of accused killer and reputed Russian Mafia hitman David Kricheli earlier this year.

In the Anello case, sources close to the investigation said no fewer than three indictments are expected. Some expressed amazement that the government was already set to present evidence before a grand jury.

"These things can sometimes take years to unfold," said one. "In this case, the U.S. Attorney's office must feel pretty confident about the evidence it has."

In addition to the golf course giveaway and multiple shady deals involving Anderson, the feds are also looking into circumstances surrounding the bidding process for the city's proposed new public safety complex, the demolition of the former Third Street parking ramp and the use of city credit cards by Anello and City Administrator Dan Bristol.

The investigation has brought city government to a virtual standstill here, as developers fearful of being brought into the scandal are staying away in droves and the formerly Anello-friendly City Council now routinely balks at the mayor's initiatives, particularly those involving outside consultants and influence-peddlers.

After just 20 months in office, Anello's lame-duck status is such that the prospect of him even winning the Democratic Primary in 2007 seems unimaginable.

But the toughest toll is being borne by the city workers who now find themselves having to deal with the criminal justice system for no offense other than showing up to do their jobs.

Municipal employees have become increasingly paranoid working under the shadow of looming indictments. The morale of the workers was reflected on Aug. 12, when Anello hosted an employee picnic. Of the more than 600 city workers, fewer than 50 showed up for the event.

DOJ_NMG_0002583

"I've been here for a long time, and I didn't think it could get any worse than it was under (former mayor) Irene Elia," one City Hall employee told the Reporter. "But this is crazy. You're afraid to leave your office or talk to anyone in case you'll get subpoenaed, too."

For his part, Anello has displayed braggadocio bordering on the pathological.

"I know the way my enemies want to see it. I know how my friends feel. OK?" he told a skeptical television reporter. "Why should I be put in a position to answer a political attack by a political opponent in this venue?"

In a separate TV appearance in July, he went so far as to lay the blame for his monumentally poor judgment and colossal lack of ethics squarely where it belongs -- on other people.

"In Niagara County, and the Falls in particular, you've got more rats than cats, and the rats have their own newspaper," he said.

He was right, of course, though not in the way he intended.

Animal Rights Activist Pleads Guilty In U.S. Mink Release (AP)

AP, September 6, 2005

MADISON, Wis. - An animal rights activist accused of freeing thousands of minks across the U.S. Midwest has pleaded guilty and faces two years in prison.

Investigators say Peter Daniel Young, 28, and an accomplice raided farms in Wisconsin, South Dakota and Iowa in 1997, trespassing and cutting fences to release the small animals valued for their thick fur.

Young pleaded guilty Friday to two counts of animal enterprise terrorism. He is believed to be a member of the Animal Liberation Front, a radical group that aims to destroy animal industries it considers inhumane.

Young and his accomplice, Justin Samuel, both disappeared after they were indicted in 1998, but Samuel was captured in Belgium the following year. He struck a deal with prosecutors and served two years in prison.

Young remained at large until March, when police arrested him for trying to shoplift CDs in California.

Rumor Keeps Waltz Alive (AP)

By MATT GOURAS, Associated Press

AP, September 6, 2005

NASHVILLE - All lawmakers can do is watch and wait as a federal probe into bribery and corruption at the state Capitol continues to sink colleagues.

Legislators said they have heard the rumors that more arrests are on the way, but don't know if it will include local officials like the one nabbed last week or more state lawmakers.

Advertisement

Like in May, when four sitting lawmakers were arrested on their way to work, they expect to be the last to know.

"I believe the Department of Justice and the FBI know a lot more about these investigations than I do," said House Speaker Jimmy Naifeh.

Just last week, pressure mounted in the Legislature to react when former state Rep. Chris Newton pleaded guilty and resigned. At the same time, it became very clear the Tennessee Waltz sting is not over.

Another indictment was handed up last week, this time against a local Shelby County official, as the grand jury sent notice its work isn't finished.

It's unknown if other lawmakers will be arrested - and federal authorities are predictably quiet about their ongoing investigation - or if Newton is now feeding them information.

"I just hear there are other indictments coming down," said House Republican caucus chairman Charles Sargent of Franklin. "No one has said if it's just going to be county commissioners or local school board members or legislators.

"I don't think any of us truly knows except for the grand jury and the FBI."

The lawmakers have proven ready to address arrested colleagues once they resign - as in the case of Newton and former state Sen. John Ford, who is pleading innocent.

But lawmakers are by and large taking it easy on the two who are staying in office and fighting the charges, Sens. Ward Crutchfield and Kathryn Bowers.

Sen. Doug Jackson, D-Dickson, said they should only resign "if they know in their heart of hearts" they are guilty.

"I believe them innocent until proven guilty," said Sen. Tommy Kilby, D-Wartburg.

Legislators, defending themselves against charges from Newton that what he did is "business as usual" in Nashville, were angry and indignant at comments likely to worsen their public image.

"I have never heard of a bribe being offered in my 18 years (in the Legislature)," said Jackson.

Lawmakers are trying their best at damage control, though, and are rushing work by a special panel to draft tougher ethics laws for the state. But leaders say new guilty pleas or arrests won't force them to rush their work, or change their plans.

Naifeh said he would continue "waiting and listening" as the Tennessee Waltz case unfolds rather than talk about it.

Gov. Phil Bredesen, who has his own panel drafting ideas for new laws in anticipation of a special session late this year or early next year, said officials already have more than enough reason to act.

"The arrests in the spring are plenty enough to focus on this," he said.

Bredesen said he thinks it's best for his independent panel to finish its work first, especially since it is removed from the legislative environment.

"Let's do this in an orderly fashion. Let's get their (independent ethics panel) report first. Let's get some meaningful legislation. Then let's call a special session."

Ex-mayor, Co-felons Sentenced In Bribe Case (CLPD)

By Mike Tobin, Plain Dealer Reporter

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, September 6, 2005

Emmanuel Onunwor was once the picture of success. He emigrated from Nigeria, earned a master's degree and was elected mayor of East Cleveland.

Holes have been punched in that success story for more than two years since Onunwor tearfully admitted to FBI agents that he took bribes from businessman Nate Gray. The latest blow came Friday in U.S. District Court when Onunwor, 46, was sentenced to nine years in prison.

"The conduct you engaged in was, in a major way, a complete betrayal of the citizens," U.S. District Judge James Gwin told Onunwor. "You caused the city major damage in terms of their economics."

Onunwor, who took about $50,000 in bribes, was contrite.

"I apologize to my family, my friends and the citizens," said Onunwor, dressed in a navy blue prison jump suit. "I did wrong. I deserve to be punished."

He shaved about 10 years off his sentence by agreeing to testify against Gray.

But he made that agreement only after a jury found him guilty of racketeering and bribery. Gray was convicted of conspiracy and fraud charges last month and is to be sentenced this fall with co-defendant businessman Gilbert Jackson of New Orleans.

Onunwor was also ordered to pay more than $5 million in restitution - the amount of contracts that he steered to companies doing business with Gray. All sides agree that Onunwor is broke and unlikely to be able to pay the money. Upon his release, however, a portion of his income will be paid to the government.

Four others were sentenced Friday in the corruption scheme in which bribes were exchanged for public contracts in Cleveland, East Cleveland, Houston and New Orleans.

Ricardo Teamor, a onetime associate of former Cleveland Mayor Michael R. White, was sentenced to four months in prison and four months of house arrest. He paid bribes to former Cleveland Councilman Joe Jones, who is to be sentenced next month.

As part of his plea deal, Teamor told prosecutors about widespread corruption during the $500 million expansion at Cleveland Hopkins International Airport when White was mayor. He said he allowed his construction company to be used as a front company to help contractors get around a city program requiring that some work be subcontracted to companies owned by minorities.

Teamor, 59, of Aurora, told officials that most of the minority-owned companies doing work at the airport were actually front companies that paid kickbacks to Gray. Teamor has met with a special investigator hired by Mayor Jane Campbell to probe Teamor's allegations, lawyers said.

"He's trying to ensure the program will continue on and operate as it was intended," said Robert Dixon, Teamor's attorney.

A former Houston building services director, Monique McGilbra, 41, was sentenced to three years in prison. She admitted to accepting cash and lavish gifts such as a $700 purse and all-expenses-paid trips to New Orleans from Gray and two businessmen trying to get contracts with Houston.

Former Honeywell executive Brent Jividen, 43, was sentenced to 2½ years in prison. Jividen of Medina admitted to bribing McGilbra with gifts.

Oliver Spellman, 51, of Brooklyn, N.Y., was given two years' probation for accepting bribes from Gray while serving as chief of staff to the mayor of Houston. Spellman previously worked as director of parks and recreation under White.

Ex-city Official Given 3-year Sentence (HC)

By Dan Feldstein

Houston Chronicle, September 6, 2005

Former city of Houston official Monique McGilbra was sentenced to three years in federal prison Friday for accepting bribes from a Cleveland businessman, while former mayoral chief of staff Oliver Spellman got probation for a similar crime.

McGilbra apparently earned the disdain of U.S. District Judge James Gwin in his Cleveland courtroom, insisting that she thought the gifts she accepted from businessmen seeking city work were purely part of dating.

In a trial against the businessman this summer, she testified that she took gifts from five people or companies seeking business with the city building services department she supervised.

McGilbra told Gwin at her sentencing that she was "a woman, a mother and a lover" and that it shouldn't be a crime to have expensive tastes, according to the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

"My involvement with the men in this case was primarily personal that became business. There were personal advances. I never had my position or City Hall for sale," she told the judge.

McGilbra, who resigned her city post in April 2003, will be sent to prison after she is sentenced on a similar guilty plea in Houston on Tuesday. The U.S. attorney's office here plans to ask that any prison time run concurrently with her Cleveland sentence.

Prosecutors in Ohio have long pursued Cleveland businessman Nate Gray, a gregarious friend of the former Cleveland mayor whose "consulting" clients always seemed to fare well with local governments. They finally got their man last month in a trial in which McGilbra and Spellman both testified against him to reduce their sentences.

The investigation spilled into Houston because Gray was friendly with Spellman, who served as Cleveland's parks director before coming here in the same capacity and being promoted by former Mayor Lee Brown as his chief of staff.

While Spellman and McGilbra both pleaded guilty, Gray fought the charges, earning a conviction and giving prosecutors a chance to lay out the alleged bribery conspiracy.

Spellman took $2,000 from Gray and in bugged phone calls offered Gray inside information on airport and parking meter contracts. Through the wiretaps it was learned that Mayor Brown's brother, Earl, was a paid "sub-consultant" to Gray.

Gray showered McGilbra with a trip to the Super Bowl and other gifts on behalf of Honeywell, which wanted a piece of a city energy contract won by Reliant.

The charge in Houston, for which McGilbra has also pleaded guilty, revolves around gifts she received from local businessman Andy Schatte and his Keystone Group. Keystone offered McGilbra's then-boyfriend $250,000 if Keystone got a fire station deal with McGilbra's department.

McGilbra, 41, is divorced with two school-age children. She received the upper range of her plea-agreed sentencing range of 30-37 months, plus a $5,000 fine.

Spellman, 51, got probation plus a $10,000 fine.

Prosecutors protested that Spellman's sentence was too light. But Gwin said he thought Spellman was a decent person who had made a bad mistake.

"It was a complete lack of judgment on your part. Defendant Gray used your friendship to line his own pockets. You had something of a stellar career throughout your life. Except for your substance abuse problem, it appears you were an exemplary public official," he told Spellman, according to the Plain Dealer.

Also sentenced Friday was former Cleveland-based Honeywell employee Brent Jividen, 43, who got 30 months in prison.

A former Cleveland attorney received four months and the former mayor of East Cleveland, who took regular payments of cash across a table from Gray, received nine years.

Gray, a Cleveland City Council member and a New Orleans businessman all await sentencing in the case.

Federal officials have said more investigations are ongoing in Houston but have declined to offer details.

Check Was In The Mail, But Thieves Were At Mailbox (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 6, 2005

What makes Joseph Mo Pun Lau's federal case so audacious isn't what he's accused of stealing. It's how he allegedly pulled it off.

Lau, an intuitive Hong Kong fugitive, was already an established identity thief by late 2003, according to the FBI. Using a crude tool, agents said, he fished envelopes from street-corner mail-collection boxes throughout the Philadelphia suburbs, counterfeiting whatever checks and credit cards he found inside.

And yet, an accomplice told the FBI, Lau had become frustrated by the slow, risky and unpredictable process of snaring letters one at a time.

So Lau allegedly came up with a clever way to reel in a bigger catch: He surreptitiously videotaped letter carriers as they opened the boxes, zooming in on their keys. Lau used those images to calculate measurements for the grooves in the keys and created brass duplicates.

With these homemade keys, Lau pilfered mail-collection boxes in Exton, Wayne, Frazer, Devon and the Southwark neighborhood of Philadelphia, as well as unidentified towns in New Jersey and Maryland, according to a criminal complaint.

When Lau couldn't do the job himself, he shipped a key to an accomplice and e-mailed the global-positioning-system location of the targeted collection boxes, authorities said.

"The FBI is not aware of anything else like this," bureau spokeswoman Jerri Williams said.

Lau, 46, appears to be a serious fellow, once admonishing an accomplice that "every day is a working day," according to an FBI transcript.

He and his wife lived in an $800-a-month apartment in Parlin, N.J. He was unemployed and drove a 1999 Ford Expedition. (The vanity plates read "HVYDUTY.") He owes $30,000 on his credit cards, records show.

Lau has one previous criminal conviction - in Atlantic City in 1999 for putting shaved quarters into slot machines; the technique can earn a winning player an extra 25 cents a pull.

"Joe's a very smart guy, a gentleman, someone who makes a good impression," said J. David Alcantara, his lawyer in the slots case.

After his casino conviction, Lau was ordered deported. When he missed a deadline to leave voluntarily, officials issued a warrant.

Lau remained free until shortly before midnight Aug. 17, when postal inspectors and FBI agents apprehended him as he left a Chester apartment - a safe house that authorities say he and the accomplice used to make forged keys and documents.

When Lau was arrested, he was carrying a backpack, a duffel bag, and a computer bag, authorities said. Inside the bags, agents said, they found six cell phones, a copy of a U.S. Postal Service collection-box key, two picture albums of post offices and collection boxes, bogus checkbooks, and keys to private mailboxes, such as those at Mailboxes Etc. and UPS stores. Authorities said Lau was also carrying a variety of forged documents - including passports, Social Security cards, New Jersey driver's licenses, and resident alien cards.

Lau's gang stole $140,000 worth of checks, counterfeited them, and deposited them in 16 different bank accounts, according to an affidavit by Philadelphia-based FBI Agent Catherine L. Nowery.

Lau was charged with bank fraud, mail fraud, and illegal possession of postal keys - and ordered held without bail.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Zane D. Memeger, and Lau's lawyer, Elliot Cohen of Philadelphia, declined comment on Friday.

Postal inspectors first discovered the collection-box heists in the Philadelphia area in February, when they noticed empty collection boxes. But the case was not cracked until this summer, when an FBI agent recognized Lau's accomplice from bank surveillance photos.

Authorities confronted the accomplice on Aug. 2, and he agreed to cooperate, according to court records. The accomplice is not identified in the court filings, but authorities said he had been told he was likely to be charged in the case.

Inside the accomplice's Chester apartment, agents and inspectors found a $600 key-making machine, a thin-line grinder, a bag of homemade and blank keys, a Sony Mini DV Handycam, a JVC Digital video camera, and nine boxes of blank check-writing stock. They also found small cardboard boxes with holes in them, ones allegedly used to conceal the cameras that filmed the letter carriers.

Last week, Lau agreed to help authorities catch an alleged third member of the gang, Xiao Chun Chen, a 41-year-old illegal alien from China who lives in Atlantic City, and who also has been convicted of cheating at slots.

According to a court filing, U.S. Postal Inspector D. James Bannan arranged for Lau to call Chen on Wednesday and ask to meet Friday at the bus station at 10th and Filbert Streets in Philadelphia, near a favorite ATM machine.

When Chen arrived, he was arrested.

New Prosecutor Will Focus On Gang Crimes (BSUN)

By Matthew Dolan, Sun Staff

The Baltimore Sun, September 6, 2005

Justice Department officials have approved funding of a new federal prosecutor to exclusively handle gang-related prosecutions inside Maryland's U.S. attorney's office.

The move comes after a sweeping indictment last month against 19 suspected members of the Hispanic gang MS-13 who were arrested on federal racketeering charges that include a string of homicides and attempted killings in Montgomery and Prince George's counties.

U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein, who took office this summer, said he told Justice Department officials that the state had an urgent need to beef up its prosecutorial resources to focus on gangs in suburban Washington and on gun-related crime in the Baltimore region.

His office has 65 prosecutors split between the state's two federal courts in Baltimore and Greenbelt. Rosenstein plans to fill five vacant slots within the next few months. A new agreement with the city will bring two additional prosecutors to Baltimore to handle gun-related prosecutions.

It was unclear where the new gang prosecutor will work. Rosenstein said Greenbelt would be the likely choice because an organized-crime prosecutor in Baltimore already focuses on the city's drug-related gang activity and because the new prosecutor approved last week would more likely target such gangs as MS-13 in the Washington region.

"MS-13 is a new and specific challenge in Montgomery and Prince George's," Rosenstein said. "A major focus of our anti-gang strategy remains to combat loosely organized, street-level, violent drug gangs in Baltimore. [The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosive's] Violent Crime Impact Team is a big part of our anti-gang program in Baltimore, and it is working well."

Andrea Smith, an assistant U.S. attorney in Baltimore who helps coordinate the local Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force, said the new anti-gang prosecutor should help prosecutors who have used a similar strategy against drug-related, violent organizations, such as the Lexington Terrace gang in the city.

"We target a neighborhood under siege," Smith said. "These organizations are multijurisdictional and often nationwide in scope. We start to piece together what's going on, where the connective tissue is and then scoop out that group."

The indictments announced against MS-13 tie reputed gang members, including a Baltimore carpenter, to murders and other crimes from April 2003 through June of this year. Prosecutors accused them of kidnappings, drive-by shootings and a killing in a cemetery. Six people were slain in suburban Washington, and authorities say gang members attempted to kill another five.

MS-13, also known as Mara Salvatrucha, originated in Los Angeles among refugees from El Salvador. Members also come from Guatemala, Honduras and Mexico. Mara refers to a gang, while Salva is an abbreviation for Salvadoran. Trucha is slang for "fear us," according to federal authorities.

An estimated 10,000 MS-13 members are in the United States, many in the Washington suburbs, which has a large population of Central American immigrants. Montgomery County police said they believe at least 500 gang members are active in the county, many of them part of MS-13.

Double Shooting Kills Man In PG (WT)

By Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, September 6, 2005

A double shooting early yesterday in Suitland left one man dead, marking the sixth homicide in Prince George's County in the first five days of September.

The shooting occurred in the 4600 block of Chelsea Way at about 1 a.m., said Cpl. Clinton Copeland, a spokesman for Prince George's County Police.

Kenneth Stanford, 22, of the 4700 block of Hudson Avenue had been shot several times. He was taken to a hospital, where he died. Also shot was a 28-year-old man, who was hospitalized.

The killing brings the number of homicides this year in Prince George's County to 119, up from 96 at this time last year.

The county has experienced a spate of violence since Thursday, when Charmaine Edwards, 21, of Southwest was found fatally shot in her car on Keystone Manor Drive in Morningside.

Four persons were fatally shot in the county Friday. Three of those killings occurred in the daylight hours.

•Dorsey Tyler, 42, who lived on Sheriff Road, was killed at about 3:10 p.m. in the 1500 block of Village Green Drive.

•Abdul Gregory Leftwich, 18, was killed at about 4:50 p.m. in the 1700 block of Kenilworth Avenue where he lived.

•Angelo Lorenzo Braddy, 21, was killed at about 10 p.m. in the 1500 block of Ray Road in the Hyattsville area.

Cpl. Copeland said no arrests have been made in those cases, but James Esau Davis, with no fixed address, has been identified as a suspect in connection with Mr. Leftwich's death and a warrant for first-degree murder has been issued for his arrest.

"As of right now, there's nothing indicating that [the cases] are related, but that's just preliminary. The investigations are ongoing." Cpl. Copeland said.

Also over the Labor Day weekend, Anne Arundel County police charged Brandon Iam Kellam, 16, with second-degree murder after the stabbing death of a 17-year-old boy outside a Glen Burnie mall Saturday night.

Police said Kevin Michael Weingart of Glen Burnie and a group of friends became involved in an altercation with another group in the parking lot of Marley Station Mall.

As the dispute escalated, the teenager was stabbed in the torso. He was flown by helicopter to the University of Maryland Shock Trauma Center, where he was pronounced dead.

In the District, Metropolitan Police are investigating a fatal shooting that happened at about 9 p.m. Saturday in the 3700 block of Hayes Street Northeast.

Police said they found Derrick Jones, 22, of the 3700 block of Cassell Place Northeast with gunshot wounds to his head and body. Police said they don't have any suspects or a motive in the case and that they are searching for witnesses.

Through Friday, the District had recorded 128 homicides, compared with 129 at the same time last year.

Successful Lobby Shops Build On BRAC Victories (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, September 6, 2005

Some high-powered Washington lobbying shops are banking on their freshly collected laurels to get even more business from the communities that hired them to get military bases off the Pentagon's chopping block.

As the independent Base Closure and Realignment (BRAC) Commission is getting ready to send its final deliberations to President Bush on Sept. 8, lobbyists are monitoring the BRAC process here in Washington while corralling communities to extend their contracts.

"They have done well in BRAC, and we [want] to continue the momentum because the Department of Defense is making many changes," said John Simmons, a senior adviser at law firm Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld LLP.

The Pentagon is undertaking a sweeping review of capabilities, called the quadrennial defense review.

A boon in business for the Washington lobbying shops can come from a whole range of issues, from defense appropriations to military construction, such as new technology centers and housing for those bases that are receiving more troops.

Among Washington lobbying shops scoring large victories for their clients are the Rhoads Group and Kutak Rock LLP, which represented Ellsworth Air Force Base in South Dakota; the Washington Group, which defended the Naval Submarine Base New London in Connecticut; Patton Boggs, which represented the Portsmouth Naval Shipyard in Maine; Akin Gump, which worked for the states of New York, Kansas, Maryland and Arkansas; and Spectrum Group, which represented the state of Louisiana and a large Defense Finance and Accounting Service center in Cleveland.

"We are up to speed on [the communities'] issues as part of BRAC, as we argued their military value. They are comfortable with us, and we are going to compete for more contracts," Simmons told The Hill.

Because no other BRAC round is planned yet, the success of a lobbying firm in the 2005 BRAC round can lead to representation of defense issues for installation-related matters, said Jim Noone, a lobbyist with the Washington Group, a Ketchum company.

"Getting BRAC residual business is down the road," said Noone, who was part of the team representing New London, Conn.

While several lobbying shops contacted by The Hill said that they did not receive so-called "success fees" for their work on BRAC, Keith Ashdown with Taxpayers for Common Sense said that it is possible for these firms to have an understanding with the communities to be retained for several more years.

Akin Gump, which worked with the lobbying group Hyjek and Fix to represent a number of states and communities in this BRAC round and has achieved a 100 percent success rate for its clients, according to Simmons.

The lobby consortium represented the state of New York, the state of Kansas, three communities in Maryland, the Alliance of Pine Bluff, Ark., and the state of New Mexico.

Maryland is one of the largest gainers in BRAC, and it is in Maryland that the firm has its eyes on further representation. Akin Gump represented the Navy Alliance at Indian Head, Md., the Southern Maryland Navy Alliance at Patuxent River, Md., and Harford County.

The community at Indian Head is planning to build an energetics center in proximity to the University of Maryland, which has a strong program in energetics, Simmons said. The Indian Head alliance already spent upward of $290,000 in lobbying fees since 2003.

With the Navy's budget unpredictable in the future, Patuxent River will also have to continue its legislative presence, said Simmons.

"This is something they need to meet about, but we were told that they were interested," Simmons said. The southern Maryland alliance also hired the PMA Group to lobby for its defense interests.

Meanwhile, Cannon Air Force Base in New Mexico, which was slated for closure, will stay open until 2009. The BRAC Commission directed the Pentagon to evaluate its need for the base.

"It could be the home of the future Airborne Laser Program," Simmons said, hinting at potential lobbying material for the firm.

Kansas, projected to receive thousands of new soldiers at several installations, may need to continue its military counsel, said Simmons. "That is something that they would be discussing later this fall," he said. "We would compete for that contract."

New York state has the longest-standing relationship with Hyjek and Fix and Akin Gump. Hyjek and Fix has been representing New York communities' interest since 1998.

Akin Gump won a contract two years ago to represent New York state interests. The state was reeling from previous base closures, Simmons said, and was trying not to repeat mistakes.

According to lobbying disclosures, the Empire State Development Co. paid $520,000 in lobbying fees to Akin Gump by the end of 2004.

The Niagara Area Chamber of Commerce spent $380,000 in fees to Hyjek and Fix up to the end of 2004. Disclosures for 2005 are not yet available, and the companies refused to reveal their fees.

"New York was set to lose more than 1,000 jobs, had the DoD recommendations been adopted," Simmons said. "As a result of the BRAC decisions, the state will gain more than 1,000 jobs."

Punching power comes with a certain price tag. Former Rep. Bill Paxon (R-N.Y.), who was chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee and is now a senior adviser at Akin Gump, represented the interests of New York.

9th Circuit: Sexual Content Not Needed For Harassment (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

Law.com, September 6, 2005

You don't have to be a groper, lecher or explicit misogynist to get sued for sex-based harassment, a three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled Friday.

The opinion, in a case originating at an Alaska teachers union, said that Thomas Harvey, a manager accused of "shouting, 'screaming,' foul language, invading employees' personal space ... and [making] threatening gestures" may be sued for gender-based discrimination under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, even though his acts were not overtly motivated by the victims' gender.

"We hold that offensive conduct that is not facially sex-specific nonetheless may violate Title VII if there is sufficient circumstantial evidence of qualitative and quantitative differences in the harassment suffered by female and male employees," wrote Senior Judge Alfred Goodwin in a unanimous decision.

Senior Judge Melvin Brunetti and Judge William Fletcher concurred. In the case, male and female employees agreed that women bore the brunt of Harvey's outbursts.

Employment lawyers said the opinion offers encouragement to plaintiff lawyers whose clients don't fit the traditional mold of harassment victims.

"I think it's a good decision for plaintiffs," said Jack Lee, a partner at Minami, Lew & Tamaki who specializes in gender discrimination suits.

The opinion stands to strengthen plaintiffs' arguments that adverse effects of an employer's behavior are more important than intent.

"Before, it was pretty clear that you didn't have to be lusting after" an employee to be held liable for discrimination, Lee said. "But here, it's bullying that might create an adverse impact."

Particularly significant, Lee said, was Goodwin's statement that "this case illustrates an alternative motivational theory in which an abusive bully takes advantage of a traditionally female workplace because he is more comfortable when bullying women than when bullying men."

DOJ_NMG_0002591

Such alternative theories, Lee said, would be useful in cases like one he handled last year for an Air Force surgeon. The surgeon said she had been treated differently than her male counterparts, even though she was not called names or explicitly abused for being a woman.

While a jury eventually awarded his client $500,000, Lee said the case was a challenge because doctors tend not to act in stereotypically discriminatory ways. Friday's opinion, he said, could help overcome that hurdle.

"Highly educated people don't have that kind of roughhouse environment, but there can be sex harassment nonetheless," said Lee. Shelley Gregory, a staff attorney at the Legal Aid Society-Employment Law Center in San Francisco, agreed.

"It's not always the case that we have a smoking gun," she said. "What I think the court is doing is recognizing the evolving nature of harassment in the workplace." Gilmore Diekmann Jr., a partner at Seyfarth Shaw who defends employers in harassment suits, was less enthused.

He said the opinion is unclear on the most alarming point it raises: that subjective effects of an employer's behavior may be used to determine whether there was discrimination.

"It's unique and probably wrong" if the court meant that people's different reactions to the same behavior could form the basis for a discrimination claim, he said. "It seems to be some effort by a panel to possibly inject a new type of liability," he added.

The opinion, Christopher v. National Education Association, 05 C.D.O.S. 7999, sends the case of plaintiff Carol Christopher back to the U.S. District Court for the District of Alaska, which had dismissed the suit.

11th Circuit: Jail Was Right To Conduct Strip Search (LAW)

By Scott Simonson, Fulton County Daily Report

Law.com, September 6, 2005

Atlanta's federal appeals court, with apparent reluctance, ruled Wednesday that a North Georgia county's policy of strip-searching every prisoner booked into jail violated the Constitution.

The court also noted that the policy didn't necessarily violate the rights of individual prisoners who were searched, so long as jailers had "reasonable suspicion" that a detainee might possess weapons or contraband.

The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals made the ruling in the case of Janet M. Hicks, who sued Habersham County's sheriff and jail supervisor after she was strip-searched following her 2001 misdemeanor arrest for a domestic-violence dispute with her estranged husband. Hicks v. Moore, No. 03-13686.

According to the 11th Circuit's ruling, Hicks was strip-searched by a female sheriff's department employee and was not touched during the search.

About three years ago -- and after Hicks' strip search -- the sheriff in charge of the jail at that time, Richard Moore, changed the jail's policy, and the facility no longer strip-searches everyone who is booked.

Hicks' suit did not name the county as a defendant but targeted Moore, the jail commander and other individuals who supervised or participated in her detention and search. Current Habersham County Sheriff DeRay Fincher could not be reached for comment.

A unanimous three-judge panel ruled that the jail did not violate Hicks' rights, because her arrest for a violent crime justified a strip search. The 11th Circuit effectively ended Hicks' federal case against the jail and reversed a district court ruling that denied the Habersham government employees' motion for summary judgment.

Chief Judge J.L. Edmondson wrote the opinion, joined by Judge Frank M. Hull and U.S. District Judge B. Avant Edenfield of the Southern District of Georgia, sitting by designation.

QUESTIONING PRECEDENT

Edmondson, with apparent unease, ruled that circuit precedent didn't allow Habersham's practice of strip-searching everyone booked at the jail. This ruling marks the second time in the past four months that Edmondson has written an opinion expressing dissatisfaction with the circuit's precedent on strip searches.

His opinion stopped short of endorsing circuit precedent or condemning the jail's policy. He added, in a footnote, "We personally question that such a practice violates the Fourth Amendment," noting that the circuit's precedent justifies strip searches only when a "reasonable suspicion" indicates that a detainee could possess weapons or contraband, according to the court's 2001 ruling in Wilson v. Jones, 251 F.3d 1340.

Edmondson pointed out that the "reasonable suspicion" standard remains stricter than what the U.S. Supreme Court requires.

In May, in another opinion written by Edmondson, a full 12-judge panel of the 11th Circuit voiced unease with its precedent on strip searches. In that case, Edmondson wrote, "most of us are uncertain that jailers are required to have a reasonable suspicion of weapons or contraband before strip-searching -- for security and safety purposes -- arrestees bound for the general jail population." Evans v. Stephens, 407 F.3d 1272.

SUFFICIENT REASON TO SEARCH

In Hicks' case, the court found that the strip search did not violate her constitutional rights, eliminating the basis for her federal suit.

"Just because she was strip-searched at a jail that had a search practice that would generally violate the Constitution does not mean every search that was conducted actually violated the Constitution," Edmondson wrote.

Because Hicks was arrested on a misdemeanor charge of family violence battery -- obviously, a crime of violence, according to the opinion -- jail officials had sufficient reason to suspect hidden weapons or contraband, Edmondson wrote.

However, the opinion pointed out that the arresting officer and jail supervisor in Hicks' case testified that they did not suspect Hicks of having weapons or drugs.

"Whether reasonable suspicion existed at the time is a question of law to be determined ultimately by judges, not policemen or jailers," Edmondson wrote. "The subjective intentions and beliefs of the jailers conducting the strip-search are 'immaterial to the Fourth Amendment analysis,'" according to the 1989 U.S. Supreme Court case Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386.

Terry E. Williams of Lawrenceville, Ga., who represented Moore, the former Habersham sheriff, and other county employees, could not be reached for comment.

One of the attorneys representing Hicks, Scott D. Delius of the Delius Law Firm, said Thursday that he was disappointed with the outcome and that his client hasn't decided whether she'll pursue the case.

"We at least feel good about the fact that there's no longer a blanket strip-search policy at the jail and that jails are taking the issue seriously," said Delius, who represented Hicks along with J. Matthew Maguire Jr. of Balch & Bingham.

Lawsuit To Be Filed Over New Voting Law In Georgia (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

ATLANTA, Sept. 5 (AP) - Opponents of a new Georgia law requiring voters to show photo identification at the polls are planning a federal lawsuit challenging the measure, which they fear will lower voter turnout.

The bill eliminates the use of formerly accepted forms of voter identification like Social Security cards, birth certificates or utility bills.

A news conference to discuss the lawsuit was set for Tuesday, said State Representative Tyrone L. Brooks Sr., Democrat of Atlanta.

The suit is likely to echo the complaints that several groups filed in objection letters sent to the Department of Justice before it approved the new law last month.

Under the Voting Rights Act, Georgia and other states with a history of suppressing minority voting must get federal permission to change their voting laws.

Mr. Brooks said he believed the issue could ultimately be decided by the United States Supreme Court. "No matter who wins at the lower court level, there will be appeals," he said.

The Republican-backed measure caused racial tension during the state's legislative session last spring. Most of Georgia's black lawmakers walked out at the Capitol when it was approved.

Democrats had argued that the idea was a political move by the Republican Party to depress voting among minorities, the elderly and the poor, all traditional bases for Democrats.

Plaintiffs in the suit include the Coalition for the People's Agenda, whose chairman is the Rev. Joseph Lowery; the Georgia Association of Black Elected Officials; the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. The American Civil Liberties Union is representing the plaintiffs in the case.

The groups plan to include Georgia voters as co-plaintiffs, especially those who would be "grossly affected by the proposal," Mr. Brooks said.

Several other states request photo identification, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures. Most allow voters without photo ID to use other forms of identification or sign an affidavit of identity.

Exploiting The Gender Gap (NYT)

By Warren Farrell

The New York Times, September 5, 2005

Carlsbad, Calif. — Nothing disturbs working women more than the statistics often mentioned on Labor Day showing that they are paid only 76 cents to men's dollar for the same work. If that were the whole story, it should disturb all of us; like many men, I have two daughters and a wife in the work force.

When I was on the board of the National Organization for Women in New York City, I blamed discrimination for that gap. Then I asked myself, "If an employer has to pay a man one dollar for the same work a woman would do for 76 cents, why would anyone hire a man?"

Perhaps, I thought, male bosses undervalue women. But I discovered that in 2000, women without bosses - who own their own businesses - earned only 49 percent of male business owners. Why? When the Rochester Institute of Technology surveyed business owners with M.B.A.'s from one top business school, they found that money was the primary motivator for only 29 percent of the women, versus 76 percent of the men. Women put a premium on autonomy, flexibility (25- to 35-hour weeks and proximity to home), fulfillment and safety.

After years of research, I discovered 25 differences in the work-life choices of men and women. All 25 lead to men earning more money, but to women having better lives.

High pay, as it turns out, is about tradeoffs. Men's tradeoffs include working more hours (women work more around the home); taking more dangerous, dirtier and outdoor jobs (garbage collecting, construction, trucking); relocating and traveling; and training for technical jobs with less people contact (like engineering).

Is the pay gap, then, about the different choices of men and women? Not quite. It's about parents' choices. Women who have never been married and are childless earn 117 percent of their childless male counterparts. (This comparison controls for education, hours worked and age.) Their decisions are more like married men's, and never-married men's decisions are more like women's in general (careers in arts, no weekend work, etc.)

Does this imply that mothers sacrifice careers? Not really. Surveys of men and women in their 20's find that both sexes (70 percent of men, and 63 percent of women) would sacrifice pay for more family time. The next generation's discussion will be about who gets to be the primary parent.

Don't women, though, earn less than men in the same job? Yes and no. For example, the Bureau of Labor Statistics lumps together all medical doctors. Men are more likely to be surgeons (versus general practitioners) and work in private practice for hours that are longer and less predictable, and for more years. In brief, the same job is not the same. Are these women's choices? When I taught at a medical school, I saw that even my first-year female students eyed specialties with fewer and more predictable hours.

But don't female executives also make less than male executives? Yes. Discrimination? Let's look. The men are more frequently executives of national and international firms with more personnel and revenues, and responsible for bottom-line sales, marketing and finances, not human resources or public relations. They have more experience, relocate and travel overseas more, and so on.

Comparing men and women with the "same jobs," then, is to compare apples and oranges. However, when all 25 choices are the same, the great news for women is that then the women make more than the men. Is there discrimination against women? Yes, like the old boys' network. And sometimes discrimination against women becomes discrimination against men: in hazardous fields, women suffer fewer hazards. For example, more than 500 marines have died in the war in Iraq. All but two were men. In other fields, men are virtually excluded - try getting hired as a male dental hygienist, nursery school teacher, cocktail waiter.

There are 80 jobs in which women earn more than men - positions like financial analyst, speech-language pathologist, radiation therapist, library worker, biological technician, motion picture projectionist. Female sales engineers make 143 per cent of their male counterparts; female statisticians earn 135 percent.

I want my daughters to know that people who work 44 hours a week make, on average, more than twice the pay of someone working 34 hours a week. And that pharmacists now earn almost as much as doctors. But only by abandoning our focus on discrimination against women can we discover these opportunities for women.

California To Vote On Marriage (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, September 6, 2005

A bill legalizing homosexual "marriage" in California is scheduled to go up for its second vote in the state Assembly this week, amid vigorous lobbying.

"We intend to keep the Assembly members' feet to the fire," said Benjamin Lopez, a leader of the Traditional Values Coalition. "If they support marriage for one man and one woman, like their constituents voted, they will vote against AB 849."

Mr. Lopez and his allies think California lawmakers legally cannot enact same-sex "marriage" because voters approved Proposition 22, which says only marriages involving one man and one woman are valid in California.

Homosexual rights supporters, however, think their message is the right one.

"We are so very close," Assemblyman Mark Leno said last week after his bill to legalize same-sex "marriage" passed the state Senate.

"It would be very disappointing for [the Assembly] not to be able to stand up for civil rights," he said.

In June, the Assembly rejected Mr. Leno's bill by four votes.

Meanwhile, two same-sex "marriage"-related decisions are expected in Massachusetts this month.

Either today or tomorrow, Massachusetts Attorney General Tom Reilly is expected to issue his decision on whether to certify a constitutional marriage amendment filed by a citizens' group called VoteOnMarriage.org.

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican, supports the amendment, which must garner nearly 66,000 certified signatures and two legislative approvals before it can get on a 2008 ballot.

However, dozens of homosexual rights groups and lawyers have urged Mr. Reilly not to certify the amendment. They say it is unconstitutional in light of the 2003 Goodridge decision, which legalized same-sex "marriage" in Massachusetts, the groups say.

Meanwhile, on Sept. 14, the Massachusetts legislature is scheduled to meet in a constitutional convention to offer a second vote on a marriage amendment that passed last year.

The amendment, which would disallow same-sex "marriage" but create civil unions, is unpopular. However, if Mr. Reilly rejects VoteOnMarriage.org's amendment, some lawmakers may decide to vote in favor of the civil-union amendment.

It's also possible that this month the Washington State Supreme Court will issue its pivotal ruling on mandating same-sex "marriage" in that state.

Traditional-values groups hope the court will uphold the state's Defense of Marriage Act, which was passed by a supermajority of lawmakers and clarifies that marriage involves only one man and one woman.

But homosexual rights groups hope the court will make Washington the second state to legalize same-sex "marriage" -- especially since, unlike Massachusetts, Washington doesn't have a residency law to block out-of-state couples from marrying there.

"We are all waiting -- anticipating the decision with bated breath," said Fran Dunaway, executive director of Equal Rights Washington in Seattle.

ANTITRUST:

Retail Giant Cries 'Unfair' (LAT)

By Evelyn Iritani, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 6, 2005

Wal-Mart Stores Inc., the retail giant infamous for crushing competitors and putting mom-and-pop retailers out of business, is now worried that its British rival might be too big.

H. Lee Scott Jr., Wal-Mart's chief executive, told a London newspaper last week that British authorities should be concerned about a retail chain having too much market clout.

Tesco, Britain's largest supermarket, has a 30% share of the food market and is expanding fast, thanks in part to an aggressive discounting program. Wal-Mart-owned Asda Group Ltd., Britain's second-largest retail chain, controls 16% of the market.

"As you get over 30% and higher, I am sure there is a point where government is compelled to intervene, particularly in the U.K., where you have the planning laws that make it difficult to compete," Scott told the Times of London, adding that "at some point, the government has to look at it."

Those remarks raised some eyebrows in the United States, where the Bentonville, Ark., retailer is regularly accused of abusing its clout to squeeze pennies out of its supply chain, trounce its competition and expand its sales.

"Wal-Mart is asking for an antitrust investigation of a competitor?" asked Albert Foer, president of the American Antitrust Institute in Washington, a think tank. "How delicious."

Wal-Mart is known for its super-sized profile. It has the world's largest workforce, 1.6 million at last count, more than the entire population of Montana. And 138 million shoppers visit its 5,379 stores and restaurants worldwide each week, racking up $285 billion in sales in 2004.

The retailer's protestations leave people wondering why it would complain about Tesco, given that any debate over curbing power in the global retail market is likely to shine the spotlight on Bentonville.

"Wal-Mart has done a good job of escaping from close antitrust scrutiny in this country, and a lot of people are wondering whether they are vulnerable in this area," said Foer, who had persuaded Wal-Mart Chairman S. Robson Walton to address his annual antitrust conference in Washington last year.

Walton denied that Wal-Mart used its clout to bully suppliers and unfairly drive competitors out of business.

"The real secret to our low prices is not tied to the deals we get with suppliers," he said. "Rather, our low prices are derived from a company culture that is passionate about taking unnecessary cost out of the business and equally passionate about investing in more-efficient business practices."

Wal-Mart has 10% of the U.S. retail market. But in at least two other places, the company has come under the scrutiny of antitrust regulators. In 2002, Mexico's Federal Competition Commission looked into complaints that Wal-Mart de Mexico, known as Walmex, was forcing suppliers to charge the retail giant's competitors higher prices for the same products. After Walmex, the leading retailer, agreed to write to its purchasing department that such a practice was not allowed, the commission closed the investigation.

When Wal-Mart bought Supermercados Amigo Inc., the largest Puerto Rican grocery store chain in 2002, the U.S. Federal Trade Commission required that the company sell off four stores to ensure competition on the island.

But in Britain, where Wal-Mart bought the Asda chain in 1999, Tesco is the market leader. Nick Agarwal, an Asda spokesman in London, said Scott was not referring specifically to his firm's rival in the Times of London interview but was speaking generally about the dangers of market concentration.

"Lee did not say he wants an investigation of Tesco," he said. "What he did do was say that he understands why, when food market share reaches 30% or higher, the government might want to look at that."

Scott has had his own run-ins with Britain's antitrust regulators. In 2003, British authorities turned down Wal-Mart's bid to purchase Safeway, saying the combined stores would have too much clout. At that time, an Asda-Safeway chain would have controlled about 26% of the food market, less than Tesco has today.

Tesco declined to respond directly to Wal-Mart's comments. But in a written statement, the company said British authorities had already investigated the retail market and found that it "operates in the consumer interest."

Wal-Mart representatives insist that anti-competitive issues aren't a concern with their company, because it controls small portions of the market in most parts of the world.

"We're pretty small potatoes outside the U.S.," said William Wertz, a Wal-Mart spokesman in Bentonville. "It really hasn't been an issue."

Critics have suggested that Wal-Mart already poses a threat in some markets. Take Canada, for example, where the retailer has 256 stores and its share of department store sales has risen to 52%, according to Talbot Consultants International, a Toronto-based research firm.

Asked whether Wal-Mart could face antitrust scrutiny in Canada, Wertz said, "I can't answer that," adding that competition laws and market forces are different in every country.

But critics who have launched a global campaign to slow the retailer's expansion accused the company of doublespeak.

"The unmistakable irony here is that Wal-Mart is accusing its British competition of accomplishing exactly what it has planned for its U.S. operations," said Andrew Grossman, executive director of Wal-Mart Watch, an anti-Wal-Mart coalition backed by some of America's leading unions.

The emergence of big-box retailers such as Wal-Mart with global supply chains and markets has created new challenges for antitrust regulators who are constrained by outdated laws and national boundaries. Wal-Mart doesn't fit the traditional definition of a monopolist, an entity that uses its dominant market share to push up prices.

But Wal-Mart's growing influence as a buyer has prompted a debate in antitrust circles about whether a concentration of "buyer power," known as a monopsony, is harmful for society.

Some legal experts say that improved technology and the lowering of trade barriers has made it more difficult to determine when a global player is exerting too much power. For example, though global companies such as Wal-Mart and Tesco are improving efficiency and lowering costs, they may also be undermining societal goals such as preserving small businesses.

"It all comes back, at some point, to politics and to the vision people have of the kind of country they want," Foer said. "I'm not castigating Wal-Mart; I think they have done a lot of good things. I'm much more worried about where we go from here and what things we need to worry about as a society to keep us going in the right direction."

Tide Turns Against Web Music Piracy (FT)

By Alain Levy

Financial Times, September 6, 2005

Monday's court ruling in Australia against Kazaa, the biggest brand name in international music piracy, is the latest sign of a turning tide in our industry's efforts to create a thriving pro-consumer, legitimate digital music business.

It is also a reminder that even with the greatest music, the best technology and the most willing fans, we cannot create this bright digital future alone: public education and proper enforcement of intellectual property rights, by courts and by governments, have a vital part to play as well. This applies to any record company, from the largest major to the smallest indie.

The ruling from Australia has important implications for our business. The Sydney court has not only reinforced the message handed down on Grokster from a unanimous US Supreme Court in July – namely that internet file- sharing services can be liable for music piracy. The world's best-known, and until recently its biggest unauthorised file-sharing service, has been found liable for facilitating copyright theft and ordered to stop. The message for similar networks that distribute copyrighted repertoire on a mass scale without permission is clear: it is time to change your ways or stop. Change your systems; respect copyright; use technology responsibly to benefit the music community and not to harm it.

These are momentous rulings for a creative, intellectual property business like EMI, as well as for the artists we invest in and for the legitimate digital market we are working to create. Investment in music is our business and protection of our content is central to everything we do. Our ability to invest in music, and to offer it to our consumers via downloads, ring tones or other digital formats, is integrally dependent on our ability to contain music piracy. Taken together, the Grokster and Kazaa judgements are crucial milestones for us.

The decision is also pro-consumer. It helps investment in the music consumers want. It is good news for fans who want to get great quality music legitimately, while seeing the artists they love get properly rewarded.

And the ruling is pro-technology. Those who claim that all record companies want is to do away with peer-to-peer distribution, in the case of EMI at least, have got it wrong. On the contrary, we have been working hard with companies like SnoCap and iMesh on creating a legitimate file-sharing model – one that uses peer-to-peer technology to benefit the music business, rather than abusing technology to harm it.

This improvement in the legal landscape comes at a critical moment. At EMI we are fast adapting for a digital future and our industry is doing the same. Within the last 18 months digital sales have moved out of a niche market and into the mainstream. Much credit of course goes to Apple iTunes for starting the ball rolling. Now a groundswell of competing services is gathering – great news for the business and the consumer.

Last week's launch of new digital services by the UK's two major music retailers, HMV and Virgin, are a landmark for the British market. But in most other markets outside the US, Japan, Germany and France, digital music has hardly gained a foothold. The growth potential is exciting.

Consumers, we know, are hungry for the new ways in which we can now make our music available: digital downloads in the first half of 2005 outstripped the whole of 2004. Surveys show that as many consumers are now trying legitimate online services as are using the unauthorised alternative. There are exciting forecasts for growth of the digital business. I believe it could grow from about 5 per cent now to 25 per cent of our industry's revenues over the next five years..

The digital music market is up and running, and our challenge now is to build on the successful start. I am confident and I take little notice of the sceptics. A few years ago no one held much hope for record companies breaking into what was then a 100 per cent internet pirate market. The mood is very different today. Virtually all our front line music is available in a huge array of digital channels. Music is becoming easier to buy than to steal.

But the tide is turning for other reasons, too. Public attitudes are shifting towards good and responsible practices in downloading music. A big public awakening has happened on the issue – helped by waves of industry information campaigns. Probably more significant still, the lawsuits taken out in 12 countries, which now total over 14,000, have clearly played an important part in deterring would-be illegal file-sharers and containing internet piracy. These strategies must be sustained because they are working.

The decisions on Grokster and Kazaa have helped us further. The extra layer of legal protection they represent gives our industry better conditions in which to invest in music, and a better environment in which to create a thriving digital business. Today, an entrepreneur working on a new legitimate innovative peer-to-peer service should feel better about his business prospects in the music industry. Equally, I would hope that the guy who, as I write, is planning to build the next pirate peer-to-peer service will today feel considerably worse about his.

Court Orders Kazaa To Stop Pirates (WP/AP)

By Mike Corder, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

SYDNEY, Australia -- A federal judge on Monday ordered distributors of the popular file-swapping program Kazaa to alter the software, which millions have downloaded, so it can no longer be used for music piracy.

Hailed as a victory by the recording industry that brought the suit, the decision has implications well beyond Australia, where Kazaa executives are based, because Kazaa's users span the globe.

In some ways, it mirrors the U.S. Supreme Court's June ruling that Hollywood and the music industry can sue technology companies that encourage their customers to steal music and movies over the Internet.

Federal Court Judge Murray Wilcox determined in Monday's ruling that Kazaa's owners and distributors, led by Sharman Networks Ltd., took no action to rein in illegal file-sharing despite posted warnings on their Web site urging Kazaa users not to swap copyright material.

Wilcox said it had been in the financial interest of Sharman and its partners "to maximize, not minimize, music file-sharing."

He found six of the 10 defendants, including Sharman, its Sydney-based chief executive Nikki Hemming, as well as Altnet, a Sharman software partner, guilty of copyright infringement and ordered them to pay 90 percent of the record industry's costs in the case.

A hearing will be set later to establish damages.

"We will ask the court when it comes to damages to reflect the value of the music these people ripped off," Michael Speck, a spokesman for the Australian recording industry, said of the millions who have downloaded Kazaa.

In a brief statement, Sharman said it would appeal and Kazaa software remained available online, with more than 800,000 downloads reported last week and 390 million total since Kazaa first became available in 2001. Sharman says its software is no different from a tape recorder or photocopier _ and that Kazaa could not control copyright infringement by users.

But Wilcox said that Kazaa's distributors actively encouraged users to share files, the vast majority of which were copyright material.

He said that if Kazaa is to continue its owners will have to ensure that new versions of the software filter out unlicensed copyright material, a task the judge said would be extremely difficult.

Wilcox stressed, however, that he was anxious not to damage legitimate file-swapping with his ruling. He said Kazaa needs to be changed "without unnecessarily intruding on others' freedom of speech and communication."

Kim Weatherall, a lecturer in intellectual property law at Melbourne University, called Wilcox's decision brave but potentially chilling to technology innovators.

"It is clear that the judge is concerned not to stop the technology completely but to try and work some middle line," she said.

The case is the latest in a long line of courtroom showdowns between purveyors of so-called peer-to-peer (P2P) networks and copyright holders led by the music and movie industries.

The U.S. Supreme Court's related June decision gave those industries the go-ahead to proceed with suits against file-sharing software developers Grokster Ltd. and Streamcast Networks Inc. It said such companies can be liable if they deliberately encourage customers to infringe on copyrights as their businesses attempt to grow audiences and sell more advertising.

In a statement Monday, the Recording Industry Association of America praised Wilcox's ruling as continuing in that vein: "... this decision reflects a growing, international chorus: those who promote theft can be held accountable no matter how they may attempt to escape responsibility.

"A corrupt business strategy of attempting to hide off-shore is not off-limits to the enforcement of rights by creators or law enforcement," the RIAA added.

Kazaa has lost significant popularity since its 2002 heyday, due in part to legal pressure and sabotage efforts by the recording industry but also to the emergence of competing technologies.

Other peer-to-peer file-sharing tools and services that similarly do not require a central server, including BitTorrent and eDonkey, have supplanted it as the Internet's most popular.

FastTrack, the network tapped by Kazaa users, accounted for 10 percent of traffic volume in a six-week study begun in June of data swapped using the Internet's top four file-sharing applications. The study was done by CacheLogic.

Chiron Snubs 'inadequate' Novartis Bid (FT)

By James Politi

Financial Times, September 6, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0002599

Novartis was on Monday facing an uphill battle in its attempt to take full control of Chiron as independent directors at the US vaccine company rejected the Swiss drugmaker's $4.5bn offer.

Chiron board members also decided to make clear that Novartis's proposal had not been solicited by the company, conflicting with the impression given by Novartis last week.

The US group said: "After thorough analysis and consideration of Novartis's offer to acquire the shares of Chiron it does not already own for $40 a share in cash, the independent directors of Chiron have determined that this offer is inadequate."

Novartis already owns 42 per cent of Chiron, which lost its flu vaccine production licence last year after the contamination of vaccines at its UK plant.

Chiron's rejection means Novartis might become embroiled in a long-running struggle to gain control of the company, which it is courting to gain access to the fast-growing market for vaccines.

Under the complex rules governing Novartis's investment in Chiron, the Swiss group has four months to secure the support of the independent directors for an offer to buy all of Chiron's shares. After that, it can begin an arbitration process to determine the company's fair value. But Chiron's board members could delay the arbitration until 2007 if they decide this is not the right time to sell.

Novartis's proposed $40 a share offer values Chiron at the equivalent of a 10 per cent premium on its price before the announcement.

Since the offer, Chiron shares have risen above the level of Novartis's offer, as Wall Street investors bet that the Swiss group would be forced to increase the price. On Friday, they closed at $42.79, down 0.3 per cent.

Last year, Chiron saw its net profits fall to $156m, compared with $304m in 2003, on the back of its manufacturing woes.

But its prospects were bolstered last week when the company said it had received a "favourable report" from US regulators visiting the UK plant that produced the contaminated vaccines.

Redemption In The Bayou (NYT)

The New York Times, September 5, 2005

People keep making bets against nature, and in the end nature usually wins. This is as true in the rainforests of Central America, where clear-cutting has led to disastrous floods, as it is in the steep California canyons, where people have no business building houses.

It is no less true of the Mississippi Delta and its biggest city, New Orleans, whose heart-rending tragedy is partly traceable to years of federal efforts to manage the Mississippi River in ways that it did not intend to be managed, keeping it from going where it wanted to go and thus weakening the natural defenses that might have spared the city the worst.

Amends can be made. Before Congress is a $14 billion plan to restore the vanishing wetlands and barrier islands off the Louisiana coast that in times past would have served as a buffer against the storm. The House has approved a modest $1.9 billion down payment on this plan, but it needs a push from President Bush and the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist, to ensure Senate approval. The plan would involve some delicate re-engineering of the natural system and is not without risk. Still, it could provide a measure of redemption for years of environmental carelessness for which Congress itself is largely responsible.

The problem, in a nutshell, is this: the Louisiana coast, its protective fringe of barrier islands and coastal marshlands, is disappearing. Over the last 75 years, 1.9 million acres have vanished. Every year, another 25 square miles, an area roughly the size of Manhattan, sinks quietly beneath the waves. In some places, the coastline has receded 15 miles from where it was in the 1920's.

The soil in the delta compacts and sinks naturally. Historically, however, the Mississippi replenished the loss with sediment gathered from its many tributaries and then deposited like clockwork in the delta with the spring floods. Or so it did until 1927, when Congress ordered the Army Corps of Engineers to find ways to control the floods so as to make the river safe for farming, homes and commerce.

As it would later do in the Everglades (with equally disastrous results for the Florida ecosystem), the corps then proceeded to construct a network of dams, levees and canals throughout the river basin. The upstream dams reduced the river's sediment load well below historical levels; the sediment that remained, while considerable, was then routed away from the Louisiana coast by a system of levees and navigation channels. The effect of all these engineering changes was to hurry the river along and, at its mouth, propel its contents deep into the Gulf of Mexico, as if shot from a cannon, bypassing the coastal marshes and barrier islands that most needed its nourishment.

Add to all this the demands of a growing population, plus thousands of miles of pipes and canals dug through the marsh for a booming oil and gas industry, and the result was inevitable: a shrunken, degraded and essentially defenseless landscape.

More is at stake, of course, than the landscape. These may be the hardest-working wetlands in America. They support one of the country's largest fisheries; almost every fish caught in the Gulf of Mexico spends part of its life in the Louisiana marsh. They are the wintering ground or refueling stop for most of the migratory waterfowl that travel the Mississippi flyway. And as everyone who has bought gasoline in the last few days knows by now, they are vital to the production, refining and transportation of much of the nation's oil. Indeed, the oil and gas industry has as much incentive as anyone to protect the marshes from further erosion. Most of its equipment cannot survive in open water.

The conditions are thus ripe for a major effort to restore the Louisiana coast. The program before Congress was hatched by the state's politicians and in its universities and drafted by the Army Corps of Engineers. It is supported by both industry and advocacy groups like the National Audubon Society and Environmental Defense, which helped with its design. It would start small, with three or four carefully calibrated pilot programs to divert water flow to the marshes, then go from there.

What it has always required is the enthusiastic support of Washington's political leaders. It is hard to believe that the events of the last week haven't caught their attention.

Missouri Condemnation No Longer So Imminent (WP)

By T.r. Reid

SUNSET HILLS, Mo. -- When David Wright retired from his factory job in 1997, he poured just about all his savings into a handsome brick house in the Sunset Manor subdivision here. "This was our dream," said David's wife, Lorraine. "We were set here for the rest of our lives."

But the dream turned sour when the city council of this St. Louis suburb decided last year to bulldoze all 254 homes in Sunset Manor and turn the land over to a shopping-mall developer. "We cried and we prayed," Lorraine Wright recalled. "And we put a lot of hope into the Supreme Court, because they were supposed to decide whether this kind of thing is legal."

So the Wrights were crushed -- at first -- when the U.S. Supreme Court ruled on June 23 that the Constitution does not stop cities from seizing homes to make way for commercial development projects. "What we didn't realize right away," David Wright said, "was that the decision would be a positive development for those of us who don't want to see people's houses taken away."

Here in Missouri and all over the country, the court's decision in Kelo v. City of New London has sparked a furious reaction, with politicians of both parties proposing new legislation that would sharply limit the kind of seizure the court's decision validated.

As a result, a decision first seen as a key legal victory for cities that want to use eminent domain for private projects has turned into a major setback on the political front for pro-development interests.

The popular backlash has slowed or blocked many pending projects, as developers, their bankers and local governments suddenly face public furor.

In Sunset Hills, the bank that planned to finance the proposed new mall abruptly withdrew its funding amid a noisy political argument after the Kelo decision. That means the Wrights' home is safe, for the time being -- but hundreds of their neighbors who had agreed to move out are left in limbo.

Three states have already passed new laws in response to the Kelo decision.

The statutes in Alabama and Texas sharply curtail eminent-domain condemnations for private development. "We don't like anybody messing with our dogs, our guns, our hunting rights or trying to take property from us," said state Sen. Jack Biddle, a sponsor of the Alabama law. Delaware's new statute permits condemnation but sets new procedural requirements for local governments.

Larry Morandi, an analyst at the National Conference of State Legislatures, predicts a rush of new laws next winter, when 44 state legislatures will be back in session.

"Most if not all state legislatures will be dealing with eminent-domain laws next year," Morandi said. "The outcry has been so sharp that many states already have task forces or study committees at work on this issue this summer. Most of the proposed legislation is designed to restrict the kind of governmental action that the court upheld in Kelo ."

The Institute for Justice, a Washington-based libertarian think tank, said that hundreds of local governments around the country are also debating new ordinances to restrict the use of eminent domain. Many have passed laws this summer barring any seizure of private property for commercial development. Other cities are tightening the conditions that could authorize such seizure.

Several members of Congress have introduced legislation that would bar federal financing for any local government project that condemns property for a commercial development. But Congress did authorize governments to condemn property for the benefit of energy companies in the new energy bill that President Bush signed last month.

The right of government to seize private property for public projects is specifically authorized in the Constitution as long as owners receive "just compensation." A farmer whose cornfield lies in the path of a proposed expressway can be forced to sell the land even if he wants to keep farming there.

Traditionally, this power of eminent domain was used for government functions such as parks and highways. But more and more local governments have begun seizing property from unwilling owners for the creation of industrial parks, hotels and shopping centers.

This trend was not widely recognized until the Supreme Court decision in June that validated the practice. An issue that had been primarily of interest to local governments and land-use planners quickly hit every editorial page in the country, with widespread condemnation of the court's 5 to 4 ruling.

Some interest groups, including the National League of Cities, endorsed the ruling. But the overall political reaction was intensely hostile, sparking a rush of proposed legislation.

Supreme Court justices may not be unhappy about this reaction. Justice John Paul Stevens, author of the majority opinion in the Kelo case, said in a speech this summer that he did not agree with the property seizure in that case but felt that the law required him to uphold it nonetheless.

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who dissented in Kelo , warned that permitting seizure of private property for private development would have a reverse Robin Hood effect, giving governments "license to transfer property from those with few resources to those with more."

That pattern is clear here in Sunset Hills. This affluent town is dotted with large $600,000 homes on green hills surrounding a country club. But the Sunset Manor subdivision, the most ethnically mixed neighborhood in town, is made up mainly of small homes on small lots, with prices around $100,000.

The city council here, known as the Board of Aldermen, decided last year to level the 65-acre subdivision so that Novus Cos., a local developer, could build an upscale shopping mall to be called Main Street at Sunset. Of the 254 homeowners, 229 have agreed to sell their property to Novus. The owner of a shopping mall two miles away has financed the efforts of the hold out owners to block condemnation of their properties.

In July, the alderman authorized condemnation proceedings against the remaining owners -- including David and Lorraine Wright, a black couple who had planned to spend the rest of their lives in Sunset Manor and thus declined to sell their home.

"We thought at first, you know, we didn't have a prayer," David Wright said. "How can you fight City Hall? And then the Supreme Court ruled against people like us.

"But the reaction to that decision has been so strong. The project is kind of stopped. So now we are thinking maybe we can stay here."

Novus, the developer, said it is searching for new financing. Meanwhile, the project is on hold -- a painful development for the 229 homeowners who had agreed to sell their houses and move.

"The collapse of the financing for the [shopping mall] project has left a couple of hundred families in a terrible place," said Pete Snyder, a spokesman for the developer. "A lot of them are already paying the mortgage on their new home, but now they don't have a buyer for the old one. This has to be resolved, and condemning those 25 houses is the way it has to go forward," he said of the holdouts.

But Will Aschinger, a leader of the anti-condemnation group, thinks the political reaction to the Supreme Court decision has effectively saved the Sunset Manor subdivision. "The backlash against that decision is the best thing that ever happened to us," he said with a smile. "No matter what the court says, I don't think cities can get away with this kind of stuff anymore."

Government Cowboys Spend Days Trailing Texas Ticks (WP)

By Sylvia Moreno

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

LAREDO, Tex. -- This federal employee works along a treacherous stretch of high Rio Grande riverbank known as No Man's Land. His work uniform: leather chaps, sturdy Wranglers, high-top bullhide boots and silver spurs. His tools: a .357-caliber revolver, a lariat, a machete, a walkie-talkie, and his beloved brown-and-white appaloosa, Payaso.

His mission: to hunt down ticks.

Meet Fred Garza, government cowboy -- one of a small force of hardy men whose mission for almost 70 years has been to keep the dreaded Texas cattle fever tick confined to 900 miles of winding riverfront along the Mexican border. He is a tick, or river, rider, a U.S. Department of Agriculture employee who has managed to marry his cowboying skills and love of desolate open range with benefits and a federal pension.

It's hard and lonely work in unforgiving terrain. The cowboys live away from their families in remote shacks four to five nights a week. They ride solo six or seven hours daily in 100-plus-degree temperatures, cutting trails through thick gnarly brush and prickly cactus to rope frightened steers, searching them for ticks and then transporting them to a pesticide vat for a disinfecting dip. (The cattle are dipped regularly in organophosphates for six to nine months before being returned to their owners or sold at auction if not claimed.)

It may be a tough life, but Garza, a GS-8 after 15 years in the saddle, loves it.

"This is not work for me. It's not work for a lot of us," said Garza, a mustachioed 50-year-old whose uncle rode the river for 56 years before retiring from the USDA. "Like they say, ma'am, if you don't want to work, find you a good job."

Garza and his horseback-riding colleagues make up the nation's front line against a scourge that decimated the cattle industry in 1906 and continues to be a threat as long as the cattle fever tick thrives south of the border and Mexican cows stray or are smuggled across the Rio Grande. Mexican cows have developed immunity to many tick diseases or suffer only mild symptoms.

Today, the riders are fighting the worst infestation of cattle fever ticks in 30 years and are doing so in the face of budgetary shortfalls and bureaucratic turf wars.

"We're losing ground," said Edwin J. Bowers, director of field operations for the Laredo-based program, which is part of the USDA Animal and Plant Health Inspection Service.

The battle against the ticks dates back to 1906, when cattle tick fever spread through 14 southern states, wiping out up to 90 percent of herds in just days. The cause was traced to the Boophilus annulatus and Boophilus microplus , ticks carried by Texas cattle driven along trails to stockyards and auction markets up north. The parasites cause piroplasmosis, a disease known as Texas fever or red water disease. It causes red blood cells to rupture and the fever-crazed animals -- usually cows but also horses -- bleed to death by expelling blood through urine.

The epidemic sparked an intense campaign against ticks that began, initially, under the auspices of various affected states and counties. By 1938, the dreaded insect had been confined to portions of eight Mexican border counties in south Texas, and the federal government took over the eradication program. To patrol the permanent quarantine zone for "Mex-ee-co cows," as these cowboys call them, the USDA created a squad of river riders, some of them members of the old U.S. horse-riding sentry against hoof-and-mouth disease.

"They call us tick riders. We call ourselves the tick eradication mounted patrol," Bowers said.

In January, Bowers asked USDA officials for an emergency appropriation of $521,000 to hire two tick riders for his understaffed unit (he is two short of the full complement of 61), to pay keep on four temporary workers, to buy needed equipment, and to fund a special feeding program that kills fever ticks on south Texas's abundant whitetail deer. The deer are believed to be spreading the tick on cattle-grazing land, making it harder to contain the parasite. At the same time, U.S. ranchers have been stymied in keeping Mexican cattle off their property because of drought-induced low water levels along certain parts of the Rio Grande and regulations by the International Boundary and Water Commission that prohibit fencing and brush management on dried riverbeds. The funding has yet to be released, and negotiations with the IBWC are stalled.

"Until 1996, we hadn't had any ticks on my land in 50 years," said Humberto Vela, who owns a 2,000-acre cattle ranch in Zapata, Tex., outside Laredo. He said lax efforts by Mexican officials to kill off the fever tick and the ban on building fences in dried portions of Rio Grande riverbed have penalized him and other ranchers. "We have to go through this whole cycle of dipping to keep an epidemic out of the United States," Vela said.

In Spanish, the tick riders are called garrapateros for the Spanish word for tick (garrapata). Although 60 percent of these government cowboys are Spanish-speaking Mexican American, the Anglo tick riders are bilingual, too. The job requires regular encounters with Mexican ranchers and ranch hands across the river -- not to mention chance meetings with undocumented immigrants, usually dehydrated and starving, who get lost wandering through the thick brush; the coyotes who guide them across the Rio Grande; and other smugglers and border bandits, as well.

"I got caught in the cross-fire between the bandidos and the coyotes when I worked the river over in Brownsville. One got shot in the heart and right here," Garza said as he pointed to his upper right rib cage. "He died and the other guy got shot in the arm and leg and lived. It was 10 in the morning, on a Sunday."

Danger has always been part of a tick rider's job. In 1982, Congress passed a law to arm the patrol after a group of weathered cowboys, bullet-riddled saddle in hand, went to Capitol Hill to lobby lawmakers for help. They got .357 magnums and later, the choice to carry .40-caliber semiautomatics.

The weapons have not eliminated the casualties, however. One tick rider was shot and killed at his camp not far from the river (the case has not been solved). One drowned in the Rio Grande, and another was killed in a vehicle accident. One rider survived a bullet in the back, and many others have been shot at and missed. "We've been very, very lucky considering the climate we work in," Bowers said.

Among all of USDA's animal health technicians or animal inspectors -- as the tick rider's law enforcement badges proclaim them to be -- they are more prone to be injured on the job. One kick of an angry cow's hoof can snap a forearm.

Despite the hazards of the job, Bowers gets about 100 applicants per job opening, and some tick riders apply multiple times before getting hired as a GS-5 with a current starting salary of $26,197 a year.

Joe Akers, 37, a champion rodeo roper of the Tilden, Tex., rodeo applied three times before he got the job on the mounted patrol three years ago. Like Garza, he was following in a relative's footsteps. His uncle was a river rider for decades.

"If you like ridin' and you love ropin', this is the job for you," said Akers, who wears the big silver belt buckle he was awarded in a cattle-roping competition. "Especially in south Texas, it's extremely prestigious to get on with the tick force."

A Class War Runs Through It (NYT)

By Jonathan Weber

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

Missoula, Mont.

JAMES COX KENNEDY, the head of Cox Enterprises, the Atlanta media company, was just doing what lots of modern media moguls do when he bought nearly 4,000 acres in Montana's Ruby Valley: transforming remote Western ranchland into a private hunting and fishing retreat, and doing some commendable habitat conservation and restoration work in the process.

Perhaps unwittingly, however, Mr. Kennedy has walked into the middle of two separate but closely related controversies, one having to do with Montana's stream-access laws - that one will be the subject of a mediation session next week - and the other relating to conservation easements.

Both issues, ultimately, are about class, and point to the need for new policies (and vigilance) in policing the conservation easement system and defending access to public lands and water. Just as important, though, Mr. Kennedy's Ruby Valley imbroglio underscores the need for a deeper sense of noblesse oblige among the ultra-rich as they buy up great swaths of the American West.

Montana's 20-year-old stream-access law, which declares that the state's rivers and streams are public property up to the high-water mark, provides a clear window into land-use battles. The law, among the strongest in the nation, has survived numerous legal challenges and become a source of pride for many Montanans (including Gov. Brian Schweitzer), though it's still fiercely opposed by property-rights advocates.

The law does not require property owners to provide entry to waterways through their own land, but it does permit access from any public property. As a result, among the most common access points are county bridges. That's where Mr. Kennedy has run into trouble: his ranch includes all or parts of two bridges that cross the Ruby River, and he has blocked access by reinforcing old fencing along those bridges. Stream-access advocates have sued the county for allowing the fences, setting the stage for a showdown on a controversy that has raged for almost a decade.

Mr. Kennedy claims that the bridges are neither safe nor legal river-access sites. More to the point, though, he says allowing public access would damage the riparian habitat and destroy a fragile fishery that he has spent a lot of time and money nursing back to health. That's a similar argument to one being made by the brokerage mogul Charles Schwab, the rock musician Huey Lewis and others who are fighting to keep the public off a waterway south of Missoula where they own property.

And that brings us to the second controversy. Much of Mr. Kennedy's Ruby Valley property is in a conservation easement, an arrangement under which property owners receive tax breaks for forgoing development on ecologically sensitive lands. Easements have been under fire in Congress in the wake of revelations that some developers were claiming conservation easements for golf courses (hey, it's open space, right?) and otherwise gaming the system.

While Mr. Kennedy's Ruby Valley easements are not cover for a golf course, they do have one unfortunate feature: Mr. Kennedy is the president of the land trust that is supposed to serve as the enforcer of the easement agreement. That's exactly the kind of arrangement that rightly gets easement critics up in arms.

Easements have proved to be a very effective means of encouraging land conservation and habitat preservation. But there's something wrong when a billionaire buys a ranch, gets a tax break for an easement and then chases the locals off the river in the name of conservation.

Class, of course, is an issue here. Consider the people who are fighting for access to the river: retired miners and schoolteachers and other working folk, some of whom grew up fishing the local waters and some of whom couldn't give a hoot about fishing but hate seeing the landscape walled off. But there's also wider a social issue involved: if land and water conservation and wildlife protection come to be seen as things that only benefit the rich, it will reinforce the perception that conservation is a luxury of the elite rather than a universal concern.

If class warfare breaks out in Montana, the environment is going to suffer. So what do we do? As Jon Christensen and Terry Anderson, two of the West's leading thinkers on conservation issues, have pointed out, the conservation easement system needs to be better policed. For starters, appraisers - working with state and federal tax authorities - should establish appraisal standards for easement donations. Moreover, the land trusts should work together to set up an accreditation system, and Congress could mandate that tax deductions be available only for donations to accredited land trusts.

When it comes to public access, state and local officials - and voters - need to recognize that the heavy bias toward property rights that exists throughout the West is something that will increasingly serve a small minority of wealthy landowners, not mom-and-pop homesteaders or family farmers. This imbalance needs to change. County commissioners, who are often on the front lines, can't allow themselves to be intimidated by the threat of litigation over access issues. And they need strong back-up from state attorneys general.

But a big part of the solution is in the hands of the landowners themselves. In an era of economic policies that are producing an ever-larger group of the super-rich, those who are wealthier than the rest of us have a responsibility to manage their properties at least partly in the public interest.

They need to meet with their neighbors, get involved with the community and find compromises that work for everyone. In most cases, the locals will be more than receptive to even small gestures. After all, who wants to fight when the fish are biting?

Is This The Gaze Of An Endangered Species Or An Evil Croc? (NYT)

By Larry Rohter

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

MAMIRAUÁ, Brazil - As dusk falls, the waters here gradually come alive. One after another, caimans begin to stick their armored heads above the surface, and before long this isolated, tree-lined channel feeding the Amazon is teeming with crocodilians as large as 15 feet long. Their thrashing, splashing and grunting reverberates all through the night.

Just a generation ago the caiman, a cousin of the American alligator, was driven so near extinction by the demand for its skin and meat that the government banned hunting it. But efforts to protect the black and spectacled caiman (pronounced KAY-men) have proved so successful that the population has exploded and the beast has now become a pest and, according to some, a threat.

Peasants along the rivers complain that caimans devour their livestock, and they are clamoring for the right to resume hunting. Even small children are occasionally attacked at the river's edge, leading local newspapers and radio stations to say the officials in far away Brasília know nothing about the hard realities of river life.

The loudest and most constant protests, however, come from fishermen in areas like this, 450 miles west of Manaus, the capital of Amazonas State. They complain that the resurgent caimans destroy their nets, which can cost between $50 and $200, and consume large quantities of the same game fish that they need to catch and sell to feed their families.

"Every time you go out, they always get in the way," said Ademar Nunes Nogueira, 41, who has been fishing since he was 10. "But if you dare to kill a caiman and the environmental agents catch you, you're the one who has to pay a fine."

Even in Manaus, a city of 1.5 million people, caimans are now a real presence and not just an urban legend. "There are spectacled caimans living in the sewers of Manaus," said William Magnusson, a caiman specialist at the National Institute for Amazon Research there. "They adapt to anything."

The exploding caiman population has also become a political issue in Amazonas, with campaigning politicians promising they will ensure that the ban on hunting is lifted. "The argument is that if they are doing it in the United States, why can't we do it here?" said Ronis da Silveira, a professor of biology at the Federal University of Amazonas who is a leading expert on crocodilians.

No one knows exactly how many caimans now navigate Amazon waters. Asked for an estimate in an interview with the magazine Epoca, Eduardo Braga, governor of Amazonas, replied, "The only thing I can say is that the presence of the caiman is intimidating and immensely greater than the human population" of the state, which is 2.8 million.

The animals have become so plentiful that some fishermen have begun using caiman meat as bait to catch a particular catfish known as the vulture of the waters. Brazilians themselves refuse to eat the fish, so it is exported upriver to Colombia, where it is considered a delicacy.

Mr. Magnusson puts the total caiman population at "tens of millions," but government officials defend the hunting ban, arguing that to lift it would bring about a return of the same predatory practices that nearly drove the caiman into extinction in the first place. They say the campaign to resume hunting reflects the peasants' desire for more income and a prejudice that stems from mankind's ancestral fear of reptiles.

"Mosquitoes transmit malaria, which kills a lot more people than caimans ever have," said Henrique Pereira dos Santos, regional director of the government's environmental agency. "I think you have to take the semiotics of all this into account."

What may well be the largest concentration of crocodilians anywhere in the world can be found here at the Mamirauá Sustainable Development Reserve. "At this time of year, there are some places where the caiman concentrations are so thick that if they just sat there and didn't move, you could walk across their backs to dry land," Mr. Magnusson said.

At the reserve, which is supported in part by the Wildlife Conservation Society, the government now permits a limited harvest of caimans. One linear inch of the hide of the prized black caiman can be worth up to $25 on the international market if properly skinned, and the meat fetches 30 cents a pound. The skin of spectacled caimans goes for about $3 a square foot. But the program is still experimental, and scientists have doubts about extending it to other places.

"You can't allow hunting all over, only in particular areas and at certain times of year, where and when concentrations are the largest," cautioned Professor da Silveira, who is involved with the project. "You must be selective and at the same time convince the residents of the region that there is something in it for them, something of economic value, that the caiman is not just a pest."

A selective approach, however, does not appeal at all to Sebastião Batista Pereira, 46, a peasant who lives in a hut at the edge of the river a bit farther downstream. When water levels rose nearly to his front door during the latest rainy season, one caiman made off with a pig he had just bought while another came perilously close to his 78-year-old mother and youngest child as they were bathing at the river's edge.

"Look, I don't hunt the beast to take its meat or skin into the city to sell," Mr. Pereira said. "That would be abusive and a clear violation of the law. But I'll say this before any authority: if I come across a snake or a caiman on the trail, I'll kill it. What is worth more, the life of my children or of some animal, and a wild, violent beast at that?"

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Lawmakers Seek Far Harsher Penalties For Steroids Users (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely, Usa Today

USA Today, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON — The chairman of the House Judiciary Committee plans to unveil a new proposal this week to crack down on steroid use in sports, another sign of the growing determination by Congress to impose tougher testing standards and penalties on pro sports.

Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., told USA TODAY he's co-authoring the bill with Rep. John Conyers, the top Judiciary Committee Democrat from Michigan. It would put the Justice Department in charge of developing "minimum standards" for testing and penalties. Participation in the program would be voluntary, but Sensenbrenner says there will be "incentives" to encourage pro sports leagues to sign up.

He did not elaborate on what those incentives might be. But in baseball's case the Judiciary Committee could threaten to lift the sport's antitrust exemption.

Lawmakers are returning to Congress this week for the first time since news broke of Baltimore Orioles star Rafael Palmeiro's 10-day suspension last month for steroid use. That has stoked many members' exasperation. "That's called a vacation; that's not a suspension," said Rep. Chris Shays, R-Conn.

Palmeiro testified under oath at a House Committee on Government Reform hearing in March that he never used steroids. Committee members and staffers have been examining records of his positive test provided by Major League Baseball to determine whether he could be prosecuted for perjury.

Two members who have seen the records, Reps. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., and Elijah Cummings, D-Md., say they think perjury charges against Palmeiro are unlikely. "It will be very difficult to prove," Cummings said. But information in the records, Cummings added, would frustrate lawmakers "even further."

The records have not been made public, but Waxman indicated he might push for that. "I don't know for sure, but I generally favor information being made public," he said.

Steroids news hits home

Cummings still lives in the west Baltimore neighborhood where he grew up and, like many natives of the Charm City, considers himself a diehard Baltimore Orioles fan.

But few lawmakers have been more critical of Palmeiro after news last month he tested positive for steroids. When the first baseman returned to the playing field on Aug. 11 after a 10-day suspension, Cummings said he was "bothered" that some in the crowd cheered him.

"Most of us are trying to set some kind of decent example for kids," says Cummings. "What kind of message is that sending?"

In Congress, frustration with professional sports in general, and Major League Baseball in particular, is growing. As they prepared to return to town this week from a month-long August recess, a number of Republican and Democratic lawmakers said the Palmeiro revelations would build momentum for federally mandated drug tests and penalties in pro sports.

"Obviously the current approach on steroids both in professional sports and amateur sports is not working," says Sensenbrenner.

The bill will be the sixth measure introduced in Congress this year to regulate steroids in pro sports. All of the bills have bipartisan support. All would impose much stiffer penalties than the one levied on Palmeiro.

One, backed by Rep. Cliff Stearns, R-Fla., would require a half-season suspension for a first-time steroid offense. Four others — including one authored by Sen. Jim Bunning, R-Ky., a Hall of Fame pitcher — would impose a two-year ban for a first-time offense and a lifetime ban for a second.

The measure being authored by Sensenbrenner and Conyers would leave it up to the Justice Department to set penalty guidelines. Sensenbrenner doesn't think Palmeiro's suspension would be adequate. "My gut tells me that type of tap on the wrist would not meet the minimum standard," he says.

Obstacles abound

Fueling momentum for the legislation has been a feeling that Palmeiro's suspension was an affront to Congress. Appearing before a House committee in March, the Orioles slugger swore under oath he had never used steroids. "He got the confidence of all of us," Cummings said. "We thought he was a stand-up guy."

But there are obstacles to passage of a federal steroids testing bill, including Congress' busy fall agenda and internal fights over who should get credit for legislation.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., will push for the various bill sponsors to find "common ground," says his spokesman, Ron Bonjean. Waxman says it would be "pretty ridiculous" to let disputes among various bill sponsors stop the legislation.

"What we end up passing will probably be a blend of several proposals," Sensenbrenner says.

Sen. Chuck Grassley, an Iowa Republican, acknowledges "a reluctance to get involved in something traditionally left to baseball itself," but he argues that "baseball has had an opportunity to straighten up and they have used kid gloves." Echoing the sentiment of many lawmakers, Grassley said: "I think they are afraid of their union."

Greg Bouris, director of communications for the MLB Players Association, argues Palmeiro's suspension shows the current testing system is working. Bouris says the length of Palmeiro's suspension is irrelevant. "It's the outing, the public humiliation that the player is going to face that's going to be the ultimate deterrent."

Even so, he says union president Don Fehr has been visiting teams to discuss the possibility of changing the steroids policy with players. Commissioner Bud Selig has proposed a 50-game suspension for the first offense, 100 games for a second offense and lifetime ban for a third offense.

Members of Congress are skeptical. "I don't have a good feeling about either the baseball owners or the players," says Shays.

Congressman feels support

Cummings says very few of his constituents have complained about his tough stand on Palmeiro. "I've only had one person say, 'Lay off Raffy.' " Some comments have come from "diehard baseball fans" who are worried about the integrity of the games' records, Cummings says. Some have come from African-Americans who wonder "Why is it that a baseball player can commit a (drug) crime and make more money? If a guy in my community of West Baltimore were caught doing it, he'd go to jail," says Cummings.

But the congressman says his biggest supporters are "the soccer moms" who want to make sure athletic role models are worth emulating.

Says Cummings: "They're worried about their kids."

Palmeiro Goes Home, Booed And Injured (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

Filed at 7:43 p.m. ET

BALTIMORE (AP) -- Rafael Palmeiro was sent home to Texas to rehabilitate knee and ankle injuries, leaving his baseball future unclear during a season in which he was suspended for a positive steroids test.

Palmeiro's season unraveled soon after he collected his 3,000th career hit on July 15. He received a 10-day suspension on Aug. 1 for failing a drug test, and upon his return was booed by fans in Baltimore and on the road.

He is 2-for-26 with one RBI since coming back, and has been bothered the past two weeks by injuries to his left ankle and right knee. The Orioles still expect him to play this month, but decided Monday that the first baseman should go home to recover.

"It is in his and the Orioles best interests for Palmeiro to stay off the knee as much as possible to allow it to heal completely," the team said in statement. "At the same time, remaining with the team while unable to play has created an unnecessary distraction for both Palmeiro and the ballclub."

Palmeiro, who has not played since Tuesday in Toronto, left for Texas shortly after the Orioles' 6-2 loss to the Blue Jays on Monday.

"We will monitor him and bring him back at the end when he's ready," interim manager Sam Perlozzo said. "We definitely feel like he's going to play again this year. I'd like to see him get back for the last 10 days, anyway."

Things can't get much worse for Palmeiro, who's experiencing a one-of-a-kind season for all the wrong reasons.

"Everything just kind of crumbled, unexpectedly really. I never expected that anything would happen to me, not at this stage of my career anyway," he said before Monday's game. "I've played my whole career pretty much injury free. There's been no controversy in my life at all, on and off the field. I've always been a type of person that does it the right way and follows the rules and does the right thing for the most part."

This isn't the way Palmeiro, 40, wanted to go out. For that reason he's still considering coming back next season.

"Obviously, I would love to play and come back and finish and hopefully to prove to everyone that I can still play at a high level, that I can still be productive and do it the right way, which I've always done," he said. "I just don't know. I can't look that far ahead and predict what's going to happen. I would love to have that opportunity, but I have a lot of things to think about and a lot of things to weigh."

Ending his season at this point, however, is not in his immediate plans.

"Raffy doesn't want to shut it down yet. He doesn't want to walk away from this thing without playing again," Perlozzo said. "If he looks like he can help us with a couple of at-bats here and there, we'll see what happens."

In March, Palmeiro told Congress that he never took steroids. Upon receiving the suspension, Palmeiro insisted that he never intentionally took a banned performance-enhancing drug. When he returned, he said he would not address the case until Congress concludes its ongoing investigation on whether Palmeiro committed perjury with his testimony in March.

His decision on retirement won't be influenced by the backlash he has received since the suspension.

"If I had to make a decision right then, I probably wouldn't play," he said. "But I am not going to shy away from something like what happened to me like that. I am going to face it and I am going to do what I can. Hopefully, I can explain myself one day, and whether people believe me or not, I can't control that."

Palmeiro never wanted a farewell tour or a lavish ceremony before his final game. He always intended to make a decision over the offseason, which he will, but now must factor in the suspension, his injuries and a late-season slump that has dropped his batting average to .266 -- 23 points below his career mark.

"I wasn't going to make this huge announcement. I wasn't going to have a parade going out around the country at all the ballparks. That's not what I wanted to do," he said. "I wanted to sit down and make a good decision and feel good about it, like 'This is it, I am done, I enjoyed the ride and it's time to do something else.'

"But obviously, that's not going to happen."

Chiefs' Wellbourn Suspended For Steroids (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

KANSAS CITY, Mo. -- Kansas City Chiefs offensive lineman John Welbourn has been suspended for four games for violation of the league's steroid policy.

"John has been suspended," coach Dick Vermeil told The Associated Press on Saturday. "We are moving forward. I really can't say any more than that right now."

Welbourn, a reserve guard acquired from Philadelphia in 2004, played in Friday night's exhibition loss to St. Louis. He will not be eligible to practice during the suspension and may not play until the Oct. 16 game against Washington.

Vermeil said Friday night that Welbourn lost an appeal of his suspension.

"It doesn't matter if it was taken accidentally or something was in something he took that wasn't marked on the bottle," the coach told the Kansas City Star. "It doesn't matter. There's no tolerance and we'll have to live with that."

Eric Warfield, a starting cornerback, already has been suspended for the first four games for violation of the league's substance abuse policy.

Charges Dropped Against Husband Of Woman Who Claimed Cancer (AP)

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, September 3, 2005

SALT LAKE CITY -- Prosecutors have dropped the fraud charges against a man whose wife falsely claimed to have cancer and collected thousands of dollars in donations.

Salt Lake County prosecutors said Wednesday they no longer felt they could prove Drug Enforcement Agency officer Jeff James Clark was part of the scam perpetrated by his wife, Tania Clark.

Tania Clark, 32, who has pleaded guilty to felony counts of theft and theft by deception in Utah and Salt Lake counties, is taking sole responsibility for the crimes, said Deputy Salt Lake County District Attorney Robert Stott.

Stott said the attorney for the woman said she would testify "she was the only one involved, and that her 36-year-old husband did not know anything about the fact that (her claims of illness) were false."

To prove the husband was involved in the scheme, prosecutors would have to prove that "he knew she didn't have cancer and he had intent to commit fraud," Stott said. "We don't think we have sufficient evidence to overcome that."

Jeff Clark's job status remains uncertain, DEA spokeswoman Karen Flowers said Thursday, and he remains on unpaid administrative leave.

Tania Clark was sentenced by a Utah County judge last month to probation and community service and was ordered to pay $5,800 in restitution.

Sentencing in Salt Lake County is set for Sept. 12 before 3rd District Judge Paul Maughan.

Tania Clark told family and friends she was dying of myeloma and needed $62,000 for a bone marrow transplant.This story appeared in The Daily Herald on page D3.

Greed Lured GIs Into Colombian Underworld (WP/AP)

By Kim Housego, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

BOGOTA, Colombia -- U.S. Army Staff Sgt. Daniel Rosas was deployed to Colombia as part of the large U.S. mission to fight drug trafficking, but before long he found the lure of cocaine money too hard to resist.

He formed a smuggling ring involving U.S. soldiers that was eventually busted, deeply embarrassing U.S. officials.

A deposition obtained by The Associated Press shows Rosas' scheme was so amateurish that at one point he made a deal with a stranger he met in a Mexican nightclub bathroom and even saw a $140,000 payment vanish in the mail. The authenticity of Rosas' sworn statement was recently confirmed by a Colombian official familiar with the case.

The document provides for the first time a detailed look into how the drug ring operated and shows that, with stunning ease, it was able to send 170 pounds of cocaine from Colombia to the United States, subject to only cursory searches at best from U.S. Customs agents.

"They never suspected that any military or civilian personnel would bring back contraband," Rosas said in the March 31 sworn statement to military investigators at Fort Bliss, Texas. "They did not use dogs, they very rarely checked our carryon bags but never checked our equipment that was loaded on the pallets."

U.S. Ambassador William Wood said in the wake of the arrests on March 28 that U.S. soldiers leaving Colombia would be subjected to stricter searches. The case infuriated many Colombians who said President Alvaro Uribe should revoke treaties granting immunity to U.S. soldiers serving in Colombia.

Rosas, 23, of McAllen, Texas, is behind bars awaiting court-martial along with two other U.S. soldiers.

A fourth soldier, Spc. Francisco Rosa, pleaded guilty on Aug. 10 to using, possessing and distributing cocaine and making a false official statement. He was sentenced to five years in prison, demoted to the rank of private and will receive a bad conduct discharge.

Rosas told military investigators he got involved in drug smuggling in the summer of 2003 when he struck up a friendship with Angel Gutierrez, a bartender at the officer's club in the Apiay military base southeast of Bogota, where he was stationed. Rosas said Gutierrez told him he could hold cocaine and drive it onto the base through the front gate.

"Greed overtook my state-of-mind. I saw an opportunity and took advantage of it," Rosas said, according to the sworn statement.

Rosas said he and two other Americans on the base _ Spc. Rolando Sandoval and a civilian defense contractor identified only as Jake _ pooled their money to buy about nine pounds of cocaine from Gutierrez for $12,000. Sandoval left the military before Rosas' arrest and it is unclear what happened to him and Jake.

Jake smuggled the cocaine to the United States in August 2003, then headed to Las Vegas to try to sell some of it _ but promptly disappeared.

"We never saw him again ... we never received any money from Jake," Rosas said.

When Rosas returned to Texas within a few weeks, he tried to sell the remaining two pounds. That amount normally fetches about $25,000 in the United States, but Rosas didn't know where to turn.

"I went to Juarez, Mexico, and while in the bathroom of a club I saw a guy snorting cocaine," Rosas said. He eventually sold the cocaine to the man for $6,500 at a Taco Bell in El Paso, Texas.

The money didn't last long.

"I spent $3,000 on partying and stuff of that nature," the soldier said.

On his next tour in Colombia, Rosas said he recruited three U.S. soldiers _ Rosa, Staff Sgt. Victor Portales and Staff Sgt. Kevin G. Irizarry-Melendez _ and they began smuggling much larger quantities of cocaine, according to the sworn statement.

They wrapped sheets of fabric softener and plastic wrap around the cocaine, placed it inside zip-lock bags then put them inside coffee boxes. The drug shipments were loaded onto pallets with other gear then put aboard U.S. Air Force transport planes heading to Texas.

Once, two coffee boxes containing 35 pounds of cocaine vanished after it arrived at Fort Bliss. Rosas said he suspects a private working at the hangar found the cocaine and stole it.

Meanwhile, Rosas found connections in the drug-trafficking underworld in the United States. But that presented new problems.

One drug dealer, identified only as Gustavo, mailed $200,000 to Rosas' El Paso apartment in four boxes as payment for cocaine, but Rosas was not present to pick up two of the boxes, and they were sent to a forwarding address Gustavo had provided. Gustavo told Rosas he had made up the forwarding address. The two boxes were never found.

"I do not know where the boxes were sent to, nor where the money is at now," Rosas told the army investigators. "So basically, somebody received $140,000."

The sworn statement suggests informants finally broke up the smuggling operation.

Rosas said he shipped 134 pounds of cocaine between July 2003 and March 2005 to the United States and sold it for about $260,000. He said Irizarry-Melendez smuggled another 35 pounds, while the others mainly fronted money to buy the drugs.

Asked by the investigators how he felt after being caught, Rosas replied: "Disgraced, unfaithful, disloyal, saddened and I wish I never did it."

Gun Control Efforts Weaken In South (BOS)

By Alan Wirzbicki, Globe Correspondent

The Boston Globe, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Even as Boston struggles against a tide of smuggled handguns, some state governments in the South are loosening their gun control laws in ways that critics say will make it easier for traffickers to bring illegal firearms into the Northeast.

Under pressure from the National Rifle Association, South Carolina abolished a state law last year that limited to one the number of handguns individuals can buy in a month, a measure that was designed in 1975 to prevent trafficking.

Virginia, which was the epicenter of gun smuggling into New York and Boston before it passed a one-gun-per-month law in 1993, weakened that rule in 2004 and gun control advocates fear that it could soon be abolished.

Academic studies have shown that limits on monthly gun purchases help limit smuggling, but lobbyists for gun manufacturers call such laws "gun rationing" and say they infringe on Second Amendment gun ownership rights.

Over the past five years the overall trend on the state level has been toward lax gun laws, said David Hemenway, a professor at the Harvard School of Public Health who studies gun crime. That has left states such as Massachusetts and New York, which retain their strict gun limits, increasingly isolated.

When it is easy to buy firearms in neighboring states, Hemenway said, "it just makes it a lot harder for states with less permissive gun laws to keep guns out."

Urban jurisdictions in the Northeast have some of the most restrictive gun ownership laws in the country, though shootings in Boston were up 11 percent from last year, according to statistics obtained by the Globe.

Police seized 490 guns in Boston through Aug. 23, up from 380 in the same period last year and 294 in 2001. A large percentage of those guns originated from outside the region.

Last month, a South Carolina judge sentenced a Boston man to 24 years in federal prison for buying 21 guns in the state, which he resold illegally in Boston after removing their serial numbers.

Sergeant Thomas Sexton, a spokesman for the Boston Police Department, said the police were concerned that less restrictive gun laws in other states would fuel smuggling into the region.

"It is a concern that some of these other states are relaxing some of their gun laws," he said.

South Carolina Governor Mark Sanford, a Democrat, signed legislation ending that state's ban in May 2004. In Virginia, Democratic Governor Mark Warner, who may seek the party's 2008 presidential nomination, approved an exemption for gun owners with "right-to-carry" permits from the state's one-gun-a-month limit.

Pinpointing the precise source of guns smuggled into the Northeast is difficult, analysts say, because last year Congress inserted a provision into a spending bill that prevented the US Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms, and Explosives from releasing federal data about where guns used in violent crimes originated.

The amendment, sponsored by US Representative Todd Tiahrt, a Kansas Republican, prohibited the ATF from releasing documents related to "traces" of guns. Local authorities can request traces for individual firearms to locate the owner of a stolen gun or in criminal investigations, but they don't have access to traces requested by other agencies.

As part of an ongoing lawsuit, the city of New York has subpoenaed the ATF over access to trace data, which New York police hope to use to identify rogue gun dealers.

Lawyers from the city sought trace reports to establish that many guns used to commit crimes come from the same sources.

A federal judge has ruled in favor of the city twice, but the ATF is still seeking to avoid turning over the traces.

In 1999, when the ATF last made some data from gun traces available, the report showed that Florida was the top source of handguns used by youth criminals in Massachusetts in 1997-98, accounting for 17.6 percent of crime. By comparison, only 14.7 percent of guns came from in-state.

Virginia, North Carolina, and Florida were the top three sources of crime guns for young people in New York City.

Brian Malte, outreach director of the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence, an antigun group, said that while the repeal of gun control laws was worrying, another problem is the many states that lack strong gun control laws to begin with.

"It's not like a South Carolina, that they've passed and then repealed the law," he said.

"They just never had the laws to begin with."

1.7M Kids At Home With Loaded Guns (USAT)

By Marilyn Elias

USA Today, September 6, 2005

About 1.7 million U.S. children live in homes with loaded, unlocked firearms, according to the largest survey ever done on home weapons storage, out today in the Pediatrics online journal (www.pediatrics.org).

James Mercy, researcher with the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, and colleague Catherine Okoro analyzed surveys of 224,000 adults done by health departments in 50 states and the District of Columbia during 2002.

One-third of adults have handguns, rifles or shotguns at home, says the CDC report. But states vary greatly in the percentage of adults who keep weapons, and in how many with children at home store their guns loaded and unlocked. The states with the highest percentage of adults who have children at home and leave guns unlocked and loaded are Alabama, Alaska, Arkansas, Idaho, Montana and Wyoming.

Eighteen states have laws dealing with proper storage of guns to limit access by children, says Jon Vernick, co-director of the Center for Gun Policy and Research at Johns Hopkins University's school of public health. But the laws vary in strictness — 7 states make it a felony under some circumstances to give minors access to weapons — and they vary in the ages of kids covered, he says.

There's little known about how well these laws are enforced, Vernick adds. "They're great, and we absolutely need more states with laws. But often they seem to get enforced after it's too late, when a child has shot himself or someone else."

Two studies show accidental gun deaths and teen suicides decline in states with these laws, Vernick says.

The Pediatrics report says that of 1,400 children and teens shot to death in 2002, about 90% were home when it happened.

"It's a frightening problem," says Michael Barnes, president of the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence, a lobbying group that favors limiting gun ownership.

The gun storage survey may underestimate kids with access to firearms, says CDC's Mercy, because women tend to underreport the presence of weapons at home, past studies show. About 60% of survey participants were women.

Gun ownership has declined in the past decade, says Barnes, because the USA is increasingly urban and fewer adults hunt.

Andrew Arulanandam, spokesman for the National Rifle Association of America, declined to comment on specific laws but says, "The sad reality is, you cannot legislate responsibility."

Education is the best way to reduce gun accidents, and the NRA runs many education programs, he says. "Children are by nature curious and will try to seek out objects they shouldn't have. … It's up to the parents to see that firearms are stored safely."

IMMIGRATION:

Fox Says U.S. Shares Blame For Problems Along Border (NYT)

By Ginger Thompson

MEXICO CITY, Sept. 4 - President Vicente Fox responded over the weekend to criticism from American authorities about a recent surge in violence and illegal immigration along the border, saying that the United States shares responsibility for the problems and should work harder with Mexico to fix them.

Mr. Fox said he rejected "forcefully" the statements by the Bush administration and governors of border states, contending that they had unfairly depicted Mexico as a safe haven for organized crime, though his government has arrested more leading drug traffickers and dismantled more cartels than any of its predecessors. He also said Mexican immigrants had been portrayed unfairly as potential terrorists when they had in fact become a pillar of the American economy.

In an interview aboard the presidential airplane on Saturday, Mr. Fox acknowledged that his government had a long way to go to make the border secure. But he said the United States should stop casting blame for problems created by both countries.

He also said the United States should not allow concerns about border security to derail efforts to adopt new measures to allow millions of additional Mexicans to become guest workers in the United States.

"Security is a shared responsibility," President Fox said. Then, referring to the United States, he said, "I don't understand that now they only cast blame and accusations, and they do not collaborate or cooperate so that together we can resolve this problem."

On the changes in immigration policy, he said: "There is will on the part of President Bush, according to what he has expressed publicly, and what he has expressed in conversations with us. So, I trust that in the coming weeks and months, we will succeed finally in arriving at a positive resolution for the benefit of both countries."

More pressing realities, however, may once again stand in the way. Work on immigration policy was first postponed four years ago, after the Sept. 11 attacks. Then it was put off for Mr. Bush's re-election campaign. Now, it may be set aside again as the United States struggles to recover from Hurricane Katrina.

But Mr. Fox has little time left; he is entering his last year in office.

His comments were aimed at what many here perceive as a troubling shift in United States attitudes and diplomatic policy toward Mexico.

In recent weeks, the United States has openly berated Mexico for failing to stop a wave of drug-related violence that has taken close to 1,000 lives along the 2,000-mile border. The Bush administration has issued numerous travel advisories and temporarily closed its consulate in the city of Nuevo Laredo, which has turned into a murder capital as drug traffickers fight for control of lucrative routes into Texas.

Last month, the governors of New Mexico and Arizona declared states of emergency, saying they needed federal help to fend off a flood of undocumented migrants.

Neither Mr. Fox nor his aides denied the problems. But the authorities here said that the responses from the United States did not reflect the complexities of the problems, nor did they acknowledge that Mexico had undertaken significant efforts to address them.

"This self-sustained blaming someone else, is it going to help anything?" said a high-level intelligence official who asked not to be named because of the diplomatic sensitivities involved. "If everyone in the United States keeps profiting politically from this very difficult situation, then we are not going to be able to make things better." He added, "We are trying to do our job, even with our limited resources."

Mr. Fox said trade and other day-to-day interactions between the countries had not been affected by the political tensions, and he said he trusted that President Bush would not allow concerns over security to stall efforts to pass changes in immigration requirements.

"Let there be no doubt, that we are going to win this battle," he said, referring to his government's efforts in Nuevo Laredo. "So it cannot be used as a pretext to provoke a distancing in relations between the United States and Mexico."

He said his country shared the pain of the hurricane. An estimated 140,000 Mexicans were affected, he said, and 70,000 are unaccounted for. But now, he said, the contributions of Mexican workers could be more important than ever.

"The reconstruction of that city and of that region is going to require a lot of labor," Mr. Fox said of New Orleans, Mississippi and Alabama. "And if there is anything Mexicans are good at, it is construction."

Union Organizers At Poultry Plants In South Find Newly Sympathetic Ears (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

MORRISTOWN, Tenn. - Hour after hour, Antonia Lopez Paz said, her supervisor at the Koch Foods poultry plant here told women on the deboning line that production demands were so great that they could not go to the bathroom.

Sometimes she developed acute pain because she could not go, Ms. Lopez said. And one time when another woman asked for permission, "the supervisor took off his hard hat and told her, 'You can go to the bathroom in this,' " said Ms. Lopez, a

Mexican immigrant who moved to this town in East Tennessee three years ago, lured by the company's promise of year-round work.

Out of her solitary complaint has grown a thriving unionization drive that fits neatly into the plans of several insurgent unions that hope to revive the labor movement by focusing on low-wage workers and immigrant workers.

"We believe there is a need for a union to come in and help these workers," said Joe Hansen, president of the United Food and Commercial Workers, which is organizing workers at the two Koch Foods plants here. "The conditions in some of these places are criminal, especially in the way they treat undocumented workers, and it's criminal that they often get away with it."

This summer Mr. Hansen's union joined the Teamsters and the Service Employees International Union in breaking away from the A.F.L.-C.I.O., with those three unions promising to devote far more energy to recruiting workers than the rest of organized labor has. Two organizing drives aimed at poultry workers - one in this old factory town and the other in Russellville, Ala. - are among the early battles in this effort to reinvigorate labor.

As part of their new push, the insurgent unions say they will seek to build deep community support among local houses of worship, political leaders and immigrant groups. They also plan to lend organizers to one other's drives, something the food and commercial workers could use because it has few Spanish-speaking organizers in areas like Morristown, where the Hispanic population is soaring.

The 700 poultry workers here, most of them Mexicans, might seem ripe for organizing, but labor's efforts at resurgence face daunting obstacles. Companies often fight back tooth and nail, and many immigrants who are initially sympathetic to unions ultimately shy away, fearing that their employers might grow angry and fire them or have them deported.

"It's been extraordinarily difficult to organize factory workers - and that includes poultry workers - in the South," said Daniel Cornfield, a labor expert at Vanderbilt University in Nashville. "There's plenty of employer resistance in this neck of the woods. And then there's another problem - there's an unfamiliarity between unions and immigrants, far more so in the South than on the coasts. Unions here don't know much about the culture of immigrant workers, and then many immigrant workers are unfamiliar with U.S. labor unions."

But Ms. Lopez was the exception, knowing a good deal about American unions. The daughter of a migrant worker, she saw how the United Farm Workers helped her father when he harvested vegetables in Arizona.

Last April she quit Koch Foods because she was pregnant and the managers rejected her request to be transferred to a less rigorous position. Her job as a wing cutter was so arduous that she feared it would jeopardize her pregnancy.

Like many other workers, she disliked the 42-chickens-a-minute line speed. That pace means that many workers make 18,000 cuts during their eight-hour shifts as they prepare breasts, wings, tenders and cutlets for restaurants and consumers.

"What I didn't like is they would yell at us and tell us we're good for nothing and we didn't know how to work, and sometimes they wouldn't even let us leave to go home when we were sick," Ms. Lopez said as she nursed her month-old son. "We need to convince people to join the union, that they shouldn't be afraid because the union is the only way to make things better and stop them from mistreating at us."

Officials with Koch Foods declined requests to be interviewed. But at proceedings that the Tennessee Occupational Safety and Health Administration held in response to Ms. Lopez's bathroom complaint, Koch representatives said their supervisors were attentive to workers' concerns and gave adequate bathroom breaks.

Several Koch workers said the bathroom break situation improved after the unionization drive began, although some workers said problems remained. In August the state's safety administration dismissed their complaints for lack of evidence.

After Ms. Lopez quit, the unionization drive continued to gain momentum, fueled by the complaints about mistreatment and low wages. The top pay is $7.55 an hour, even for employees there a decade.

"That level of pay is a misery, an embarrassment, considering how hard we work," said Ernestina Gonzalez, who earns the top wage and said she could not afford the premiums for the health insurance the company offers.

In northwest Alabama, 280 miles to the west, workers at the Gold Kist plant in Russellville voice similar complaints about line speed, wages and bathroom breaks. But many Gold Kist employees also complain about how injuries are handled. Most of the plant's 1,500 workers are Hispanic, but there are also many blacks and whites.

One day last December, Delores Smith slipped on a greasy metal plate. Ms. Smith, who prepares boxes to hold processed chickens, crashed to the floor and was in agony, certain that she had broken her right ankle.

She said Gold Kist's nurse did not even look at her ankle and told her that she must have sprained some ligaments and should take ibuprofen and go home. After a supervisor took her to her car, Ms. Smith looked at her ankle and saw pieces of bone protruding through her sock. When her son took her to the emergency room, X-rays showed that her ankle was broken in three places.

Ms. Smith still limps slightly, but now she has another health crisis. Her job involves removing folded-up boxes that workers upstairs send to her via a chute. Those boxes often tumble out, and one day in July the boxes knocked her eyeglasses to the floor, breaking the frames.

Looking comical in her taped-together glasses, Ms. Smith said: "They sent me home for the day, saying it was my fault. I also got a write-up. My glasses can't even be fixed."

At first, Gold Kist refused to pay for new glasses, which she said would cost $378. With her base wage of $8.40 an hour, that would exceed her weekly pay. Workers who do not arrive late or miss a day for a whole week receive a 75-cent-an-hour bonus.

The company, she said, has now offered to pay $38 toward the glasses. She hopes to get some more from workers' compensation.

Ms. Smith said she and the two other workers in her unit often could not go to the bathroom for hours at a time because the pace was so demanding and there was nobody to replace them.

"They don't respect us at all," she said. "That's why I'm praying for a union."

Yurken Pozo, who quit in early August, said Gold Kist was campaigning hard against unionization.

"They gathered the workers together and kept telling us: 'We don't need a union. The union will only take your money. The union doesn't help anybody,' " Mr. Pozo said.

Wayne Lord, Gold Kist's vice president for corporate relations, said the company's policy was to provide workers with needed bathroom breaks. He voiced surprise about Ms. Smith's health care complaints, saying Gold Kist had a telephone line that employees could call anonymously to report problems about bathroom breaks or medical treatment.

Gold Kist has long told employees why it thinks unions are unnecessary, Mr. Lord said. That practice helped persuade the Russellville workers to vote down a union twice in the 1990's.

"We believe our wages are competitive," Mr. Lord said. "We strive everyday to do the right thing by our employees."

The union is collecting signatures from workers and may soon ask for recognition from the company or for a unionization vote.

Back in Morristown, the Koch poultry workers are so united behind a union and have generated so much community support that they persuaded Koch to pledge not to mount an anti-union campaign. Several workers spoke at churches, and ministers, congregants and community groups wrote letters to the company backing unionization. The workers at Koch's kill plant and deboning plant are expected to approve unionization in mid-September.

"What Koch did is an important precedent," said Anita Grabowski, coordinator of the Poultry Workers Justice Project, a nonprofit group based in Austin, Tex. "This new model of community unionism is a way to help rebuild the labor movement, even in a hostile climate."

Feds Say Telecom Tycoon Trying To Move Assets From Jail (LEGALT)

By Jason McLure, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 5, 2005

Even from jail, Walter Anderson, the D.C. telecom tycoon accused of concealing $450 million from the Internal Revenue Service, continued to try to hide money overseas, federal prosecutors say.

On Aug. 24, prosecutors filed in court a transcript of a taped jailhouse phone call from Anderson to an overseas business associate that they say shows him trying to move assets beyond the government's reach. On March 22, Anderson placed a collect call to the associate from the D.C. Correctional Treatment Facility to discuss moving an investment from a Cayman Island company to a blind trust on the Isle of Man.

In the transcript, Anderson says Chadbourne & Parke corporate attorney Hwan Kim was advising him on the offshore deal. "I had a meeting with my attorney, Hwan Kim," Anderson says in the call. "I explained to him the logic that we were trying to create some full separation. He understands completely what we're trying to do. He said that there are a number of different ways to do it . . . he simply suggested that if you could decide which lawyer you want to do it on your side, he'll see if his firm has somebody appropriate to do it on the other side." Moments later, Anderson tells the business associate: "The main thing we have to make sure [is] it's reversible, in some way . . . so that when we clean up the mess, we can reverse it." The transcript makes no mention of how much money would be involved.

Kim did not return calls, but a Chadbourne spokesman issued a statement saying: "[W]e do not and have not represented Orbital Recovery [the Cayman company mentioned in the transcript] and, therefore, have not advised them on any transaction, domestic or foreign, Isle of Man or elsewhere."

Kim previously worked at Swidler Berlin, a firm that advised Anderson's companies for more than a decade. Kim's partner at Chadbourne, Abbe Lowell, is representing Anderson in the criminal tax case.

The new filing comes just as Lowell asked to be dismissed from the matter, saying Anderson owes $1 million in fees. A hearing is set for Sept. 6.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Buying Time With Quick Action On The Court And A Second Trip To The South (NYT)

By Todd S. Purdum

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 5 - By 7:15 Monday morning, President Bush was meeting in the Oval Office with Judge John G. Roberts Jr. to offer him the nomination for the 17th chief justice of the United States. On most Mondays, that might be a good day's work, but Mr. Bush's Labor Day was just beginning, and not everything else about it was quite so crisp or well timed.

On the White House lawn, Marine One was waiting to take Mr. Bush on the first leg of his second trip in three days to inspect the devastation left by Hurricane Katrina in Louisiana and Mississippi. He traded a suit and tie for slacks and a soft-blue sports shirt, and flew straight into a thicket of continuing recriminations over his administration's handling of the disaster and into an awkward dance with the Democratic governor of Louisiana over who would command relief efforts.

"We're going to show the world once again that not only we will survive, but we'll be stronger and better for it, when it's all said and done, that amidst this darkness, there is light," Mr. Bush said at the emergency operations center in Baton Rouge, La. It was a line that echoed William Faulkner and the Bible, meant to bring hope and comfort to the displaced and the desperate.

But just how well Mr. Bush would endure the political challenges posed by the hurricane, much less prevail over them, remained a question on Monday. He assured a crowd at a makeshift shelter at the Bethany World Prayer Center in Baton Rouge, "This is a project that not only deals with the immediate; we're going to have to deal with the long term as well."

In elevating the nomination of Judge Roberts from associate justice to fill the Supreme Court seat left vacant by the death of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, Mr. Bush acted with typical dispatch and self-assurance to address one of the immediate and unexpected challenges that landed on his desk, perhaps turning it into an opportunity. Judge Roberts, a former Rehnquist law clerk, has already drawn considerable praise, from both parties, for his intellect and acumen. And though some Senate Democrats were quick to suggest that the scrutiny would be greater in considering him for chief justice, his eventual confirmation would not seem to be in any significant doubt.

That means Mr. Bush may well have a chief justice, firmly in Chief Justice Rehnquist's conservative mold, in place by the time the court reconvenes on the first Monday in October, with time to consider - and perhaps calibrate - the more politically delicate task of choosing a successor for Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who has been the court's swing vote on contentious issues like abortion, affirmative action and religion.

It also buys Mr. Bush a bit of time to untangle the aftermath of the hurricane, a job that his trip on Monday suggested might take a while, as the images of suffering continued to dominate television news coverage during the long holiday weekend. The challenge for the president is to repair the political damage caused by the government's slow response to the disaster and to counter the sense that his initial flyover in Air Force One on the way home from vacation and his on-the-ground visit to the region last Friday had sounded some sour notes - all without looking political.

That proved not so easy on Monday, after a weekend of behind-the-scenes finger pointing between administration officials and state and local leaders over who was to blame for the inadequacy of initial relief efforts. Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco of Louisiana has been at odds with administration officials over whether to federalize the National Guard in her state, and her aides said she learned of Mr. Bush's latest visit only from early morning news reports, then rearranged her schedule to make a couple of joint appearances with him.

Having been faulted by some as not spending enough time last week with black victims of the flooding in New Orleans, Mr. Bush was flanked at one point on Monday by prominent blacks, including Mayor Kip Holden of Baton Rouge and Bishop T. D. Jakes, a prominent Pentecostal minister from Dallas who has been courted by the White House in efforts to reach out to black voters.

William Kristol, the conservative publisher of The Weekly Standard, said of Mr. Bush: "I do think people think he could have showed stronger leadership." But Mr. Kristol expressed doubt that the hurricane would have much lasting effect on the president's personal and political fortunes, because "people are capable of saying, 'The president kind of screwed this one up, but I still basically agree with him.'"

Mr. Kristol added, "I think the Clinton administration would have done a better job in handling Hurricane Katrina, but I'm also glad Bush is president and not a Democrat."

For their part, Democrats on Capitol Hill wasted no time in pressing their advantage over a wounded president, repeatedly urging a delay in Judge Roberts's confirmation hearings until at least after Chief Justice Rehnquist's funeral on Wednesday, and demanding a postponement of Republicans' plans to take up one of Mr. Bush's longstanding goals, the repeal of the estate tax, in the Senate.

"Moving to the estate tax would be a travesty on top of a tragedy," said Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader.

It was a charge to which Mr. Reid's Republican counterpart, Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, effectively pleaded no contest late Monday, announcing a delay in addressing that issue. Mr. Frist also said the Homeland Security Committee would convene hearings to review the "weaknesses and strengths" of the federal response to the hurricane and to "apply the lessons learned."

But there is a risk for Democrats, too, in appearing too political, a reality that former President Bill Clinton acknowledged on Monday, saying, "I just think right now we need to focus on the suffering of the people and how to alleviate it and where to go from here."

Mr. Bush's father, the first President Bush, who has teamed up at the president's request with Mr. Clinton to raise money for hurricane victims, reflected on the criticism on Monday.

"The president can take it," the elder Mr. Bush said. But, he told reporters at a news conference with Mr. Clinton in Houston, "As a father? I don't like it," adding, "It goes with the territory."

The criticism has been visibly irritating to the president, a man capable of public displays of great tenderness whose resoluteness after the Sept. 11 attacks rallied the nation. On Monday, as he left the heavily damaged town of Poplarville, Miss., Mr. Bush insisted to local residents: "I understand. I understand the damage. I understand the devastation. I understand the destruction. I understand how long it's going to take. And we're with you."

Once more, Mr. Bush is hoping the people will be with him.

UPDATE 1-Bush: U.S. Will "do What It Takes" After Katrina (REU)

By Tabassum Zakaria

Reuters, September 5, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0002618

BATON ROUGE, La., Sept 5 (Reuters) - President George W. Bush, under fierce criticism for his government's slow response to Hurricane Katrina, promised on Monday that the U.S. would "do what it takes" to help victims of the devastating storm get back on their feet.

Bush was on his second visit to Louisiana and Mississippi, where the storm has caused one of the biggest humanitarian crises in U.S. history. On his first tour on Friday, five days after the huge scale of the disaster became apparent, the president acknowledged the initial relief effort had been "unacceptable."

"If it's not right, we're going to fix it, and if it is right, we're going to keep doing it. And this is just the beginning of a huge effort," Bush pledged after meeting disaster relief officials at an emergency operations center in Baton Rouge.

He added: "This is one of the disasters that will test our soul, and test our spirits."

At the Bethany World Prayer Center, where dozens of evacuees are being cared for, Bush was with Dallas religious broadcaster T.D. Jakes and Baton Rouge Mayor Kip Holden, who are both black, as he spoke to reporters.

Some black leaders have accused relief officials of not taking the crisis seriously enough because many of its victims are poor and black.

Bush has been under fire from Democrats and Republicans alike for a sluggish federal response to a flood that has made hundreds of thousands homeless and is feared to have killed several thousands along the northern Gulf of Mexico coast.

Bush has not publicly singled out anyone for criticism although there has been some finger-pointing between state, federal and local authorities. "All levels of government are doing the best they can," Bush said.

The outcry has triggered a major political crisis for Bush, already suffering from the lowest public approval ratings of his presidency, largely because of the war in Iraq.

"He's doing good now, I guess, since he came down to see it for himself," said one evacuee at the prayer center, Milton Beverly of Jefferson Parish, Louisiana.

Some victims at the center were still sleeping on mattresses on the floor when Bush and his wife Laura arrived.

The crowd quickly grew around Bush when the survivors realized the president had come to see them.

"We've got a lot of work to do," Bush told them.

"We can help save lives once a person finds a shelter such as this," he said. "The response of this country has been amazing." He said the country would "do what it takes" to help people get back on their feet.

He signed T-shirts, hugged women holding babies and sat on a bed next to pregnant Ailisa Eugene, of Metairie, Louisiana.

Bush Makes Return Visit; Two Levees Secured (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller And Clyde Haberman

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

As criticism raged over the federal government's response to Hurricane Katrina, President Bush returned to the region yesterday, and Army engineers patched up two levees that had been breached by the storm and cautiously began pumping water out of New Orleans.

Mr. Bush comforted victims in Poplarville, Miss., and Baton Rouge, La., but he found himself ensnared in a dispute with Louisiana's Democratic governor, Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, who learned of Mr. Bush's trip from news reports.

"There's a lot of work to be done," Mr. Bush told a group of mostly black victims at a makeshift shelter, the Bethany World Prayer Center, in Baton Rouge. He said that Americans' response to the disaster had been "amazing" and that "this country is going to be committed to doing what it takes to help people get back on their feet."

The president's trip, an effort to calm the region and part of a major White House campaign to stem the political damage from the hurricane, came as rescue teams in New Orleans searched for thousands of residents who remained in the city, many having ignored pleas to evacuate. The city's No. 2 police official, W. J. Riley, said his officers were trying to convince people that staying behind was pointless because "this city has been destroyed, completely destroyed."

As has been true for days, the death toll was assumed to be disastrously high, but estimates remained little more than guesses - perhaps educated, perhaps not. Officially, the Louisiana toll climbed to 71. The mayor of New Orleans, C. Ray Nagin, said the figure might well reach 10,000.

But there was some positive news yesterday. Army engineers said that after having dumped hundreds of bags filled with cement, sand and pieces of ruined roadways, they had closed the breach in the levee at the London Avenue Canal.

Late yesterday afternoon, state officials said that another crucial levee, on the 17th Street Canal, had also been patched up.

With those barriers at least temporarily restored, engineers began draining the flooded streets and sending the water back into Lake Pontchartrain, but carefully, using portable pumps set up at near the lake on the 17th Street canal. Gregory E. Breerwood, a city engineer, said, "We intend to take it slowly so we don't overtax the pumps themselves, because they have not been in service for a while."

West of the city, in Metairie, residents were permitted to return, if only for a day, to salvage what they could from their flooded houses.

In Baton Rouge, Governor Blanco greeted Mr. Bush as he arrived, but only after her press secretary called to alert her at 6 a.m. as she waited on a plane to take off from Baton Rouge for Houston. The press secretary, Denise Bottcher, said in an interview that she had first learned that Mr. Bush would be in Baton Rouge from news reports late Sunday and early yesterday, even though CNN had been reporting the president's trip to an unspecified location in Louisiana as early as Saturday.

"We're so busy, I can't sit down to watch TV," Ms. Bottcher said, adding. "Why should I get that news from CNN?"

Ms. Bottcher said she then called the White House yesterday morning, "and they extended an invitation."

Dana Perino, a White House spokeswoman, said the White House reached out to Ms. Blanco's office on Sunday and made contact with her yesterday morning.

Ms. Blanco and Mr. Bush have been at odds over the deployment of the National Guard in Louisiana, and both sides pointed fingers. On Friday night, Ms. Blanco refused to sign an agreement proposed by the White House to share control of National Guard forces in the state with federal authorities. "She would lose control when she had been in control from the very beginning," Ms. Bottcher said on Sunday.

The Times-Picayune, Louisiana's largest newspaper, published an open letter to Mr. Bush on Sunday that called for the firing of every official at the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

"We're angry, Mr. President, and we'll be angry long after our beloved city and surrounding parishes have been pumped dry," said the newspaper, which endorsed Mr. Bush for president in 2000 but made no endorsement in 2004.

At the Bethany World Prayer Center in Baton Rouge, the president's first stop of the day yesterday, some evacuees from the hurricane ran up to meet with Mr. Bush, but many hung back and looked on. One of them, Mildred Brown, who had been at the shelter since Tuesday, told The Associated Press: "I'm not star-struck; I need answers. I'm not interested in hand-shaking. I'm not interested in photo ops. This is going to take a lot of money."

One evacuee from New Orleans, Richard Landres, a lumberyard worker, was more positive about Mr. Bush. "I think he's doing what he can do," Mr. Landres said, according to a White House pool report.

Mr. Bush was flanked as he spoke by Mayor Kip Holden of Baton Rouge and T. D. Jakes, a conservative African-American television evangelist with a megachurch in Dallas who has been courted by the White House as a partner in reaching out to the black vote.

"I want to thank my friend T. D. Jakes for rallying the armies of compassion to help somebody like the mayor," Mr. Bush said.

Later in Baton Rouge, Mr. Bush spoke for an hour and a half with Ms. Blanco and members of Louisiana's Congressional delegation in a meeting that Ms. Bottcher described as "very positive" and that other participants called blunt. The elected officials said Mr. Bush mostly listened.

Representative Bobby Jindal, a Republican who represents New Orleans, said afterward that while the tone of the meeting was polite, "there was a lot of frustration."

"It was not hostile," Mr. Jindal said. "It was honest."

The trip was Mr. Bush's third survey of the region in the past week. He was in New Orleans and Biloxi, Miss., on Friday, and he flew over the area in Air Force One as he returned from an extended vacation on Wednesday.

Scott McClellan, the White House press secretary, said Mr. Bush did not go to New Orleans yesterday because he had visited it on Friday. On that visit, however, he did not go to the Superdome or the convention center, where tens of thousands of largely poor and black victims had been desperate for food and water for days, and some older evacuees had died in their wheelchairs. Mr. Bush did speak at the New Orleans airport and visit the repair work under way at the 17th Street Canal, where he met with workers, some of whom had lost their homes.

Mr. McClellan also said Mr. Bush steered clear of New Orleans yesterday because he did not want to disrupt continuing relief efforts.

"Today, he wanted to visit citizens of New Orleans who have been evacuated and are in need of continued assistance, as well as volunteers who are helping them," Mr. McClellan said in an e-mail message.

Yesterday afternoon, Mr. Bush spoke at a community college to residents of Poplarville, a small town about 40 miles inland that was badly hit by tornadoes accompanying the hurricane, then took a walking tour of a suburban street. Branches and trees littered the sides of roads, and electricity was still out, with water coming back slowly, but the damage was nothing like the destruction Mr. Bush saw on Friday in Biloxi.

"Out of this despair is going to come a vibrant coast," Mr. Bush told the crowd at the Pearl River Community College. "I understand if you're saying to yourself, 'Well, it's hard for me to realize what George W. is saying because I've seen the rubble and I know what has happened to my neighbors.' But I'd like to come back down here in about two years and walk your streets and see how vital this part of the world is going to be."

Some residents said Mr. Bush's visit to Poplarville had lifted their spirits. "He said the worst was going to be over," said Dawn Stuit, 48, a real estate agent, who had spoken to the president on the street and said that he had kissed her cheek. She said she was feeling better yesterday because her electricity would be restored soon. "I think the president visiting had something to do with the power coming back on," she said.

Other residents viewed the president's visit with anger. "If it takes them a week to figure out that people need food and water, maybe they need to step back and fire themselves," said Robert Duke, 43, waiting in a gas line in Poplarville. "Some of them need to go to jail over this."

In New Orleans, the city took a few slow steps on the arduous journey toward recovery. Power was even restored in some neighborhoods.

Mayor Nagin, who had raged against the federal government days ago for what he called its slow response to the crisis, struck a more positive tone, despite his estimate of the large number of dead. "We're making great progress now," he said on the "Today" program on NBC. "The momentum has picked up. I'm starting to see some critical tasks being completed."

After days of looting and reports of murders and rapes, the New Orleans police and military troops asserted control. "We continue in lockdown," said Mr. Riley, assistant police superintendent. "I feel the city is very secure," he said. "Chaos is moving to being organized chaos. It's better now."

A major issue, he said, is clearing the city of remaining residents to prepare for the cleanup. "Our officers are telling people there's absolutely no reason to stay," Mr. Riley said. "There are no homes to go to, there's no hotels."

Social services officials in Louisiana said yesterday that about 114,000 people had taken refuge in shelters stretching from West Virginia to Utah. The largest number, 54,000, remained in Louisiana, but almost as many were in Texas. Officials also said that in the last three days they had received 90,000 applications for food stamps from hurricane victims. Typically, they said, they process 1,300 applications a day.

Long-term problems facing people along the Gulf of Mexico were raised by former Presidents George Bush and Bill Clinton. As in the aftermath of the Asian tsunami, they were asked by President Bush to help raise money for evacuees.

"Recovery is going to take years," former President Bush said in Houston as he and Mr. Clinton announced the creation of a new fund.

Mr. Clinton touched on the need to find jobs for people who had left their homes. "One of the things we have to ask is: What could we do to give incentives for people to get jobs where they have to relocate," he said. "A lot of these people will be out of their homes a year or more."

Bush, Blanco Reveal Strained Relationship (AJC/AP)

By Jennifer Loven, Associated Press Writer

DOJ_NMG_0002621

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 6, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La. — Like estranged in-laws at a holiday gathering, President Bush and Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco kept their distance as both toured a relief center for storm victims Monday. At their next stop, the Republican president kissed the Democratic governor on the cheek, but it wasn't clear whether they had made up.

State and federal officials are all facing public criticism for a slow response to the crisis. Behind the scenes, each suggests the other is to blame.

In front of the cameras during Bush's visit to the Gulf Coast states on Monday, the president and Blanco said little to each other, focusing instead on thanking relief workers.

"I know I don't need to make any other introduction other than `Mr. President,'" Blanco said tersely, turning the microphone over to Bush after praising emergency management officials during a stop with Bush at an emergency operations center.

"This is one of these disasters that will test our soul and test our spirit, but we're going to show the world once again that not only can we survive but we will be stronger and better for it," Bush said after taking the microphone.

Blanco late Monday sought to tone down suggestions of a rift.

"We'd like to stop the voices out there trying to create a divide," she said. "There is no divide. We're all in this together. Every leader in this nation wants to see this problem solved."

Bush echoed Blanco's praise for rescue workers. "I hope that makes you feel good to know you have saved lives," Bush said, promising state, local and federal officials that he would fix anything that isn't going right. "This is just the beginning of a huge effort," he said.

The president, looking choked up as he finished his brief remarks, nodded at Blanco and kissed her on the cheek. She nodded back and both left the podium, headed for separate spots in the crowd.

Blanco has refused to sign over control of the National Guard to the federal government and has turned to a Clinton administration official, former Federal Emergency Management Agency chief James Lee Witt, to help run relief efforts.

Blanco was not told when Bush would visit the state, nor was she immediately invited to meet him or travel with him. Blanco's office didn't know Bush was coming until told by reporters. Bush spokesman Scott McClellan said the White House reached out to Blanco's office on Sunday, but didn't hear back. White House staff in Louisiana spoke with Blanco early Monday, he said.

Making his third visit to the Hurricane Katrina-ravaged states, Bush stopped first at the Bethany World Prayer Center, a huge hall half covered with pallets and half filled with dining tables. Blanco visited at the same time, but she and Bush kept apart as they walked around talking to people.

During his stop at Bethany, several people ran up to meet Bush and get autographs as he and first lady Laura Bush wandered around the room. But just as many hung back and looked on.

"I need answers," said Mildred Brown, who has been there since Tuesday with her husband, mother-in-law and cousin. "I'm not interested in handshaking. I'm not interested in photo ops. This is going to take a lot of money."

Bush hasn't gone a day without a public event devoted to the storm and its aftermath. But none of those trips so far — nor appearances by several Cabinet members in the region — has quieted complaints that Washington's response to the disaster has been sluggish. Congress already plans hearings on the response.

Bush's trip Monday was his third inspection tour, the second by ground. Last week, he had his pilot lower Air Force One, the presidential jet, to an altitude of about 2,500 feet as he flew over the area. Last Friday, he walked a neighborhood in Biloxi on Mississippi's coast and stopped at the airport and a breached levee in New Orleans.

By contrast, Baton Rouge, about 80 miles northwest of New Orleans, largely escaped damage. Its population, however, has swelled dramatically with displaced people and is experiencing clogged roads and supply shortages.

On Monday afternoon, Bush headed to Poplarville, Miss., to meet with Republican Gov. Haley Barbour and other state and local officials at the Pearl River Community College. The city is about 45 miles inland, but the area was in the path of Katrina's eye and the town and surrounding rural areas suffered enormous devastation.

Bush said he understood his optimism about the region's recovery is hard for others to share: "It's easy for me to say that I can see a better tomorrow because I haven't been living through what you are living, but I do," he said.

On Bush's last stop of the day, he walked a middle-class Poplarville street of tidy ranch homes and commiserated with residents. Unlike many other places in the hurricane zone, the homes were intact, with downed trees and power lines the only evidence of the storm.

Bush has come under fire for waiting two days after Katrina hit — and a day after levee breaks drowned New Orleans and turned it into a place of lawless misery — to return to Washington from his August break in Texas to oversee the federal response.

It took several days for food and water to reach the tens of thousands of desperate New Orleans residents who took shelter in the increasingly squalid and deadly Superdome and city convention center. Outlying areas suffered some of the same problems.

Officials are reporting progress and new worries.

Russ Knocke, a Department of Homeland Security spokesman, said at least 22,800 people have been rescued — more than four times the number the Coast Guard usually saves in a year.

At least 155,000 people have been evacuated from the stricken areas, most of them now housed in some 560 shelters, he said. More than 60,000 civilian and military personnel are assisting.

Hundreds of federal health officers and nearly 100 tons of medical supplies were sent to try to head off disease, feared because of hot weather, mosquitos and standing water holding human waste, corpses and other contaminants.

In Houston, former Presidents George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton announced a nationwide fundraising campaign to help hurricane victims.

New Orleans Mayor Says Death Toll Could Be 10,000 (LAT)

By Ellen Barry, Scott Gold And David Zucchino

The Los Angeles Times, September 6, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Tens of thousands of residents today returned to suburban New Orleans to view what was left of their lives, a week after Hurricane Katrina dealt the Gulf Coast a deadly blow.

President Bush took his second tour of region, hoping to calm days of criticism that the federal government acted too slowly in dealing with the tragedy that New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin said could have cost 10,000 lives. There were also reports of a dangerous bacterial infection spread by contaminated saltwater.

Accompanying Bush was Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, who along with Nagin has been a fierce critic of the federal effort. Bush planted a kiss on the governor's cheek, but their staffs continued their wrangling.

The Army Corps of Engineers announced that it had repaired one of the levees that had shattered last week, turning this low-lying city into a polluted lake. Today, officials estimated that most of the city remained underwater. But they were hoping to start the pumps soon that would begin drying out and restoring life to the city that has become a soggy ghost town with almost all its half a million residents evacuated to shelters elsewhere.

Between 20,000 and 30,000 evacuees from suburban Jefferson Parish, just outside New Orleans, returned to their homes at dawn today, taking advantage of an offer by parish officials to stay for four days.

Thousands came supplied with coolers crammed with food and water to sustain them until parish sheriff's deputies force everyone to leave again Thursday.

The parish's move, which was criticized by some parish officials as too dangerous, began at 6 a.m. sharp, when police removed cruisers that had blocked a four-lane highway at the western edge of the parish. The residents, most of whom had slept in their cars on a highway Sunday night, sped into the township, eager to see their homes since evacuating a week ago.

Swerving past toppled trees and downed power lines, most found their homes intact. The parish, the second-largest in the state with 480,000 residents, was spared the widespread flooding that left more than 80% of adjacent New Orleans underwater. About 15% of the parish was flooded, said parish Councilman Chris Roberts.

Although some homes are underwater, Roberts said, most are intact. Thousands lost sections of roofs and siding, and many were struck by falling trees and limbs. Electricity, phones and water have been knocked out, and stores have been looted. Even so, the scale of destruction and displacement was far less than in New Orleans.

The residents' return came as parish officials were condemning the Federal Emergency Management Agency and other national and state relief organizations for failing to offer assistance. On Monday, a week after the hurricane, the parish still had not received outside aid, officials said.

Charges that federal officials have let down the region have become more frequent in recent days as the scale of the catastrophe has become clearer. Since Monday, when Katrina made landfall in the gulf, estimates of the death toll have steadily risen as has the cost of damage.

New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin said on NBC's "Today" that "it wouldn't be unreasonable to have 10,000" dead.

Estimates of the cost are around $25 billion in insurance claims and a like amount to repair infrastructure like highways, water supplies and sewage plants in more than four Southern states. There are no figures for caring for the hundreds of thousands of refugees made homeless by the storm or for the lost incomes, schooling and destroyed lives.

Cleanup in some places could take months. New Orleans is expected to remain empty for weeks until the water is removed.

Facing what is shaping up as one of the nation's worst disasters, President Bush again insisted that the government was doing what it could.

"I think all levels of government are doing the best they can," Bush said when asked about the federal response during a visit to Bethany World Prayer Center in Baton Rouge. "The response of this country is amazing."

When the president and his wife, Laura, arrived, some of the 200 evacuees were still sleeping, wrapped in quilts and lying on mattresses on the floor. But the crowd quickly grew.

"Laura and I have come back down here to let the good people of this region know there's a lot of work to be done, and we're going to get it done," Bush said.

It was a message that Bush has been pressing for days, during a trip to the region last week and a visit to the Red Cross in Washington over the weekend.

Today, he also tried to spread hope and blessings to workers and the Emergency Operations Center in Baton Rouge and to refugees at the Pearl River Community College in Poplarville, Miss.

"So let me conclude by asking for God's blessings on you all, and your families and friends, and let you know we're here for the long term," he said in Mississippi. "I understand. I understand the damage. I understand the devastation. I understand the destruction. I understand how long it's going to take. And we're with you. That's what I want you to know."

His comments were similar to those he made in Louisiana.

"This is one of these disasters that will test our soul and test our spirit," he said. "We're going to show the world, once again, that not only we will survive, but that we will be stronger and better for it when it's all said and done, that amid this darkness, there is light.

"And I want to thank you all for providing light, immediate light to people who needed help," he told the emergency workers. "You make your state and your local governments and your country proud."

The president returned to the White House later in the day.

While Bush was praising in public, behind the scenes there were simmering disputes about who was in charge and whether enough had been done. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff minimized reports of bureaucratic infighting during a news conference today in New Orleans.

Army Lt. Gen. Russel Honore, who has emerged as a hero for cutting red tape to bring food and water to evacuees waiting for days in the city's inadequate shelters, used profane language to dismiss the charges at the same news conference.

Today, officials at the Centers for Disease Control said some of the refugees have contracted a bacterial disease called vibrio vulnificus. It may have been picked up by people with open wounds who were forced to wade through badly polluted waters for long periods of time.

Vibrio vulnificus is a more benign cousin of the bacterium that causes cholera -- and was only discovered, officials said, because tests were done amid false reports that cholera had been discovered among the evacuees.

Among healthy people, the bacteria can cause vomiting, diarrhea and abdominal pain but is generally not life-threatening. It can be readily cured with antibiotics such as doxycycline or cephalosporins. Those who recover show no long-term effects.

It is substantially more serious in people with chronic liver disease or people who have compromised immune systems, such as those taking transplant drugs or those with AIDS.

Von Roebuck, a spokesman for the CDC in Atlanta, said officials have detected the disease among some storm refugees and stragglers but has not been able to determine the number of cases.

"We are seeing some cases," he said. "It could be life-threatening."

An average of about 50 cases of vibrio, 45 hospitalizations and 16 deaths are reported each year in the Gulf Coast states, but many experts believe the actual number is far higher. Most of those cases occur between May and October, when the ocean water is warmer.

Mayor Nagin said the possibility of epidemics is a critical concern.

"The water quality in the streets continues to deteriorate," he said. "There is some really nasty looking stuff out there. I worry about it every day. The more time that passes, there are more dead bodies left floating, and more mosquitoes breeding and hatching. They bite people who are dead."

Despite the difficulties, there was some progress.

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers has completed repairs to the 17th Street canal, said Cleo Allen, a public information officer for state Department of Transportation and Development. That breach in the levee was one of two that last Tuesday turned this low-lying city into a polluted lake, stranding tens of thousands of people without food and clean water.

Next, engineers will begin to pump water out of the city — "dewatering," as they call it. The first major pump to reactivate will be the Mounds pumping station, but engineers must secure power for those pumps, and check the stability of outfall walls.

Crews from the Department of Transportation are involved in clearing massive amounts of debris, and in moving evacuees out of the Chalmette area. Between 5,000 and 6,000 people were ferried out of Chalmette over the past few days, Allen said.

Security also continues to be restored.

Seven thousand additional National Guard troops will be in place by tonight, said Major Gen. Bennett Landreneau of the Louisiana National Guard. The total number of forces in the city will climb to 10,000, he said.

The number of troops in place has grown very rapidly, beginning with 4,000 National Guardsmen who were mobilized before the hurricane. Landreneau said the Guard's priorities "continue to be saving lives. We're focusing on the security, law and order, and the support of existing critical infrastructure."

Texas has taken in an estimated 250,000 people. As many as 1 million others from southern Louisiana heeded the warnings and fled to friends and relatives before Katrina struck the Gulf Coast last Monday.

At a news conference outside the Astrodome in Houston, which is sheltering an estimated 15,000 evacuees, former Presidents Bill Clinton and George H.W. Bush this morning announced formation of a fundraising foundation to help Katrina victims: bushclintonkatrinafund.org.

"A lot of these people have no cars, no work, no home, no nothing. They depend on us to give them a future," Clinton said.

Both were asked about criticism of the federal government. Bush sidestepped the question, but Clinton suggested that a commission should be formed to investigate the government's slow response.

"I think it's an appropriate thing to look into, but not at this time," Clinton said. "Right now, we're still finding bodies out there."

Asked why FEMA did not move more quickly, Clinton told reporters: "That's a question you should be asking them. It has something to do with how they reorganized after I left."

Clinton, Bush, their wives and other dignitaries toured the Astrodome, where Clinton spoke to a woman who said she was glad that her 113-year-old mother was rescued.

Joining the two former presidents at the news conference was Lee Scott, chairman and CEO of Wal-Mart. The company pledged $23 million for the fund.

On Sunday, Texas Gov. Rick Perry ordered emergency officials to airlift some of the evacuees that had offered to help. Perry said relief centers around the state were running out of room.

"There are shelters set up in other states that are sitting empty while thousands arrive in Texas by the day, if not the hour," Perry said.

For Bush, A Test Of Political Skill (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON - Four years ago, when George W. Bush emerged from the 9/11 attacks with sky-high marks for decisiveness and leadership, he accumulated a reserve of political capital that saw him through reelection.

Now, nearly nine months into his second term, President Bush faces perhaps the most profound test of executive and political skill of his life. One week after hurricane Katrina slammed into the Gulf Coast, wreaking unfathomable devastation, his administration is still scrambling to make up for a delayed initial response that faced broad, bipartisan criticism. Americans are reeling over gasoline prices, and remain skeptical over the course of the Iraq war. Plans for a bold second-term agenda - including Social Security reform and tax reform - sit in doubt.

The death Saturday of Chief Justice William Rehnquist, the second vacancy on the high court in as many months, added one more element of uncertainty to a tumultuous time.

By Monday morning, the mood turned. After a weekend public-relations offensive by top aides who visited the storm-damaged South and fanned out to the Sunday talk shows, Bush seemed to have caught his balance. His nomination of John Roberts to replace the chief justice, rather than retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, struck analysts as a savvy move, creating the possibility that the court will start its term Oct. 3 at full strength. After the court announcement, the president boarded Marine One to begin his second trip in three days to the Gulf Coast.

Still, Bush has his work cut out for him, seeking to reassure Americans that the nation's military might is not stretched too thin and that the failures in response to Katrina - on the local, state, and national levels - do not bode ill for the ability to cope with any future terror attack on US soil. Republicans agree that this is a dangerous moment for the president.

"Anytime you have a situation like this, you're responsible for the government," says David Winston, a Republican pollster. "If it performs, great, and if it doesn't, people are going to want to know why, and rightfully so."

On the ground, the aftermath of Katrina took on a tangible impact across the country, with more than a half-million displaced people settling into relief centers. Nearly 250,000 evacuees went to Texas, leading the governor to order emergency officials to airlift some to other states. In New Orleans, rescue and recovery operations continued their grim task. Over the weekend, Secretary of Health and Human Services, Michael Leavitt predicted that Katrina's death toll would rise into the thousands. Reports of contractors coming under fire as they made their way to help shore up the 17th Street Canal in New Orleans added to the imagery of a war zone.

Monday, small signs of progress emerged as floodwaters began to recede. Residents of suburban New Orleans were allowed to return briefly to their homes and try to retrieve belongings. Out of Austria came news that oil prices were falling after industrialized nations released 60 million barrels of crude from their stockpiles to help stabilize American supplies.

The two former presidents, George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton, who championed the fundraising cause after last year's tsunami, reprised their role, announcing the formation of the Bush-Clinton Katrina Fund Monday. Proceeds will be turned over to the governors of the affected states.

For the current President Bush, the task ahead remains far more complex. Congressional hearings will examine what went wrong before and after Katrina slammed into the Gulf Coast at Category 4 strength. The initial wave of blame and recriminations continues. Over the weekend, the main newspaper in New Orleans, the Times-Picayune, issued an open letter to Bush, calling on him to fire "every official at the Federal Emergency Management Agency ... Director Michael Brown especially."

For Bush, who prides himself on making smart appointments and effectively delegating, the naming of Mr. Brown to head FEMA in 2003 without much apparent background in emergency management is one of many questions he already faces.

But if Bush is looking ahead to how history will remember him, he still has years to recover from the initial bad reviews out Katrina, analysts say.

"Having a lot of time left as president is a good thing for him, because it gives him the opportunities and time to get out of some of these holes," says Norman Ornstein, a political expert at the American Enterprise Institute.

Already, many Americans don't remember Bush's initial halting response to 9/11, from which he recovered after a few days with his iconic moment shouting through a bullhorn atop the rubble at ground zero. Still, recovering politically from Katrina is likely to take more effort. There is no foreign enemy against which to rally. And Bush was already struggling with low approval ratings over the Iraq war and high gas prices. The decision to proceed last week with a speech in California aimed at bolstering support for the Iraq war, even after Katrina had hit the Gulf Coast, is probably one Bush's aides wish they could do over.

"Even if the reality is, there's nothing more that he could have done back in Washington or anywhere else ... the symbol matters," says Mr. Ornstein.

Under Fire, President Attempts To Regain Sense Of Equilibrium (USAT)

By Judy Keen And Richard Benedetto

USA Today, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON — In a flurry of e-mail exchanges late Saturday night when they learned about Chief Justice William Rehnquist's death, President Bush's top advisers debated — after their most difficult week since 9/11 — what calamity might be next.

Their worried conversations continued in meetings at the White House before 8 a.m. on Sunday. They concluded that for Bush's remaining 40 months in office, they should expect almost anything, said a top adviser who works closely with Bush. "We've just kind of realized that if things are going to happen, they're going to happen to this president," he said, refusing to be identified because he was not authorized to describe internal discussions.

Bush and his team spent the holiday weekend responding to the Supreme Court vacancy created by Rehnquist's death, managing the aftermath of Hurricane Kristina and trying to minimize damage from the federal government's slow and much-criticized response to the storm.

After angry complaints last week about delays in mobilizing federal help for hurricane victims, criticism of Bush's light-hearted recollection Friday of his youthful partying in New Orleans and failed efforts to blame local and state officials for problems, the president and his aides tried Monday to regain a sense of equilibrium.

Thirty-three hours after learning of Rehnquist's death, Bush announced the nomination of John Roberts to succeed him. Then he left for his second tour in four days to the disaster zone. During a visit to a shelter for storm evacuees in Baton Rouge, an unsmiling Bush said, "I fully understand there's a lot of work to be done."

Bush counselor Dan Bartlett said Monday that after the situation is under control, Bush will order an inquiry into delays in federal aid. "We want to know what happened and how," Bartlett said.

John Podesta, who as a chief of staff for President Clinton saw his share of crises, said the mood inside a White House reflects the president's ability to stay calm and take charge. "You never know what is going to hit you, but you have to be ready. (A president) has to be tough when he has to be. … He has to make decisions when decisions are needed. The troops … look at what's in his eyes."

Ken Khachigian, a White House aide to Richard Nixon and Ronald Reagan, agreed. "One of the worst enemies in such situations is overreaction and even panic," he said. "Nixon once advised that when circumstances are the hottest is when leaders must be the coolest."

Events over the last week tested Bush and raised questions about how much lasting damage his presidency has sustained and how his agenda and legacy will be affected. When he said Monday in Baton Rouge that "this is one of these disasters that will test our soul and test our spirit," he could have been talking about his administration as well as the storm's victims.

Bush's patience with federal hurricane relief efforts evaporated last week when he learned that thousands had been stuck for days in the New Orleans Convention Center without food or water. By Saturday morning, when he and other officials met in the White House situation room for an update, the president was still steaming. He had seen the disaster in person and watched horrific scenes on TV. There was talk around the table that if this disaster was a dress rehearsal for response to a terrorist attack or other national security crisis, the federal government failed the test.

Bush is turning his attention to the next problems for the affected states. Preparations are being made to deal with public health, provide housing, rebuild cities and find jobs for the displaced. Today, Bush will hold a Cabinet meeting on those issues and meet with Education Secretary Margaret Spellings to come up with a plan to get the region's children, now scattered across the country, back in school.

Bush is painfully aware of the scathing criticism directed at him personally. On Monday, the New Orleans Times-Picayune editorial was an open letter to Bush. “We're angry, Mr. President, and we'll be angry long after our beloved city and surrounding parishes have been pumped dry,” it said. “Our people deserved rescuing. Many who could have been were not. That's to the government's shame.”

He has often been dismissive of criticism in the past, but Bush skipped his usual weekend biking outings and went to a Red Cross operations center in Washington on Sunday. His trip Monday was meant to underscore his concern. He'll visit again. “There will be a sustained hands-on presence from the president on down, across the board of his administration for the foreseeable future,” Bartlett said.

Bush and his advisers were better prepared for Rehnquist's death. Because the chief justice had been ill for months, the statement Bush delivered Sunday morning from the White House had been written in advance. The decision to nominate Roberts for chief justice had long been “in the back of the president's mind,” spokesman Scott McClellan said.

Bush, an early riser who's usually asleep by 10 p.m., was awakened at 10:50 p.m. on Saturday and told of Rehnquist's death. Before he left for the 8 a.m. Sunday service at St. John's Episcopal Church, a block from the White House, he met in the Oval Office with chief of staff Andy Card, counsel Harriet Miers, Bartlett and others to discuss the vacancy. By the time Roberts arrived to discuss the job with Bush at 5:30 p.m. Sunday, the president's mind was pretty much made up. He didn't formally offer the job to Roberts until 7:15 a.m. Monday.

Now Bush must nominate a replacement for retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. There's already a short list of contenders, but the announcement likely won't come until next week at the earliest.

Bush had planned to spend this fall promoting his Social Security plan and talking about changing immigration laws. But the storm and the court vacancies have supplanted that agenda, said James Thurber, director of the American University Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies.

Those issues and the Iraq war will occupy Bush for months to come and shape his place in history, he said. “It will be a real challenge to his leadership. Whether he can recover remains to be seen.”

Bush Has Staunch Defender Amid Critics On Gulf Coast (NYT)

By Michael Cooper

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

JACKSON, Miss., Sept. 5 - The Bush administration has been stung by criticism of its handling of Hurricane Katrina by anguished Louisiana officials and by nervous Republicans from across the country, but it has one stalwart defender right in the heart of the devastated region - Gov. Haley Barbour of Mississippi.

From the earliest moments of the crisis, Mr. Barbour, a former chairman of the Republican National Committee, has praised President Bush and a federal response to the storm that even the president later called "not acceptable." At one point last week, when Mr. Barbour's glowing assessment was challenged by an interviewer on CNN, he asked "if this is an interview or an argument."

Mr. Barbour's praise of the federal efforts has put him at odds with some other Mississippi officials who have bemoaned the slow response in their areas and has put him at risk of sounding like a Pollyanna to Mississippians still struggling in the storm's aftermath. But the strategy is unsurprising for a canny political strategist like Mr. Barbour - a former political director in the Reagan White House, chairman of the Republican Party, and powerful Washington lobbyist - who won the governorship two years ago by in part emphasizing the strength of his close ties to President Bush.

While some officials here have found his statements jarring, others said they could pay off if Mr. Barbour is able to parlay his good relationship with the Bush administration into more federal aid for his state. And they noted that the political dynamic here is very different from what is happening next door in Louisiana, where Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, a Democrat, was outspokenly critical of the federal response to the storm, and soon found her administration openly sniping with the White House over who was to blame for the ensuing disaster and who should lead the recovery.

So while the frostiness between the president and Ms. Blanco cast a shadow over his trip to Louisiana on Monday morning, warmth and good feelings were on display when he met in the afternoon with Mr. Barbour in Poplarville and told a crowd that "we're here for the long term." As they met, the Navy and Marines set up camp in Biloxi.

Mr. Barbour appeared on television programs on Sunday morning, spreading his message that the federal effort was going well in his state. He told "Face the Nation" on CBS that "the federal government has been fabulous in our state" and "Meet the Press" on NBC that "the federal government has been good partners to us."

Some local officials have described a far different response. Mayor Johnny L. DuPree of Hattiesburg, a Democrat, complained over the weekend to The Hattiesburg American that it had taken days for federal help to arrive.

"I started trying to get federal help in here on Monday, and six days after this town has struggled to get enough water and ice for its people, we finally hear from the feds," the newspaper quoted Mr. DuPree as saying.

State Senator Gloria Chisholm Williamson, Democrat of Philadelphia, said she believed that the criticism by Louisiana officials was instrumental in having the federal government step up its response.

"When they started getting criticized," Ms. Williamson said, "all of a sudden we got the troops coming in, which is what we needed to begin with. I'm sorry that Governor Barbour is such a loyalist to his Republican president that he appeared to be putting that before the concerns of the people."

The storm and its aftermath will shape the legacy of Mr. Barbour, who has been mentioned as a possible presidential candidate in 2008. And they will pose a big challenge for the governor, a proponent of small government, as he confronts a catastrophe that will require a big government response, whether in rebuilding areas now in ruins, finding housing and schools for the thousands left homeless or filling the sizable gap in state revenues caused by the devastation of coastal casinos and wide swaths of farmland.

Prof. Marty Wiseman, the director of the John C. Stennis Institute of Government at Mississippi State University, said he would give Mr. Barbour generally high marks for his response so far. But Professor Wiseman said some Mississippians were questioning the governor's upbeat assessment of the federal response.

"That's the one eyebrow-raising factor that I've heard people mention," Professor Wiseman said. "You've got to wonder if Haley's not trying to keep the table set for future cooperation."

Mr. Barbour said his praise of the federal government was not a political calculation. "I get all these questions all the time about, you know, there's not enough water in X or there's not enough ice in Y, and almost always there is something to that," Mr. Barbour said at a news conference here on Monday. "But that's why you've just got to manage this deal and keep trying to wrestle this bear down to the ground, and that's what we're doing.

"The federal government, most all the time, has been first to say, 'We want to get you, we're pushing this toward you.' Have there been times where we didn't get as much as we wanted of this or that? Yes, sir. There have been. But, boy, it's been overwhelming, the millions of M.R.E.'s, ice, water that we've received."

Mr. Barbour added: "We haven't looked at it as, I'm going to be whiny, and I'll get more, or, I'm going to act like Tarzan, and I'll get more. We've been saying, what do you need to do to get the job done?"

Bush's Grip On GOP In Peril? (RC)

By Mark Preston

Roll Call, September 6, 2005

President Bush's command over the Republican Congress is showing signs of weakening as a result of the growing unease over the U.S. mission in Iraq, the lack of a definitive plan to overhaul the nation's Social Security system and rising energy costs.

Complicating matters for Bush is the devastation wrought on the Gulf Coast by Hurricane Katrina, and the subsequent criticism from some local officials of the federal government's alleged failure to respond quickly enough with relief aide.

Just four weeks ago, Bush was riding high after winning a series of legislative victories ranging from passage of the controversial Central American Free Trade Agreement to approval of long-stalled energy and transportation measures. As they left for the August recess, Republicans hoped this momentum would boost their chances of muscling Bush's top domestic issue — restructuring the Social Security system — through the Congress before the year's end.

Now, the White House must work to shore up support among Republican Members even as it tries to advance Bush's goal on Social Security, said Senators, senior aides and GOP strategists, all of whom would speak only on the condition of anonymity.

"This is the perfect storm for the president," said a Senate GOP leadership aide. "We have rising gas prices, patience running thin with the war in Iraq and now Katrina. Coupled with lame-duck status, it is an uphill battle for him."

Evidence of a growing concern among Republicans about Bush's handling of Iraq spilled into public last month when Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) bluntly asserted that the U.S. is "not winning."

"We should start figuring out how we get out of there," Hagel said on the Aug. 21 broadcast of ABC's "This Week." "But with this understanding: We cannot leave a vacuum that further destabilizes the Middle East. I think our involvement there has destabilized the Middle East. And the longer we stay there, I think the further destabilization will occur."

Privately, many other Republicans concede that they are hearing similar concerns from their constituents about Iraq and are likely to start demanding better answers from the White House, GOP sources said.

"People are fundamentally for us succeeding," said a Republican strategist with close ties to the Congressional leadership. "But they are uncertain about what the president's plan is."

Questions about the direction of U.S. policy in Iraq has been exacerbated in recent weeks by the emergence of anti-war activist Cindy Sheehan. Sheehan, whose son was killed in the war, gained international attention by camping outside Bush's Crawford, Texas, ranch during the president's August vacation and demanding a meeting with him.

It is unclear if Sheehan will continue to attract national interest, but she will be the star attraction at what is being billed as a major anti-war protest to be held Sept. 24 in Washington, D.C.

On Capitol Hill, Senate Armed Services Chairman John Warner (R-Va.) will hold an oversight hearing on Iraq within the next few weeks, said his spokesman, John Ullyot. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and various military officials are expected to testify.

"Chairman Warner wants to give Secretary Rumsfeld the opportunity to give his views on Iraq and answer questions from Senators that are relayed through their constituents especially after the August recess," Ullyot said.

Escalating energy costs are also of concern to many Republicans because they are painfully aware it is an issue that affects every segment of the population.

"Bush is hemorrhaging political capital on energy prices," said a House GOP leadership aide. "Energy prices affect everyone. Small businesses get affected. The airlines get affected. It is bad."

The Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee will hold a hearing today to begin reviewing causes that have led to high energy prices. The House Energy and Commerce Committee will hold a similar hearing Wednesday, and several other panels are expected to follow suit. (See related story, page 1.)

Bush's top domestic issue — Social Security — might also be in jeopardy. Several Republicans suggested that the current state of affairs all but dooms any action on dealing with it this year. Congressional Republicans, though, blame the White House for failing to deliver a plan for them to try to sell to their constituents back home.

"There was very little guidance about what to say on Social Security," said a senior Senate Republican aide.

Bush's shaky support from Congressional Republicans comes as Americans' overall perception of his stewardship of the country is slipping. A Washington Post-ABC News poll released last week claimed that Bush's approval rating has sunk to 45 percent, and a majority of people disagree with his approach to Iraq, gasoline prices, the economy and Social Security.

Congressional Republicans suggested the next few weeks would frame how successful the White House is in advancing its legislative goals this year.

"I think the administration is going to have to reach out and work more to build those relationships and give people a reason to be there for them," said a Republican Senator.

Bush And Katrina (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0002630

The White House is slowly recovering from its first-week stumbles responding to Katrina, with President Bush taking his second trip to New Orleans yesterday. His quick elevation of John Roberts to Chief Justice is another welcome sign of energy (see related commentary). But Mr. Bush can't afford to stop there, because the aftermath of Katrina poses a threat to his entire second term.

We aren't referring here to the storm surge of recrimination blaming post-Katrina problems on everything from Iraq, to tax cuts, to his refusal to endorse the Kyoto Protocol. The American public knows this was an epic natural disaster and won't fall for political opportunism. By the same token, Americans also won't have much patience for White House claims that state and local officials were the greater incompetents. Yes, Louisiana needed a Rudy Giuliani. But what Americans want now is proof that their government understands the nature of the challenge and is acting forcefully to meet it.

On this point, Mr. Bush is going to have to recognize the obvious initial failure of the Department of Homeland Security in its first big post-9/11 test. The President created this latest huge federal bureaucracy, against the advice of many of us, and we're still waiting for evidence that it has done anything but reshuffle the Beltway furniture. If FEMA can't now handle the diaspora out of New Orleans to Houston, Baton Rouge and other cities, the political retribution will be fierce.

Notably, the New Orleans mess improved only after the Pentagon got involved. Though the military is normally barred from domestic law enforcement by the Posse Comitatus Act of 1878, Defense officials have been doing a lot of creative thinking about what they can do and what the public now expects post-September 11. The press corps might even want to report on that thinking, which is contained in a June 2005 report, "Strategy for Homeland Defense and Civil Support." If he ever fires anyone, Mr. Bush could do worse than find a few more Donald Rumsfelds as replacements.

Mr. Bush will also need to guide the rebuilding choices for New Orleans and the Mississippi delta. We're hearing a lot these days about the need to restore barrier marshlands, often from the same people who have long hated the Army Corps of Engineers that would help restore them. But clearly there is an issue of how much federal money to pour into a city that is below sea-level and would still be vulnerable to another Category Four or Five storm.

Mr. Bush should name one or more people, in or out of his Administration, to sort through the ideas and avoid what will be the liberal/GOP Congressional impulse to throw money at everything. An alternative would be to name the entire stricken area an enterprise zone for some period of time, which would offer both tax incentives and regulatory waivers to stimulate reinvestment. There's a danger here of tax breaks for floating casinos, but the greater risk is spending $20 billion or more solely on the priorities of local politicians.

Which brings us to Mr. Bush's broader domestic agenda. The President has admirably refused to give up on Social Security, but Katrina makes reform impossible in the near term. The more urgent Presidential priority now is to take steps to keep the U.S. economy growing. Last week's regulatory moves on fuel emissions and the Strategic Petroleum Reserve are already helping on gasoline supplies, and the price shocks are an opportunity to prod Congress to remove obstacles to more oil and natural gas drilling.

Economic leadership also means instructing Americans on the link between tax cutting and the economic vitality needed to fund both Katrina relief and the war on terror. Predictably, the Bush tax cuts are under attack for denying revenue to the government and because they don't require "sacrifice" in wartime. But the truth is that federal revenues are rising by an estimated $262 billion -- or roughly 14% -- this year thanks to the growth that followed the 2003 tax cuts. Republicans have been far too defensive on tax cuts, and Katrina is an opening to explain their necessity and to push for making them permanent.

What's really at stake in the coming months is the Republican claim to be the governing party. That claim has been based in part on the assertion that energetic government doesn't also have to be big government. Mr. Bush's refusal to restrain a free-spending GOP Congress has already undermined the latter, while Katrina is stretching the credibility of the former. Democrats will spend the next year asserting that at least they'll spend tax dollars on levees in New Orleans, rather than Alaskan bridges to nowhere.

As the initial polls are showing, most Americans aren't yet blaming Mr. Bush for Katrina's aftermath. But with war in Iraq and terrorism, rising energy prices and now a natural disaster, these are also anxious times. Voters will forgive a President many mistakes but no leader can survive a public judgment that he is unsure of himself and hostage to events. We've thought for some time that Mr. Bush's reticence was hurting him on Iraq, and that he needs to be both more visible and more assertive in making his case to Americans. After Katrina, we'd say that's imperative.

Tragic Costs Of Bush's Iraq Obsession (FT)

By Michael Lind

Financial Times, September 6, 2005

Samuel Huntington has called it the Lippmann Gap, echoing the American journalist Walter Lippmann in 1943: "Foreign policy consists in bringing into balance, with a comfortable surplus of power in reserve, the nation's commitments and the nation's power." The historian Paul Kennedy has another name for it: "Imperial overextension". Whatever you call this dangerous disease, the symptoms are clear in the US.

In early 2001, shortly after President George W. Bush was inaugurated and before 9/11, the Federal Emergency Management Agency warned of the three most devastating disasters that could strike the US: a terrorist attack on New York City, a hurricane flooding New Orleans and a San Francisco earthquake. The Bush administration was focused on its priority: Iraq.

The first foreseen disaster took place on September 11 2001, when al-Qaeda flew hijacked jets into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. The federal government was taken by surprise. New York City's first responders were hampered by communications problems and poor planning for this long-predicted event. The Bush administration's response to the mass murder committed by al-Qaeda was warped by the focus on Iraq. Many in Washington believe that the administration failed to send sufficient troops to Afghanistan because it was with-holding forces for the invasion of Iraq.

Day after day, the levees of Lake Pontchartrain in New Orleans and the wetlands that protected the city were eroding. Mr Bush and his allies in the Republican-majority Congress have slashed federal spending for flood control in south-east Louisiana by half and funds for work at Lake Pontchartrain by almost two-thirds. From 2003, funds authorised for the Southeast Louisiana Urban Flood Control Project were diverted to pay for the war in Iraq. Earlier this year, the US Army Corps of Engineers requested $27m (€21.6m) to repair the levees to protect them from hurricanes. Mr Bush sought to cut the amount to $3.9m and also proposed reducing spending to prevent flooding from $78m to $30m (the Republican Congress ultimately passed $5.7m and $36.5m, respectively). The New Orleans Times-Picayune published numerous articles warning that the war in Iraq was taking money away from hurricane protection on the Gulf coast.

Meanwhile, in Iraq, the insurgency metastasised. With US forces divided between the necessary war in Afghanistan and the war of choice in Iraq, and army recruitment numbers plunging, the Bush administration, in addition to hiring private contractors, was forced to mobilise National Guard reserves overseas. When Katrina struck, tens of thousands of National Guard soldiers were in Iraq, along with much of the equipment needed for disaster relief.

At the same time, America's long border with Mexico has gone largely unprotected. Around a million illegal immigrants are apprehended each year, in addition to the estimated half a million who join the roughly 10m living in the US. A growing number of illegal immigrants apprehended at the border are from Middle Eastern countries including Egypt, Yemen, Iraq and Syria. President Bush's justice department claims that suspected American terrorist Jose Padilla and an accomplice planned to enter the US through Mexico and blow up buildings in New York and other cities. Mohammed Junaid Babar, an alleged al-Qaeda agent linked with plots against London, has told US investigators of a plan to bring terrorists into the US from Mexico.

On December 17 2004, Mr Bush signed the National Intelligence Reform Act, which required the addition of 10,000 border patrol agents beginning in 2006. In his February 2005 budget, however, Mr Bush authorised funds for only 210 new border agents. Last month, the Democratic governors of Arizona and New Mexico asked for federal disaster relief to help deal with border chaos.

The horror in New Orleans and along the Gulf Coast, and the chaos along the US-Mexican border, join anarchy in Afghanistan and Iraq as proof of the bankruptcy of the Bush doctrine. Mr Bush's neoconservative strategists wanted a crusade for US hegemony in the Middle East and the world; as "national greatness conservatives," some might have been willing to pay for it with higher taxes. But Mr Bush's political base consists of conservatives and libertarians united by a crusade to cut taxes. The attempt to establish American global hegemony without paying for it was a disaster – actually, several disasters – waiting to happen.

If, early in 2001, the Bush administration had focused on al-Qaeda instead of Iraq, it might have responded to FEMA's call to prepare New York for a big terrorist incident. If it had not divided US forces to fight two wars at once, Afghanistan might have been pacified while Saddam remained in power but contained. If Bush had not sacrificed border security to pay for the war in Iraq, the Mexican border might be under control. If Bush had not diverted so many National Guard units to Iraq, disaster relief following Hurricane Katrina would have been swifter and more effective. And if the war in Iraq had not caused the Bush administration to raid money for the New-Orleans levees, this big port city might not be a corpse-filled cesspool.

Supporters of the war in Iraq predicted that the dominos would fall in the Middle East. Instead, the dominos are falling across America.

Magic Marker Strategy (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

It was the climax of George W. Bush's video introduction at the Republican convention: the moment at Yankee Stadium during the 2001 World Series when he threw a pitch all the way to home plate. The video ended, and the conventioneers cheered as Mr. Bush strode onto a stage shaped like a pitcher's mound.

Well, live by the pitch, die by the pitch. When you campaign as the man on the mound, the great leader whose arm rescues Americans in their moment of need, they expect you to deal with a hurricane, too.

Mr. Bush made a lot of mistakes last week, but most of his critics are making an even bigger one now by obsessing about what he said and did. We can learn more by listening to men like Jim Judkins, particularly when he explains the Magic Marker method of disaster preparedness.

Mr. Judkins is one of the officials in charge of evacuating the Hampton Roads region around Newport News, Va. These coastal communities, unlike New Orleans, are not below sea level, but they're much better prepared for a hurricane. Officials have plans to run school buses and borrow other buses to evacuate those without cars, and they keep registries of the people who need special help.

Instead of relying on a "Good Samaritan" policy - the fantasy in New Orleans that everyone would take care of the neighbors - the Virginia rescue workers go door to door. If people resist the plea to leave, Mr. Judkins told The Daily Press in Newport News, rescue workers give them Magic Markers and ask them to write their Social Security numbers on their body parts so they can be identified.

"It's cold, but it's effective," Mr. Judkins explained.

That simple strategy could have persuaded hundreds of people to save their own lives in New Orleans. What the city needed most was coldly effective local leaders, not a president in Washington who could feel their pain. It's the same lesson we should have learned from Sept. 11 and other disasters, yet both liberals and conservatives keep ignoring it.

The liberals bewailing the insensitivity and racism of Republicans in Washington sound like a bad rerun of the 1960's, when urban riots were blamed on everyone but the rioters and the police. Yes, the White House did a terrible job of responding to Katrina, but Democratic leaders in New Orleans and Louisiana didn't even fulfill their basic duties.

In coastal Virginia - which, by the way, has a large black population and plenty of Republican politicians - Mr. Judkins and his colleagues assume that it's their job to evacuate people, maintain order and stockpile supplies to last for 72 hours, until federal help arrives. In New Orleans, the mayor seemed to assume all that was beyond his control, just like the mayors in the 1960's who let the riots occur.

They said their cities couldn't survive without help from Washington, which proceeded to shower inner cities with money and programs that did more damage than the riots. Cities didn't recover until some mayors, especially Republicans like Rudy Giuliani, tried self-reliance.

Mr. Giuliani was called heartless and racist for cutting the welfare rolls and focusing on crime reduction, but black neighborhoods were the greatest beneficiaries of his policies. He was criticized for ignoring social services as he concentrated on reorganizing the Police and Fire Departments, but his cold effectiveness made the city a more livable place and kept it calm after Sept. 11.

Yet Mr. Bush, with approval from conservatives who should have known better, reacted to Sept. 11 by centralizing disaster planning in Washington. He created the byzantine Homeland Security Department, with predictable results last week.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency, often criticized for ineptitude, became even less efficient after it was swallowed by a bureaucracy consumed with terrorism. The department has spent billions on new federal airport screeners - with no discernible public benefit - while giving short shrift to natural disasters.

The federal officials who had been laboring on a one-size-fits-all strategy were unprepared for the peculiarities of New Orleans, like the high percentage of people without cars. The local officials who knew about that problem didn't do anything about it - and then were furious when Mr. Bush didn't solve it for them. Why didn't the man on the mound come through for them?

It's a fair question as they go door to door looking for bodies. But so is this: Why didn't they go door to door last week with Magic Markers?

The Larger Shame (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

The wretchedness coming across our television screens from Louisiana has illuminated the way children sometimes pay with their lives, even in America, for being born to poor families.

It has also underscored the Bush administration's ongoing reluctance or ineptitude in helping the poorest Americans. The scenes in New Orleans reminded me of the suffering I saw after a similar storm killed 130,000 people in Bangladesh in 1991 - except that Bangladesh's government showed more urgency in trying to save its most vulnerable citizens.

But Hurricane Katrina also underscores a much larger problem: the growing number of Americans trapped in a never-ending cyclone of poverty. And while it may be too early to apportion blame definitively for the mishandling of the hurricane, even President Bush's own administration acknowledges that America's poverty is worsening on his watch.

The U.S. Census Bureau reported a few days ago that the poverty rate rose again last year, with 1.1 million more Americans living in poverty in 2004 than a year earlier. After declining sharply under Bill Clinton, the number of poor people has now risen 17 percent under Mr. Bush.

If it's shameful that we have bloated corpses on New Orleans streets, it's even more disgraceful that the infant mortality rate in America's capital is twice as high as in China's capital. That's right - the number of babies who died before their first birthdays amounted to 11.5 per thousand live births in 2002 in Washington, compared with 4.6 in Beijing.

Indeed, according to the United Nations Development Program, an African-American baby in Washington has less chance of surviving its first year than a baby born in urban parts of the state of Kerala in India.

The national infant mortality rate has risen under Mr. Bush for the first time since 1958. The U.S. ranks 43rd in the world in infant mortality, according to the C.I.A.'s World Factbook; if we could reach the level of Singapore, ranked No. 1, we would save 18,900 children's lives each year.

So in some ways the poor children evacuated from New Orleans are the lucky ones because they may now get checkups and vaccinations. But nationally, 29 percent of children had no health insurance at some point in the last 12 months, and many get neither checkups nor vaccinations. The U.S. ranks 84th in the world for measles immunizations and 89th for polio.

One of the most dispiriting elements of the catastrophe in New Orleans was the looting. I covered the 1995 earthquake that leveled much of Kobe, Japan, killing 5,500, and for days I searched there for any sign of criminal behavior. Finally I found a resident who had seen three men steal food. I asked him whether he was embarrassed that Japanese would engage in such thuggery.

"No, you misunderstand," he said firmly. "These looters weren't Japanese. They were foreigners."

The reasons for this are complex and partly cultural, but one reason is that Japan has tried hard to stitch all Japanese together into the nation's social fabric. In contrast, the U.S. - particularly under the Bush administration - has systematically cut people out of the social fabric by redistributing wealth from the most vulnerable Americans to the most affluent.

It's not just that funds may have gone to Iraq rather than to the levees in New Orleans; it's also that money went to tax cuts for the wealthiest rather than vaccinations for children.

None of this is to suggest that there are easy solutions for American poverty. As Ronald Reagan once said, "We fought a war on poverty, and poverty won." But we don't need to be that pessimistic - in the late 1990's, we made real headway. A ray of hope is beautifully presented in one of the best books every written on American poverty, "American Dream," by my Times colleague Jason DeParle.

So the best monument to the catastrophe in New Orleans would be a serious national effort to address the poverty that afflicts the entire country. And in our shock and guilt, that might be politically feasible. Rich Lowry of The National Review, in defending Mr. Bush, offered an excellent suggestion: "a grand right-left bargain that includes greater attention to out-of-wedlock births from the Left in exchange for the Right's support for more urban spending." That would be the best legacy possible for Katrina.

Otherwise, long after the horrors have left TV screens, about 50 of the 77 babies who die each day, on average, will die needlessly, because of poverty. That's the larger hurricane of poverty that shames our land.

It's Your Failure, Too, Mr. Bush (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

BATON ROUGE -- After a tragically incompetent beginning, the effort to give urgent care to the multitudes from New Orleans whose homes and livelihoods have been obliterated is finally in high gear. The problem now is that nobody knows where it's headed.

At the top, things are still hopeless. Federal, local and state officials who perform for the cameras here at the Louisiana State Police complex, headquarters for the relief effort, still spend an unconscionable amount of time debating who's in charge. Is the president the ultimate authority, or is it Blanco, Nagin, Chertoff, Brown or the generals? The answer seems to vary from hour to hour, depending on who's holding court in the hot, stuffy briefing room or outside on the portico, where visiting luminaries get mobbed by microphones.

Fortunately, the finger-pointing follies don't matter much on the ground and in the water. Military, police and civilian relief units did what had to be done and emptied the New Orleans basin of Hurricane Katrina's bereft survivors. They are being fed, sheltered and clothed. They can't be described as alive and well, but they're alive.

Now what?

Hundreds of thousands of evacuees are scattered around Louisiana and neighboring states in a sudden diaspora, and no one seems to have any idea what to do with them next. The evacuees bristle at the word "refugees," which makes them sound as if they don't belong in this country. But whatever you call them, they won't be able to go back home -- and won't have a home to go back to -- for months or even years.

Baton Rouge, perhaps the best example, has swollen like the Mississippi River in an epic flood. The people here have been generous and good-natured to a fault. Down by the river, at the convention center, the Red Cross is housing about 5,000 evacuees; another big shelter is being opened across town, and smaller shelters are being organized every day, many by local churches. It's impossible to count the families who have opened their homes to relatives, friends or needy strangers.

Every city and town in Louisiana that wasn't blasted by the hurricane is full of evacuees. Then there are the tens of thousands in Texas and the multitudes scattered across neighboring states. Their host communities have the best of intentions, but many won't be able to stand the added drain on resources indefinitely. Where will these people go? Why wasn't there a plan?

That's when I start my finger-pointing, because a few days in and around this ground zero have convinced me that there are two things the federal government failed to do, and that for these failures there's ultimately no one to blame but the president.

First, an administration that since Sept. 11, 2001, has told us a major terrorist strike is inevitable should have had in place a well-elaborated plan for evacuating a major American city. Even if there wasn't a specific plan for New Orleans -- although it was clear that a breach of the city's levees was one of the likeliest natural catastrophes -- there should have been a generic plan. George W. Bush told us time and again that our cities were threatened. Shouldn't he have ordered up a plan to get people out?

Second, someone should have thought about what to do with hundreds of thousands of evacuees, both in the days after a disaster and in the long term. As people flooded out of New Orleans, it was officials at the state and local level who rose to the challenge, making it up as they went along. Bring a bunch of people to the Astrodome. We have a vacant hotel that we can use. Send a hundred or so down to our church and we'll do the best we can.

Tent cities aren't a happy option, but neither is haphazard improvisation. Is the problem the Bush administration's ideological fervor for small government? Does the White House really believe that primary responsibility should fall on volunteers, church groups and individuals? Or is it just stunning incompetence and lack of foresight?

At the big shelter here in Baton Rouge on Sunday, some student volunteers from Louisiana State University took a group of children outside to get some air. The kids were using sheets of cardboard as sleds and surfboards, zooming down the grassy levee next to the Mississippi River and then scampering back uphill for another ride. It was a beautiful, sunny day, and the scene warmed your heart. But those college students are going to have to go back to their classes, and then how will those kids from New Orleans spend their days?

Katrina Rekindles Adversarial Media (USAT)

By Peter Johnson

USA Today, September 6, 2005

Reporters covering Hurricane Katrina on the scene showed their human — and often angry and frustrated — face as they questioned the slow response over the weekend.

"The government said, 'You go here, and you'll get help,' or 'You go in that Superdome and you'll get help,' " Fox News anchor Shepard Smith fumed on-air from New Orleans Friday, in a tone echoed by other correspondents. "And they didn't get help. They got locked in there. And they watched people being killed around them. And they watched people starving. And they watched elderly people not get any medicine."

Says Fordham University communications professor Paul Levinson, "The media rose to the occasion, shone their light on the desolation and the needy, and kept it focused there until the cavalry finally began to arrive."

The story also proved how, even in this emerging new-media age in which bloggers sometimes seem to rule, television news still does it best when it comes to conveying the scope and the depth of emotion in a quickly evolving tragedy.

Whether TV news will continue to lead with this story is open to debate, as attention inevitably turns to John Roberts' confirmation hearings for the Supreme Court, as well as whomever President Bush names to a second vacancy on the court. That story placed a close second Monday.

But some observers say that Katrina's media legacy may be a return to a post-Watergate-like era of tougher scrutiny of the federal government and public policy issues.

"If any good comes from the catastrophe, it will be that it signaled the beginning of the media's reassertion of aggressive, in-your-face reporting, in which it confronts government wrongdoing, rather than just swallowing the government's public-relations handouts," Levinson says.

But Boston University journalism professor Bob Zelnick says the media have never gotten soft on the government, despite continuing questions over the media's own credibility. "I do not believe the press is guilty of the charge that it abandoned its healthy skepticism in Iraq, and I would hate to see it draw the inference from New Orleans that 'in your face' journalism is the panacea for restoring our lost credibility."

In Katrina, CNN "learned from Jon Stewart how to use simple juxtaposition to make a point," says New York University journalism professor Jay Rosen. "Clip of a federal official explaining how no one anticipated the strength of the storm. Clip from the Weather Channel proving plenty of people did."

"Journalists seem to be much more effective than the administration in representing the public's reactions to the disaster," Rosen says. "Clueless federal officials seem to know less about what is happening than the journalists do, and sometimes less than an average TV viewer. This tips the balance of power toward the press, which is why we see such aggressive questioning and on-air criticism close to jeering."

Says NBC Meet The Press host Tim Russert, who grilled Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff Sunday over the federal response to the hurricane, "The primary responsibility of the media is accountability of government, whether it's about lying under oath, which upset Democrats, or the mismanagement of responding to a hurricane, which happens to upset Republicans."

ABC News correspondent Bob Woodruff, who has been in New Orleans for the past week, recalls witnessing the slow pace of the relief effort of January's Asian tsunami, which killed thousands of people.

He never expected to see such a phenomenon again, until he saw a body lying at the corner of Magazine and Jackson in New Orleans — five days after Katrina hit.

"It came as a huge shock to reporters — not just as reporters but as Americans — to see this happening in a great city like New Orleans," he says.

Katrina May Unleash A Media Storm (USAT)

By Peter Johnson

USA Today, September 6, 2005

The media shelf life for natural disasters is notoriously short: Within two weeks of Hurricane Andrew in 1992, which cut a $30 billion destructive path through south Florida and the Louisiana coast, the story virtually disappeared from network newscasts.

But experts and journalists predict that mounting questions about U.S. government preparation, policies and response to Hurricane Katrina will result in intense news coverage for months.

Katrina "doesn't just have legs, it has tentacles," says Bob Lichter of the Center for Media and Public Affairs. "Its implications reach into hot-button controversies involving race, poverty, economics and partisan politics. The reach of this story will make the O.J. Simpson case look like a news brief."

Network news analyst Andrew Tyndall predicts that TV news will focus on personal stories and massive aid efforts in the coming weeks, and then turn to looking at how relief efforts may have resulted in people dying. Stories on inner cities don't get much network attention "unless carnage is involved, and this is what you have" in New Orleans.

In The New Yorker magazine this week, Nicholas Lemann writes, "We're all wondering what will become of New Orleans. A big American city has never before been entirely emptied of people, and had most of its housing rendered useless, and had all its basic systems fail at once."

The New York Times opened a bureau in Baton Rouge; other news outlets plan to be in the region indefinitely.

"It all gets more interesting by the minute. There are a quarter of a million people in Texas who weren't there five days ago," CBS Early Show anchor Harry Smith said as he arrived back in New Orleans Monday for continuing coverage. NBC's Today dispatched Katie Couric, while ABC's Good Morning America sent Diane Sawyer and Robin Roberts.

NBC Nightly News anchor Brian Williams returns to New Orleans tonight. ABC's World News Tonight has Bob Woodruff and Elizabeth Vargas in the region, with Charles Gibson in New York. CBS' John Roberts co-anchors from New Orleans with Bob Schieffer in New York.

Preliminary evening news ratings showed big increases in viewership, which is normally depressed at this time of year. Tyndall says some 29 million viewers tuned in to the Big 3 last week, up from about 21 million the week before.

Cable news viewing also skyrocketed. Fox News drew an average 4.8 million viewers in prime time, up 142% over July, compared with 3.9 million for CNN (up 466%) and 1.6 million for MSNBC (up 470%).

OUR OPINIONS: An Open Letter To The PresidentDear Mr. President: (NOTP)

The New Orleans Times Picayune, September 6, 2005

We heard you loud and clear Friday when you visited our devastated city and the Gulf Coast and said, "What is not working, we're going to make it right."

Please forgive us if we wait to see proof of your promise before believing you. But we have good reason for our skepticism.

Bienville built New Orleans where he built it for one main reason: It's accessible. The city between the Mississippi River and Lake Pontchartrain was easy to reach in 1718.

How much easier it is to access in 2005 now that there are interstates and bridges, airports and helipads, cruise ships, barges, buses and diesel-powered trucks.

Despite the city's multiple points of entry, our nation's bureaucrats spent days after last week's hurricane wringing their hands, lamenting the fact that they could neither rescue the city's stranded victims nor bring them food, water and medical supplies.

Meanwhile there were journalists, including some who work for The Times-Picayune, going in and out of the city via the Crescent City Connection. On Thursday morning, that crew saw a caravan of 13 Wal-Mart tractor trailers headed into town to bring food, water and supplies to a dying city.

Television reporters were doing live reports from downtown New Orleans streets. Harry Connick Jr. brought in some aid Thursday, and his efforts were the focus of a "Today" show story Friday morning.

Yet, the people trained to protect our nation, the people whose job it is to quickly bring in aid were absent. Those who should have been deploying troops were singing a sad song about how our city was impossible to reach.

We're angry, Mr. President, and we'll be angry long after our beloved city and surrounding parishes have been pumped dry. Our people deserved rescuing. Many who could have been were not. That's to the government's shame.

Mayor Ray Nagin did the right thing Sunday when he allowed those with no other alternative to seek shelter from the storm inside the Louisiana Superdome. We still don't know what the death toll is, but one thing is certain: Had the Superdome not been opened, the city's death toll would have been higher. The toll may even have been exponentially higher.

It was clear to us by late morning Monday that many people inside the Superdome would not be returning home. It should have been clear to our government, Mr. President. So why weren't they evacuated out of the city immediately? We learned seven years ago, when Hurricane Georges threatened, that the Dome isn't suitable as a long-term shelter. So what did state and national officials think would happen to tens of thousands of people trapped inside with no air conditioning, overflowing toilets and dwindling amounts of food, water and other essentials?

State Rep. Karen Carter was right Friday when she said the city didn't have but two urgent needs: "Buses! And gas!" Every official at the Federal Emergency Management Agency should be fired, Director Michael Brown especially.

In a nationally televised interview Thursday night, he said his agency hadn't known until that day that thousands of storm victims were stranded at the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center. He gave another nationally televised interview the next morning and said, "We've provided food to the people at the Convention Center so that they've gotten at least one, if not two meals, every single day."

Lies don't get more bald-faced than that, Mr. President.

Yet, when you met with Mr. Brown Friday morning, you told him, "You're doing a heck of a job."

That's unbelievable.

There were thousands of people at the Convention Center because the riverfront is high ground. The fact that so many people had reached there on foot is proof that rescue vehicles could have gotten there, too.

We, who are from New Orleans, are no less American than those who live on the Great Plains or along the Atlantic Seaboard. We're no less important than those from the Pacific Northwest or Appalachia. Our people deserved to be rescued.

No expense should have been spared. No excuses should have been voiced. Especially not one as preposterous as the claim that New Orleans couldn't be reached.

Mr. President, we sincerely hope you fulfill your promise to make our beloved communities work right once again.

When you do, we will be the first to applaud.

FEMA Director Singled Out By Response Critics (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu And Susan B. Glasser

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

Michael D. Brown has been called the accidental director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, caricatured as the failed head of an Arabian horse sporting group who was plucked from obscurity to become President Bush's point man for the worst natural disaster in U.S. history.

Amid the swirl of human misery along the Gulf Coast, Brown admitted initially underestimating the impact of Hurricane Katrina, whose winds and water swamped the agency's preparations. As the nation reeled at images of the calamity, he appeared to blame storm victims by noting that the crisis was worsened by New Orleans residents who did not comply with a mandatory evacuation order.

By last weekend, facing mounting calls for his resignation, he told reporters: "People want to lash out at me, lash out at FEMA. I think that's fine. Just lash out, because my job is to continue to save lives." More broadly, the 50-year-old Oklahoma lawyer and the agency he leads have become the focus of a broad reappraisal of U.S. homeland security efforts four years after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

In recent days, politicians and officials in both parties have derided Brown's qualifications to head the nation's chief disaster-response agency -- as well as the performance of the agency and its federal, state and local partners.

At a time when homeland security experts called for greater domestic focus on preparing for calamity, Brown faced years of funding cuts, personnel departures and FEMA's downgrading from an independent, Cabinet-level agency.

As recently as three weeks ago, state emergency managers urged Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and his deputy, Michael P. Jackson, to ease the department's focus on terrorism, warning that the shift away from traditional disaster management left FEMA a bureaucratic backwater less able to respond to natural events such as hurricanes and earthquakes.

The Times-Picayune, Louisiana's largest newspaper, published an open letter on Sunday to President Bush, calling for every FEMA official to be fired, "Director Michael Brown especially," joining critics in the state and Congress.

"We're angry, Mr. President, and we'll be angry long after our beloved city and surrounding parishes have been pumped dry," the editorial said. "Our people deserved rescuing. Many who could have been were not. That's to the government's shame. . . . No expense should have been spared. No excuses should have been voiced."

Brown's defenders say he is the scapegoat of a cataclysmic storm and failure of New Orleans's levee system that, in the words of President Bush and Chertoff, could not be foreseen.

"Brownie, you're doing a heck of a job," Bush said Friday during a tour of the state, a day before Chertoff voiced his confidence.

"It's easy to play the blame game, find a scapegoat, but no one person could be responsible for the challenges we face and the lives lost," said W. Craig Fugate, emergency management director for Florida, where Bush's brother is governor, who worked with FEMA through four hurricanes in 2004. He said state and local authorities share responsibility for the death toll likely to emerge in coming days.

Joe M. Allbaugh -- a college friend, former Bush campaign manager and past FEMA director who hired Brown as FEMA general counsel in 2001 -- offered a qualified defense.

Allbaugh called the government's overall performance "unacceptable" but added: "Blaming one agency, you cannot do that." Still, he acknowledged that FEMA had lost independence and clout with the White House. "I had a unique relationship with the president, having been his chief of staff," Allbaugh said. "If you don't have that kind of relationship, it just makes things tougher."

If anything, Brown's political background has become a liability, leading to charges that he was given his job as patronage. He got his start in politics as an Oklahoma native with Albaugh but ran unsuccessfully for Congress in 1988, winning 27 percent of the vote. He has chaired the Oklahoma Municipal Power Authority and served as a City Council member, examiner for the Oklahoma and Colorado supreme courts, and assistant city manager.

Albaugh hired Brown after an acrimonious end to a nine-year stint as commissioner of the International Arabian Horse Association. Former officials say he was forced out; a friend and lawyer of Brown's said he negotiated a settlement after withstanding numerous lawsuits against his enforcement of rules for judges and stewards.

Defending his qualifications, Brown said he has overseen responses to 164 presidential declared emergencies and disasters as FEMA counsel and general counsel, including the 2003 Columbia shuttle disaster and the California wildfires in 2003. "I have been through a few disasters," he said at a news conference yesterday.

Reviews of the government's response to Katrina are beginning. Already, members of Congress such as Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.) and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) are pushing to move FEMA out of its department and back to Cabinet-level status. Senate Homeland Security Committee Chairman Susan Collins (R-Maine) and ranking Democrat Joseph I. Lieberman (Conn.) have launched an investigation, and committee members will meet with department officials tomorrow.

While Chertoff said the levee breach that flooded New Orleans "exceeded the foresight of planners," Max Mayfield, director of the National Hurricane Center, said Brown and other top federal officials were briefed as much as 32 hours in advance of landfall that Hurricane Katrina's storm surge was likely to overtop levees and cause catastrophic flooding.

"They knew that this one was different," Mayfield said yesterday. "I don't think Mike Brown or anyone else in FEMA could have any reason to have any problem with our calls. . . . They were told. . . . We said the levees could be topped."

Louisiana officials have blamed FEMA and Brown for bureaucratic bottlenecks, accusing FEMA of ignoring pre-storm offers of aid from Chicago Mayor Richard M. Daley (D), New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson (D) and the American Ambulance Association.

In his last extended TV interview on CNN,Brown admitted Thursday that the federal government did not know that thousands of survivors without food or water had taken shelter at the city's convention center, despite a day of news reports.

Since then, Brown has been eclipsed by his boss, Chertoff -- who flew overnight Sunday to take charge of integrating military with civilian efforts -- and by a new deputy, U.S. Coast Guard Vice Admiral Thad Allen, whom Chertoff named yesterday to take charge of federal recovery efforts in New Orleans.

Bruce P. Baughman, Alabama emergency management director, head of the National Emergency Management Association and the official in charge of FEMA's response to the World Trade Center and Pentagon attacks in 2001, said Katrina will leave its mark on federal disaster management. "It's time to realize, whoever is in charge of FEMA does need an emergency management background. . . . It's something you learn by experience, and a lot of that experience is gone," he said.

Congress Rolls Up Sleeves ... (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, September 6, 2005

Lawmakers are pledging an across-the-board response to help Hurricane Katrina victims recover and to fix problems the storm and its aftermath exposed.

Efforts are likely to include the removal of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) from the Department of Homeland Security to speed recovery efforts and expansion of energy production to areas outside the Gulf of Mexico to ease future price shocks, congressional and outside experts said.

Congressional leaders approved a $10.5 billion aid package last week as relief workers struggled to evacuate hurricane victims in New Orleans and other areas along the Gulf Coast. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said yesterday that the appropriation is the start of an expansive congressional effort to deal with the crisis.

The Senate Homeland Security and Government Affairs Committee is to hold oversight hearings into the aftermath of the hurricane, Frist said. Lessons learned from those hearings will be incorporated into legislation.

In addition, Congress will push an economic stimulus package to include tax breaks to ease the impact of hurricane on the economy.

Even before Frist's press conference yesterday, lawmakers pledged a broad response as images of hurricane victims in New Orleans suffering in increasingly squalid conditions at the Superdome and Convention Center played out nightly on television.

Other lawmakers have said they back bills to shore up an insurance industry that may face a record number of claims and to increase funding for federal flood projects.

House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) said last week that relief for victims of Hurricane Katrina would be Congress's top priority this fall.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and other Democrats asked that a bipartisan task force be created to speed relief efforts.

"Disasters are revelatory events," said professor Vincent Gawronski of Birmingham Southern College in Alabama, who has studied how governments respond to natural disasters. "Every disaster is an opportunity to reduce vulnerabilities."

"This is going to be a major, major deal," said Bob Livingston, former House Appropriations Committee chairman, of the hurricane's effect.

For Livingston, a Louisiana Republican, the flood had a personal impact. He said a few of his friends were missing as of last week, and his firm's office in New Orleans was flooded.

Congressional experts expect Katrina to set records for relief costs, but money is likely to be only part of the legislative response.

Staff of the Senate Finance and House Ways and Means committees huddled last week to brainstorm over whether any tax assistance would be needed to help people recover from the storm, although a tax package passed after Sept. 11 eliminated taxes on certain disaster payments.

A Senate Armed Services Committee source said members would continue to examine the necessity of a law passed in the wake of the Civil War that may make it more difficult for federal troops to respond to a crisis.

A number of lawmakers also plan to push reforms of the insurance industry to help it pay what may be a record number of claims.

"This is a lot different than anything we've dealt with because it is so widespread," said a Senate Republican committee staff aide who asked not to be identified because he had not been authorized to talk to the press.

Rep. Mark Foley (R), whose home state of Florida suffered through four hurricanes last year, said the scenes of stranded hurricane victims begging for help has persuaded him to introduce a bill to move FEMA, the principal federal entity responsible for relief efforts, back outside of the Department of Homeland Security.

"Whatever planning they anticipated fell woefully short," Foley said.

He said the decision to place FEMA in the department, made in response to another disaster, the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, hampered the agency's ability to respond quickly.

Other lawmakers promised to concentrate on the economic consequences of Katrina.

A particular focus is likely to fall on energy prices, which quickly rose as a number of refineries and oil platforms around the gulf shut down.

Rep. Joe Barton (R-Texas) said Katrina "may finally bring home to the American people how fragile our energy sector is and our energy infrastructure is."

The Gulf Coast is responsible for one-third of the oil and one-fifth of the natural gas that is produced in the country.

Barton's Energy and Commerce Committee and the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee both have planned hearings this week on gasoline prices.

In addition, energy lobbyists are working to attach pro-drilling measure to the budget-reconciliation bill, which already was expected to include a provision to open up the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to drilling.

The effort would give states the chance to open their coasts to oil and gas drilling, something that a federal drilling ban now prevents. Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee Chairman Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) said that, in light of Katrina, the issue should be reexamined.

Even with higher prices, however, getting Congress to agree to more drilling is expected to be an uphill fight, energy lobbyists acknowledge, with strong opposition from the Florida and California delegations.

Democrats, meanwhile, are likely to press for measures that focus on energy conservation measures, including higher fuel-efficiency standards for automobiles, which haven't been increased for more than a decade.

Another focus of congressional attention will fall on the Corps of Engineers, the federal agency principally responsible for flood prevention.

A Senate appropriations staff member said the committee would take another look at the Corps budget.

Advocates said the Corps budget for years has unfairly been a target of budget hawks, who criticized it as a magnet for special projects that don't have much benefit.

"There is a traditional misunderstanding that what is in the Corps budget is pork," said Worth Hager, president of the National Waterways Alliance, a group of industries that rely on America's water system for transportation of goods.

Advertisement Blame Amid The Tragedy (WSJ)

By Bob Williams

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

As the devastation of Hurricane Katrina continues to shock and sadden the nation, the question on many lips is, Who is to blame for the inadequate response?

As a former state legislator who represented the legislative district most impacted by the eruption of Mount St. Helens in 1980, I can fully understand and empathize with the people and public officials over the loss of life and property.

Many in the media are turning their eyes toward the federal government, rather than considering the culpability of city and state officials. I am fully aware of the challenges of having a quick and responsive emergency response to a major disaster. And there is definitely a time for accountability; but what isn't fair is to dump on the federal officials and avoid those most responsible -- local and state officials who failed to do their job as the first responders. The plain fact is, lives were needlessly lost in New Orleans due to the failure of Louisiana's governor, Kathleen Blanco, and the city's mayor, Ray Nagin.

The primary responsibility for dealing with emergencies does not belong to the federal government. It belongs to local and state officials who are charged by law with the management of the crucial first response to disasters. First response should be carried out by local and state emergency personnel under the supervision of the state governor and his/her emergency operations center.

The actions and inactions of Gov. Blanco and Mayor Nagin are a national disgrace due to their failure to implement the previously established evacuation plans of the state and city. Gov. Blanco and Mayor Nagin cannot claim that they were surprised by the extent of the damage and the need to evacuate so many people. Detailed written plans were already in place to evacuate more than a million people. The plans projected that 300,000 people would need transportation in the event of a hurricane like Katrina. If the plans had been implemented, thousands of lives would likely have been saved.

In addition to the plans, local, state and federal officials held a simulated hurricane drill 13 months ago, in which widespread flooding supposedly trapped 300,000 people inside New Orleans. The exercise simulated the evacuation of more than a million residents. The problems identified in the simulation apparently were not solved.

A year ago, as Hurricane Ivan approached, New Orleans ordered an evacuation but did not use city or school buses to help people evacuate. As a result many of the poorest citizens were unable to evacuate. Fortunately, the hurricane changed course and did not hit New Orleans, but both Gov. Blanco and Mayor Nagin acknowledged the need for a better evacuation plan. Again, they did not take corrective actions. In 1998, during a threat by Hurricane George, 14,000 people were sent to the Superdome and theft and vandalism were rampant due to inadequate security. Again, these problems were not corrected.

The New Orleans contingency plan is still, as of this writing, on the city's Web site, and states: "The safe evacuation of threatened populations is one of the principle [sic] reasons for developing a Comprehensive Emergency Management Plan." But the plan was apparently ignored.

Mayor Nagin was responsible for giving the order for mandatory evacuation and supervising the actual evacuation: His office of Emergency Preparedness (not the federal government) must coordinate with the state on elements of evacuation and assist in directing the transportation of evacuees to staging areas. Mayor Nagin had to be encouraged by the governor to contact the National Hurricane Center before he finally, belatedly, issued the order for mandatory evacuation. And sadly, it apparently took a personal call from the president to urge the governor to order the mandatory evacuation.

The city's evacuation plan states: "The city of New Orleans will utilize all available resources to quickly and safely evacuate threatened areas." But even though the city has enough school and transit buses to evacuate 12,000 citizens per fleet run, the mayor did not use them. To compound the problem, the buses were not moved to high ground and were flooded. The plan also states that "special arrangements will be made to evacuate persons unable to transport themselves or who require specific lifesaving assistance. Additional personnel will be recruited to assist in evacuation procedures as needed." This was not done.

The evacuation plan warned that "if an evacuation order is issued without the mechanisms needed to disseminate the information to the affected persons, then we face the possibility of having large numbers of people either stranded and left to the mercy of a storm, or left in an area impacted by toxic materials." That is precisely what happened because of the mayor's failure.

Instead of evacuating the people, the mayor ordered the refugees to the Superdome and Convention Center without adequate security and no provisions for food, water and sanitary conditions. As a result people died, and there was even rape committed, in these facilities. Mayor Nagin failed in his responsibility to provide public safety and to manage the orderly evacuation of the citizens of New Orleans. Now he wants to blame Gov. Blanco and the Federal Emergency Management Agency. In an emergency the first requirement is for the city's emergency center to be linked to the state emergency operations center. This was not done.

The federal government does not have the authority to intervene in a state emergency without the request of a governor. President Bush declared an emergency prior to Katrina hitting New Orleans, so the only action needed for federal assistance was for Gov. Blanco to request the specific type of assistance she needed. She failed to send a timely request for specific aid.

In addition, unlike the governors of New York, Oklahoma and California in past disasters, Gov. Blanco failed to take charge of the situation and ensure that the state emergency operation facility was in constant contact with Mayor Nagin and FEMA. It is likely that thousands of people died because of the failure of Gov. Blanco to implement the state plan, which mentions the possible need to evacuate up to one million people. The plan clearly gives the governor the authority for declaring an emergency, sending in state resources to the disaster area and requesting necessary federal assistance.

State legislators and governors nationwide need to update their contingency plans and the operation procedures for state emergency centers. Hurricane Katrina had been forecast for days, but that will not always be the case with a disaster (think of terrorist attacks). It must be made clear that the governor and locally elected officials are in charge of the "first response."

I am not attempting to excuse some of the delays in FEMA's response. Congress and the president need to take corrective action there, also. However, if citizens expect FEMA to be a first responder to terrorist attacks or other local emergencies (earthquakes, forest fires, volcanoes), they will be disappointed. The federal government's role is to offer aid upon request.

The Louisiana Legislature should conduct an immediate investigation into the failures of state and local officials to implement the written emergency plans. The tragedy is not over, and real leadership in the state and local government are essential in the months to come. More importantly, the hurricane season is still upon us, and local and state officials must stay focused on the jobs for which they were elected -- and not on the deadly game of passing the emergency buck.

Livingston: I Pressed La. Gov. For Martial Law (HILL)

By Jeff Dufour

The Hill, September 6, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0002643

Like thousands of other Washingtonians worried about family and friends in New Orleans after Katrina struck the Crescent City, former Rep. Bob Livingston (R-La.) and his wife, Bonnie, had some uneasy moments last week.

Livingston, the former Appropriations Committee chairman turned successful lobbyist, said his 83-year-old mother escaped to Shreveport with his sister and brother-in-law. His wife's mother, also 83, fled the city just in time.

Livingston had to wait for word of the fate of his oldest son's in-laws. On Friday, he received word that they were safe.

Livingston represented the New Orleans metro area for more than 20 years. He owns a condominium and two rental properties there and feared they were damaged or destroyed.

He was particularly critical of Gov. Kathleen Blanco (D) for failing to declare martial law promptly to deter widespread looting.

"I raised hell with the governor for not declaring martial law," he said Thursday. "I told her last [Wednesday] night I was going on 'Hannity & Colmes' and criticize her for not doing that, and 20 minutes later, she did."

Big is beautiful, preaches lobbyist Berman

Fresh on the heels of the controversial Dove ad campaign featuring overweight women, supersized superlobbyist Michael Berman is telling men it's not a sin to be overweight.

Berman, the larger-than-life president of the Duberstein Group consulting firm, is preparing to hit the book-promotion trail this fall to tout his forthcoming memoir, Living Large: A Big Man's Ideas on Weight, Success and Acceptance.

Berman's publisher, Rodale, calls his book, written with the help of ghostwriter and novelist Laurence Shames, "a poignant, funny and, above all, honest look at obesity from the inside out … as a fat man learns acceptance, loses the guilt and gains the wisdom to manage his weight."

Berman, 66, a former top aide to Vice President Walter Mondale and the scheduler for six Democratic national conventions, is "a self-proclaimed 'fat man' who is also a happy man — successful in his career, marriage and friendships," according to Rodale's publicists.

The book is scheduled for publication next spring, said Berman, whose current weight is 230 pounds, well below his top adult weight of 323 pounds and slightly above his slimmest weight of 215. He's due to have knee-replacement surgery soon.

"My goal is to keep it between 230 and 235 for the next few years," Berman said last week. "That's my optimum working weight."

Living Large isn't Berman's first publishing venture. He writes a monthly newsletter, "Washington Political Watch," mailed to about 750 people.

After taking up photography about 10 years ago as a form of relaxation, Berman also put together a collection of 100 photographs of animals he took at zoos around the world to give as gifts for friends with small children.

As for parents, Berman said, "None of them can name every one of the animals, and I refuse to help them."

Sanders stars in Rolling Stone exposé on legislating

One wouldn't expect to open a magazine featuring "it" band Coldplay on the cover, only to find a feature about decidedly unsexy Rep. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) and the legislative process.

The Aug. 25 issue of Rolling Stone features a multithousand-word piece by writer Matt Taibbi, earned by following Sanders through the halls of Congress on and off for a month during the flurry of late-summer legislative activity. Together, they turn over some of the ugly stones of lawmaking.

Originally set up through Sanders's ex-press secretary, Joel Barkin, Taibbi arranged for Sanders to be his "tour guide" for a month — "an adult version of 'Schoolhouse Rock.'"

Perhaps goaded by famously liberal Rolling Stone editor Jann Wenner, Taibbi wields a ninja-like assortment of harsh rhetorical weapons against the most powerful Republicans, singling out for special scorn such GOPers as Reps. Jim Sensenbrenner of Wisconsin ("your basic Fat Evil Prick"), David Dreier of California ("a pencil-necked Christian Scientist") and Mike Oxley ("leather-skinned, rotting-from-within type").

Democratic Reps. Jim McGovern (Mass.) and Sherrod Brown (Ohio) come off like heroes, along with Sanders and his entire staff, which posed with the congressman for the piece's lead photo.

As for the fact that the congressman is the only person smiling, while his staff surrounds him in varying states of frowning, Erin Campbell, his current press secretary, said, "I don't know how that happened."

Members blog their cancer experiences

Reps. Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio), Chris Cannon (R-Utah) and Sue Myrick (R-N.C.) are among several

notable Americans to begin writing blogs on cancer for the Yahoo Health website.

Cannon and Pryce both lost daughters to cancer, while Myrick won a bout with breast cancer in 1999.

Myrick's online journal entries are among the most personal, as she not so fondly remembers the days surrounding her diagnosis. "I have a very public job, so was concerned about what to tell the media about my surgery," she writes. "My husband and I discussed it and decided that I had a 'bully pulpit" and should go public if it would help others."

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) is also blogging, about the need for preventive medicine and insurance.

Visitors to each Web log are invited to post comments, most of which have been civil.

The lawmakers will continue posting until the end of September. The blogs are available at blogs.health.yahoo.com/ blog-for-hope.

National Press Club owls give last hoot for nude portrait

"Phryne," a painting depicting a semi-nude, reclining Greek courtesan, hung in the members' lounge from 1932 to 1982. The work, by Brazilian artist Antonio Parreiras, was initially taken down as part of a club-wide restoration. The club's Silver Owls — 25-plus-year members — raised $8,200 to have it restored and rehung.

But, said Don Larrabee, chairman of the Silver Owls' Fine Arts Committee, the club's board "voted it down, under pressure from a small group of people who objected to having it rehung." He said the charge was led by female members in the 1980s who thought such a painting was inappropriate in that era. Women were first permitted to join the club in 1971. "Phryne" (pronounced "free-nee") has been on loan to the Metropolitan Club of Washington since 1999.

Of the auction, Larrabee said, "The time has come. We knew we were never going to get it back again. The board is not at all interested in having it back."

He said the painting was last appraised for $75,000, but at the auction, to be held Nov. 5-6 at the Sloans and Kenyon Gallery in Bethesda, "we won't even think about anything less than $100,000." Proceeds will go toward a new club archive.

Farewell to a friend and mentor

Today's is the first "Under the Dome" byline that this writer has not shared with Albert Eisele, who hung up his daily journalism duties after 40 years in the trenches of Washington.

Throughout those years, his affable, generous nature has earned him many sources but far more friends — as attested by the number of well wishes and encomiums he's received of late.

The journalists whom Al has mentored are too numerous to catalog. Nonetheless, I'm proud to count myself in their number.

Good luck Al, and congratulations on a great career.

Delays In Relief Spark Worries Of Holes In Homeland Security (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

The federal government's slow response to Hurricane Katrina's devastation of the Gulf Coast is stoking fears that the U.S. is no better prepared to deal with a large-scale terrorist attack than it was four years ago.

The Bush administration has spent billions of dollars developing government agencies and technologies to better predict and respond to disasters since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. But security experts said the delays in helping Katrina's victims in New Orleans and elsewhere along the Gulf Coast indicate the relief process has become more cumbersome, opening opportunities for terrorists.

Business consultants and security experts are advising clients to tighten safety measures since al Qaeda or other terrorist networks might find it advantageous to strike when tens of thousands of federal troops and other homeland-security resources are deployed to Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama. Some figure that terrorists might try an attack tied to the fourth anniversary of the Sept. 11 strikes.

"You'd be remiss not to be particularly prepared at a time like this," said Jonathan Lusher, senior vice president of Illinois-based IPC International Corp., which runs security operations for some of the U.S.'s largest mall complexes, including the New Orleans Center in Louisiana. "Terrorists probably think we're unprepared, and [the response to Katrina] would only confirm this."

Mr. Lusher said his firm is ratcheting up security at the malls, offices and retail outlets where IPC works. He said Washington needs to spend even more money on emergency-relief preparedness as Katrina has exposed serious limitations in the federal government's ability to respond to cataclysmic events. "It's not too far-fetched to see a bigger problem, a dirty bomb or water poisoning" carried out by terrorists, Mr. Lusher said.

Katrina's blow comes as many counterterrorism experts say they are seeing signs of more activity by al Qaeda and other militant Islamist groups. Recent bombings in the United Kingdom and Egypt illustrate that even traditionally well-secured countries can be successfully targeted by suicide bombers, they say. There also is rising concern that the war in Iraq is helping to indoctrinate and train thousands of new militants eager to hurt the U.S. and its allies.

Terrorism experts said they believe al Qaeda's senior command, based in the border areas of Pakistan and Afghanistan, remains active, despite extensive U.S. military operations. While U.S. intelligence officials say it is uncertain whether leader Osama bin Laden himself is coordinating attacks, they say substantial evidence indicates he and his lieutenants are at least communicating with operatives in the field. Last week al Qaeda's second-in-command, Egyptian doctor Ayman al Zawahiri, released a tape urging Muslims world-wide to step up attacks against the European and Middle Eastern allies of the U.S. in an effort to drive coalition forces out of Iraq.

"The terrorist threat has grown, not receded" because of the war in Iraq, said Larry Johnson, a security consultant and former deputy director of the State Department's counterterrorism office. "And if an attack comes now, the capacity of U.S. government to respond will be taxed."

Security analysts said that it is more than just the extension of military personnel that makes the U.S. vulnerable. They said terrorists may be learning from Washington's response to Katrina to exploit previously unknown weaknesses. They said looting that swept across parts of New Orleans and other sections of the Gulf after the hurricane highlighted how law and order can quickly break down in major U.S. cities.

"Terrorists have always been attracted to the idea of creating destruction and disruption on a catastrophic scale," said Brian Jenkins, a counterterrorism expert at Rand Corp., a think tank in Santa Monica, Calif. Katrina proved that "the veneer of civilization is very thin" even in the U.S., Mr. Jenkins said, and that "large cities can come apart quickly."

The humanitarian disaster along the Gulf Coast also could prove to be a propaganda victory for al Qaeda and its affiliates for the longer term. Mr. bin Laden and other Islamic leaders have sought to portray the Bush administration as overextending the U.S. by invading Iraq and potentially draining the world's largest economy of its resources. Al Qaeda also has sought to portray the U.S. leadership as imperialists who are hostile to minority groups globally.

Scenes of largely African-American victims suffering in sports arenas and other makeshift shelters are likely to support al Qaeda's portrayal of the U.S. in some parts of the world, said a number of analysts in Muslim countries. This could play into the recruiting tactics of a number of extremists groups.

In Pakistan, said Talat Masood, a social commentator in Islamabad, people think that "the poor communities have been neglected in America. ... And the capitalist system is very exploitative."

A senior member of Russian President Vladimir Putin's government said yesterday that the Bush administration's inability to help the thousands along the Gulf Coast would embolden terrorists who seek to incapacitate major Western cities. The television scenes were "an extremely unpleasant signal to the terrorist community, because what the world sees, so do they," said Nikolai Spassky, deputy director of Mr. Putin's Security Council, according to the Interfax news agency.

But many security analysts said the U.S. has the resources to concurrently rebuild the Gulf region while guarding against terrorists. The key, they said, is that Washington must better train for calamities and better integrate many of the bureaucracies created since Sept. 11 with local governments.

Senators 'to Demand Answers' On Slow Action (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON — Hurricane Katrina has become the Homeland Security Department's first big test.

Since the department was created after the 9/11 attacks to prevent and respond to catastrophes, it has spent tens of billions of dollars, studied disaster scenarios of every imaginable kind and run some of the nation's biggest emergency response drills.

It should have been ready for just about anything. But it wasn't ready for the power of Katrina.

Today, as workers struggle to provide better relief for survivors, Congress will begin investigating why the government's response was so slow.

Sens. Susan Collins, R-Maine, and Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., leaders of the Senate homeland security committee, will discuss their committee's plan for an inquiry into the response by the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA). The agency is the disaster-response division of the Homeland Security Department.

"We intend to demand answers as to how this immense failure occurred," the senators said in a statement.

Despite the problems and the criticism, government workers are pushing ahead to help tens of thousands of people put out of their homes.

In the Gulf Coast region, two cruise ships based in Galveston, Texas, began boarding evacuees — 2,600 per ship — and the Postal Service began trying to reconnect evacuees with their mail. Customs officers are expected today at the Astrodome in Houston, where they will deliver 100,000 articles of clothing.

Emergency workers also plan to move people from the Astrodome and other large shelters into smaller community shelters.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, who flew to the gulf region over the weekend to take control of the relief effort, appointed Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen on Monday to run recovery efforts in New Orleans.

Chertoff will fly back to Washington for one day today to meet with members of President Bush's Cabinet and members of Congress.

Some, including Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., say Bush should appoint an independent national commission similar to the commission that investigated the 9/11 attacks. "The slow pace of relief efforts in the face of a mounting death toll … seems to confirm that our ability to respond to cataclysmic disaster has not adequately been addressed," Clinton wrote in a letter to Bush over the weekend.

The response in New Orleans and throughout the gulf region shows "we're not at all prepared for the big one," said Randy Larsen of the Homeland Security Institute, a research group.

Brian Besanceney, head of public affairs at the Homeland Security Department, said Katrina and the subsequent flooding in New Orleans caused a level of devastation significantly beyond a terrorist's capability and the slow response should not be taken as an indication that the government isn't equipped to handle another terrorist attack.

Unlike the devastation in New York City on 9/11, which was confined to 16 acres, the wreckage from Katrina spreads over 90,000 square miles and left hundreds of thousands of people homeless.

"This is the type of force that only Mother Nature can really unleash," Besanceney said. "The sheer geography of it would be very difficult for terrorists to achieve."

But with a nuclear or large radiological device, or even with a major chemical attack, terrorists could render a city the size of New Orleans uninhabitable. And many of the rescue and recovery issues would be the same: Tens of thousands would need to be rescued, power would be out, areas of the city would be contaminated, mobile hospitals and medical equipment would be needed, and shelter and food would be scarce.

"This damage could just as easily have been caused by a terrorist attack, and many if not most of the same elements are involved in responding to natural disasters," Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., said.

Kyl also plans hearings as chairman of a terrorism and homeland security subcommittee in the Senate. "We need to understand from the key authorities what went wrong," he said.

An independent Cabinet-level agency whose chief reported directly to the president during the Clinton administration, FEMA was one of 22 agencies folded into the Homeland Security Department in 2003, and some experts say planning for how to respond to natural disasters took a back seat to planning for various terrorist scenarios.

"If this was a terrorist event, is this the kind of response we would have?" asked James Lee Witt, the FEMA director under Clinton.

He said he doesn't understand why response was so slow. "We knew it was coming, we knew it was going to be a big disaster, we've run these scenarios many times," he said.

Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., said he'll introduce a bill today that would make FEMA once again an independent, Cabinet-level agency that reports directly to the president.

Behind Poor Katrina Response, A Long Chain Of Weak Links (WSJ)

By Robert Block, Amy Schatz, Gary Fields and Christopher cooper

Just two weeks ago, five state emergency managers brought a tough message to a meeting in Washington with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and his top deputies.

"We told them straight out that they were weakening emergency management with potentially disastrous consequences," says Dave Liebersbach, the director of Alaska's Division of Homeland Security and Emergency Management. The department's focus on terrorism was undermining its readiness for other catastrophes, said the visiting officials, who included emergency managers from Mississippi and Alabama.

Now that Hurricane Katrina has left the Gulf Coast flooded and New Orleans in ruins, the question ricocheting around the nation and the world is this: How could the world's biggest superpower fail so badly in protecting and rescuing its residents from a natural disaster so frequently foretold?

The answer is sure to receive intense scrutiny this fall in Congress and around the nation, especially given revived fears that the U.S. is ill-prepared for a terrorist attack. "We are going to take a hard, hard look at our disaster-response procedures," said Republican Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee this weekend as he assisted patients at the New Orleans airport.

Yesterday, the government moved aggressively to show it has the situation in hand. President Bush paid his second visit to the region in four days, visiting Baton Rouge, La., and Poplarville, Miss. He asserted that federal, state and local governments are "doing the best we can." The major levee breach in New Orleans, at the 17th Street Canal, was closed, allowing the city to begin pumping out floodwaters, a process expected to take about 30 days.

Meanwhile, thousands of federal troops appeared to be firmly in control of the city, with most residents evacuated and searches for survivors well underway. A Customs and Border Protection aircraft operating as a flying communication link gave first responders in New Orleans the ability to communicate for the first time since Katrina struck more than a week ago. In suburban Jefferson Parish, thousands of residents were allowed to check their homes under tight restrictions to evaluate what was left.

But the weekend's progress hasn't erased the troubling questions left by the government's delayed understanding of the scope of the damage last week and its initial slowness in mounting rescues and bringing food and water to stricken citizens. The problems include:

• The decision to transform the Federal Emergency Management Agency from a cabinet-level agency reporting directly to the president to just one piece of a new, gargantuan Department of Homeland Security, which altered FEMA's mission and watered down its powers.

• Too few helicopters stationed in the Gulf Coast area ahead of the storm.

• A military stretched by wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, which left commanders near New Orleans reluctant to commit some active-duty units at nearby Fort Polk, La., because they were in the midst of preparing for an Afghan deployment this winter.

• A total breakdown of communications systems, an echo of the problems that faced New York officials dealing with the 2001 terrorist attacks and a system the government has been trying to fix for four years.

• Poor coordination among federal, state and local officials in the days immediately before and after the hurricane.

• Failure at all levels of government to take seriously many studies and reports over many years warning of the potential disaster.

Indeed, despite many warnings of the dangers, Mr. Chertoff and other administration officials have explained their poor initial response by saying government planners didn't expect both a serious hurricane and a breach in levees. "This is really one which I think was breathtaking in its surprise," Mr. Chertoff told reporters on Saturday.

Planners, he said, "were confronted with a second wave that they did not have built into the plan, but using the tools they had, we have to move forward and adapt."

Plenty of missteps at the local level contributed to last week's disaster too, from a failure to take basic steps to protect the telecom infrastructure to inadequate food and water at the Superdome. New Orleans may be able to stage events such as Mardi Gras and Jazzfest and provide parking, crowd control and adequate toilets for millions of visitors, but its hurricane plan was more rudimentary. "Get people to higher ground and have the feds and the state airlift supplies to them -- that was the plan, man," Mayor Ray Nagin said in an interview yesterday.

But so far, the federal government is bearing the brunt of criticism, given its vast resources and unique role in responding to major disasters. Critics say the response shows that the nation's disaster-response system, rebuilt in the wake of the 2001 terrorist attacks, is woefully inadequate. In a Washington Post-ABC News poll taken on Friday, the public said by a 67% to 31% margin that the federal government wasn't adequately prepared for Katrina.

"What the events of the last week have shown is that over the last few years since 9/11 we have slowly disassembled our national emergency response system and put in its place something far inferior," says Bill Waugh, an academic expert on emergency management at Georgia State University. "We reinvented the wheel when we didn't need to and now have something that doesn't roll very well at all."

Many of last week's problems are rooted in January 2003, when the Bush administration, urged on by some members of Congress, created the Homeland Security Department. It amalgamated 22 agencies, from the Coast Guard to the Secret Service, creating the largest government bureaucracy since the Pentagon was formed in 1947.

From the start, emergency experts and even the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, warned that a special effort was needed to be sure FEMA's traditional mission of providing disaster relief wasn't lost in the shuffle.

But it was. FEMA's clout had long depended on its ability to help states plan for natural disasters by providing emergency preparedness grants and other resources. Under Homeland Security, grant-making decisions were transferred to a new, department-wide office in an attempt to consolidate funding. As a result, FEMA lost control of more than $800 million in preparedness grants since 2003, congressional figures show.

Focus on Terrorism

State emergency managers and congressional investigators say the overwhelming focus for grants is now on fighting terrorism. More money goes to local police and fire departments for that mission than responding to and recover from disasters.

Officials from Shelby County, Ala., for instance, last year said they could get federal money for chemical suits. But they were unable to get money for an emergency operations center that could link computers, phones and televisions to respond to tornadoes. Between 1957 and 2003, the county had 20 tornadoes that it said killed 11 people and caused more than $32 million in damages.

Meanwhile, morale at FEMA has dropped since it was subsumed by Homeland Security. Several key jobs are unfilled and its executives are overtaxed. Its acting chief operating officer in Washington, for instance, is also the director of FEMA's Atlanta region; his seat there is being held by another acting director. That area includes much of the hurricane-prone Southeast.

In July, Mr. Chertoff unveiled a departmental restructuring that would cement FEMA's reduced role. Among other moves, the plan restricted FEMA's purview to disaster response, stripping away longstanding functions such as helping communities build houses outside flood zones.

The plan, he told Congress, was "to take out of FEMA a couple of elements that were really not related to its core missions, that were generally focused on the issue of preparedness in a way that I think was frankly more of a distraction to FEMA than an enhancement to FEMA."

'Extremely Negative Impact'

On July 27, Alaska's Mr. Liebersbach, in his role as the head of the National Emergency Management Association, an association of state emergency management directors, warned in a letter to Congress that Mr. Chertoff's plan was nothing short of disastrous. It would have "an extremely negative impact on the people of this nation," he wrote.

"The proposed reorganization increases the separation between preparedness, response and recovery functions," the letter said. "Any unnecessary separation of these functions will result in disjointed response and adversely impact the effectiveness of departmental operations." It was the letter that prompted the meetings with Homeland Security officials in late August.

Last week's response certainly revealed cracks in the current system. Though President Bush declared a state of emergency before Katrina made landfall on Monday, officials appear to have underestimated the severity of the damage caused by the storm. By Tuesday it became clear that the response was not meeting needs and that FEMA and Louisiana emergency teams were overwhelmed. Then the flood waters hit in New Orleans. It still took several more hours for Mr. Chertoff to declare the disaster an "incident of national significance."

Even then, some requirements hampered speed. Because of worries that terrorists could take advantage of such chaos, FEMA now must abide by post-9/11 security procedures, such as putting air marshals on flights. That meant stranded residents couldn't be evacuated from the New Orleans airport until FEMA had rounded up dozens of Transportation Security Administration screeners and more than 50 federal air marshals. Inadequate power prevented officials from firing up X-ray machines and metal detectors until the government decided evacuees could be searched manually.

Slow Off the Mark

In the hours before and after Katrina struck, there weren't firm procedures in place for directing people and materials. Dan Wessel, owner of Cool Express Inc., a Blue River, Wis., transportation company that contracts with FEMA to move supplies, said he didn't get a green light to send trucks to a staging area in Dallas until about 4 p.m. Monday, hours after Katrina made landfall. That was too late to meet a deadline of getting trucks to Dallas by noon Tuesday, he said.

Once the trucks arrived, drivers often found no National Guard troops, FEMA workers or other personnel on hand to help unload the water and ice, Mr. Wessel said. "I almost told the guys to leave, but people are wanting the water," he said. "The drivers distributed it."

Inside New Orleans, said Dr. Joseph Guarisco, chief of the emergency department of Ochsner Clinic Foundation, a 580-bed hospital in New Orleans above the water line, said there was confusion about where to direct evacuees seeking shelter.

'There's No One There'

For a couple of days, Dr. Guarisco said, he directed a stream of patients to what he understood was a FEMA mass-casualty tent at the intersection of Interstate 10 and Causeway Boulevard. "A number came back and said, 'there's no one there.' " Dr. Guarisco said.

Some critics have blamed the war in Iraq, and the deployment of thousands of troops, including National Guard members, to that effort. President Bush has vehemently denied that charge. The administration has said problems on the ground were due to an unexpectedly severe storm and unanticipated flooding.

Four weeks before the hurricane, Lt. Colonel Pete Schneider, of the Louisiana National Guard, told WGNO, a local ABC affiliate, that when guard members left for Iraq last October, they took a lot of needed equipment with them, including dozens of high-water vehicles, Humvees, refueling tankers and generators that would be needed in the event a major natural disaster hit the state.

"You've got combatant commanders over there who need it, they say they need it, they don't want to lose what they have and we certainly understand that," he said. "It's a matter of us educating that combatant commander [that] we need it back here as well."

Col. Schneider also said the state had enough equipment to get by, and that if Louisiana were to get hit by a major hurricane, the neighboring states of Mississippi, Alabama and Florida had all agreed to help. In the end, those states were hit by Katrina as well.

The U.S. Army has a large facility, Fort Polk, in Leesville, La., about 270 miles northwest of New Orleans. Officials at Fort Polk, which has nearly 8,000 active-duty soldiers, said their contribution so far has consisted of a few dozen soldiers from the 10th

Mountain Division manning purification equipment and driving half-ton trucks filled with supplies and equipment. The first contingent of soldiers didn't receive orders until Saturday afternoon.

A spokeswoman at Fort Polk said she did not know why the base received its deployment orders so late in the game. "You'd have to ask the Pentagon," she said. A senior Army official said the service was reluctant to commit the 4th brigade of the 10th Mountain Division from Fort Polk, because the unit, which numbers several thousand soldiers, is in the midst of preparing for an Afghanistan deployment in January.

Instead, the Pentagon chose to send upwards of 7,500 soldiers from the 1st Cavalry Division at Fort Hood, Texas and the 82nd Airborne Division from Fort Bragg, N.C., along with Marines from California and North Carolina. Soldiers from the 82nd Airborne Division are able to deploy anywhere in the world in 18 hours. It took several days for them to arrive on the ground in Louisiana.

Helicopters Proved Crucial

There, no piece of equipment was more necessary than helicopters. But in the first 48 hours after the levees were breached, the shortage of helicopters became acute. FEMA wanted choppers to save stranded residents, while the Army Corps of Engineers needed the aircraft, known as "rotary wing" in military jargon, to repair the breaches. The Coast Guard, the primary agency responding to the disaster in New Orleans, had a total of 20 aircraft in the area, mostly helicopters, which focused solely on rescue operations.

"We have very limited aviation assets and rotary wing is what we need to put materials into those breaches, and that's the very asset we need to do search and rescue and save victims, so our efforts became something of a second priority and our initial plan was delayed a bit because of that," says Lt. Gen. Carl Strock, commander of the Army Corps of Engineers.

A FEMA spokesman said the Coast Guard and National Guard had adequate numbers of helicopters on hand, but that rescue and supply operations were hampered by other factors, including limited airspace around New Orleans, which is geographically small. "You put in 30 helicopters in that area and you create a dangerous situation," said the spokesman, Marty Bahamonde.

On the supply front, helicopters flew food to the Superdome, he said, but the helipad there could only accommodate small aircraft, which couldn't hold many supplies.

Communications systems also broke down, as they did at the World Trade Center in 2001, preventing emergency officials from communicating with each other and the military. That led to the odd juxtaposition of top federal officials praising the rescue effort and denying problems at New Orleans' overcrowded convention center while TV cameras showed people there crying for help.

Radio Systems Lacking

Flooding and power shortages appear to be behind most of the serious communications problems, but incompatible radio systems didn't help.

Emergency responders in New Orleans and three nearby parishes all use different radio systems. New Orleans and nearby Jefferson Parish both use radios that operate on the 800 Mhz band, according to a Louisiana State Police interoperability report, but they were manufactured by different vendors. That means officials there had up to five channels on which to talk to one another.

"Communication is always difficult in emergency situations because of increased traffic," says William Vincent of the Lafayette Office of Homeland Security and Emergency Preparedness, about 135 miles from New Orleans. Emergency 911 dispatchers in Lafayette fielded calls from New Orleans residents who still had working cellphones but couldn't reach local police.

New Orleans officials had equipment at the fire department's communication center that could link otherwise incompatible local and federal systems. It was reportedly knocked out by flooding.

Another problem: Even after 9/11, local officials and federal emergency responders don't typically use the same radio frequencies, which can make communication difficult until agreements are reached on sharing channels.

As handheld radios began losing power in New Orleans, police officers and other emergency responders had no way of recharging them. Unlike radios used by firefighters combating wild fires, which can be powered by disposable batteries found in any grocery store, a typical handheld police emergency radio uses rechargeable batteries similar to those powering cell phones, according to Ron Haraseth, director of automated frequency coordination at the Association of Public-Safety Communications Officers.

Bad Information

FEMA itself seemed to frequently have bad information. At a Tuesday press conference Bill Lokey, federal coordinating officer for FEMA and the agency representative on site, downplayed the severity of the flooding caused by the breaches in New Orleans, saying the water wasn't rising in most areas. "I don't want to alarm everybody that, you know, New Orleans is filling up like a bowl," he said. "That's just not happening."

Within hours, much of the city was under water, and Mr. Lokey was calling Katrina "the most significant natural disaster to hit the United States."

The possible problems had long been trumpeted. In June 2004, FEMA spent more than half a million dollars to commission a "catastrophic hurricane disaster plan" from IEM Inc., a Baton Rouge-based emergency-management and homeland-security consulting firm. A report analyzing results of a mock hurricane hitting New Orleans, dubbed "Hurricane Pam," was envisioned and a response and recovery plan was to be drawn up.

During a five-day mock exercise in July 2004, emergency-management responders huddled in Baton Rouge to plan a response to "Hurricane Pam," a Category 3 storm which featured 120 miles per hour winds and a storm surge that topped New Orleans's levees. For reasons that aren't clear, the mock exercise never anticipated the levees giving way, despite such warnings. Even so, the mock hurricane destroyed 500,000 buildings in New Orleans and displaced one million residents.

The group developed a plan to get stranded residents out of the way and construction of a "command structure" with enough space for upwards of 800 rescue workers. A report, dated Jan. 5 of this year, detailed recommendations from the exercise and was provided to FEMA, an IEM spokeswoman said. FEMA has not released the report.

Need Fed Probe Into Crisis - Hil (NYDN)

By Michael McAuliff

New York Daily News, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON - With many blaming the growing scope of Katrina's devastation on the Bush administration, Sen. Hillary Clinton called yesterday for a 9/11-style probe into how the federal government responded to the crisis.

"It has become increasingly evident that our nation was not prepared," Clinton (D-N.Y.) said in a letter to Bush asking him to set up a "Katrina Commission."

"The slow pace of relief efforts in the face of a mounting death toll ... seems to confirm that our ability to respond to cataclysmic disasters has not been adequately addressed," she said.

Her call echoed statements of Republicans such as Arizona's Sen. John Kyl, chairman of the Technology and Homeland Security Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee, who plans a hearing and has said the catastrophe in New Orleans could have a lot in common with a terror attack.

A White House spokeswoman deferred comment to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, who appeared on numerous Sunday morning broadcasts insisting there would be time to lay blame later.

Clinton has decided at least one thing without waiting for any commission reports. She said she plans to introduce legislation to split the Federal Emergency Management Agency out of the Department of Homeland Security and give it back a cabinet-level director like it had in her husband's administration.

FEMA Fails Katrina Victims (USAT)

After the hurricane and killer floods, New Orleans was victimized by another disaster — the disaster response itself.

Every level of government that was supposed to prepare for the storm and its aftermath failed miserably. All were unwilling to make the expensive commitments to shore up vulnerable levees or replenish vanishing wetlands that left New Orleans so open to flooding. There was no logical plan to evacuate the city, particularly those too sick, poor or stubborn to leave.

When it became clear that tens of thousands were marooned, the federal government was unprepared to rush life-saving supplies to the city's Superdome and convention center, to rescue the stranded and sick or keep order in the streets.

Images that brought to mind catastrophes in Third World nations shot around the world — making the inept response of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) not only a human tragedy but also an international embarrassment for the USA.

That bungled response should serve as an alert to the rest of the nation. After spending four years and tens of billions of dollars since 9/11 on "all-hazards preparedness," FEMA's parent, the Homeland Security Department, failed its first major test.

The past week's performance raises many questions, among them:

• If national authorities could not adequately respond to an anticipated threat from a hurricane, how can they possibly be ready to deal with a surprise nuclear or biological attack by terrorists?

• Has FEMA's leadership been politicized, and is it up to the task? According to news reports, the agency's head, Michael Brown, had been supervising horse-show judges in Colorado before he was called to Washington in 2001 to work for an old friend, then the head of FEMA. Brown, with little disaster experience, quickly rose to be the agency's deputy director and then its leader. In the first days of the crisis, FEMA's decision-making appeared tentative and confused, with fatal consequences.

• Has putting FEMA in the new Homeland Security Department undermined its ability to respond to natural disasters? According to a Government Accountability Office report, 75% of the agency's 2006 budget for preparedness grants is focused on terrorism.

Disaster experts will tell you that responding to any catastrophe requires the same elements — evacuation, rescue, emergency supplies and security.

After 9/11, the nation should not have needed a second wake-up call. Having gotten one, it's time to dissect this failure, establish accountability and ensure that it won't happen again.

Hurricane Reorders Capitol Hill Agenda (WSJ)

By David Rogers And John J. Fialka

WASHINGTON -- After approving a cash infusion for hurricane relief, Congress is focusing on three legislative priorities for responding to Katrina: moving energy supplies, resettling displaced people, and restoring economically critical Gulf ports.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) said the chamber's primary legislative business will include hurricane-related measures and appropriations bills. Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R., Mo.) said the House may consider legislation designed to ease supply by expanding on the administration's authority to waive fuel standards and environmental requirements. Lawmakers also will weigh allowing exploration for oil and gas along the coast of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska, and letting states lease federal offshore land to companies exploring for natural gas along the Atlantic, Pacific and Gulf coasts.

"We can put that on the table very quickly," said House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman Joe Barton of Texas, citing support for the offshore-leasing proposal from Resources Chairman Rep. Richard Pombo of California. Coastal states with big tourism industries, such as Florida, are likely to resist on environmental grounds.

Returning House and Senate leaders are to meet today with President Bush on the government's response, and the agenda is very different from the one lawmakers anticipated after passing energy legislation over the summer and counting on addressing tax cuts, immigration, Social Security and the Supreme Court in the fall. Mr. Frist said yesterday that he would delay indefinitely a vote scheduled for today on the estate tax.

Confirmation hearings for Judge John Roberts, nominated by President Bush first to be an associate justice of the Supreme Court and then to be Chief Justice of the United States, are expected to be postponed until next week. Mr. Frist said no hearings will be held until after the funeral tomorrow of Chief Justice William Rehnquist, and leadership aides predicted that the proceedings will now begin Monday.

Lawmakers instead will be working on legislation to help evacuees move across state lines while retaining benefits to help them build new lives. No measure can ensure immediate relief from gas prices squeezing motorists around the country, but lawmakers hope to begin breaking the bottlenecks that threaten the movement of fuel, as well as the transportation of Midwestern agricultural products.

Rep. Barton's panel and the Senate Energy Committee will hold back-to-back energy hearings this week. "There are going to be questions about what major oil companies are doing with all of the resources they're accumulating," said Sen. Pete Domenici (R., N.M.), chairman of the Senate panel. Mr. Frist said that when he spoke with constituents even days before the hurricane, "The No. 1 issue on people's minds was the price of gas."

But with lawmakers unlikely to seek price caps, the committees will hear ideas aimed at limiting consumption. "We need to address the demand side," says John Dowd, a Wall Street energy analyst for Sanford C. Bernstein & Co. who favors consideration of higher automobile fuel-efficiency standards and decreased speed limits on interstate highways.

The Republican majority -- traditionally hostile to such approaches -- may pursue tax cuts to ease the price squeeze. Mr. Blunt said a potential stimulus package could include tax relief for transportation and airline companies affected by high prices and supply disruptions.

Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.) said the distribution problems following Katrina underscore the need to disperse U.S. refinery capacity around the nation more. "What are the problems that prevent us from building new refineries? ... We need to look at that," Mr. Hastert said. "Maybe we need to make it a little easier to site a refinery and get it up and running."

In addition to energy matters, lawmakers will help relief agencies find a path to resettle a large, often lower-income population displaced by the hurricane and facing huge hurdles before returning home soon. Among the challenges for Congress is to help these people set up new lives with minimal disruption of income, unemployment, nutrition or health-care benefits even as they cross state lines.

A single mother with children, for example, might be taken from New Orleans to the Astrodome but then want to settle with relatives in Arkansas. "You can't keep people in the Astrodome, obviously," said Mr. Hastert and lawmakers are expected to give greater authority to agencies to waive core residency and paperwork requirements that must be met to qualify for this assistance. Beyond waivers, Democrats say Washington must be willing to pick up more of the state share of these benefits since the storm-hit states are in financial trouble and states that welcome displaced families will want some assurance that they aren't assuming an impossible burden.

For example, unemployment, Medicaid and the welfare program, Temporary Assistance for Needy Families, all depend on some employer or state contribution that the federal government may have to absorb. Mr. Blunt said private charities could help by providing transportation for families to relocate. But House Republican and Democratic leaders have asked staff to develop a list of what waivers may need to be authorized quickly.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D., Calif.) has urged the creation of a task force representing the major committees to expedite matters. Based on his experience after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Mr. Hastert may be more inclined to work through individual committees, but also streamline the process by bringing Senate and House chairmen together at the outset.

Despite a budget deficit exceeding $300 billion, "money is not going to be the question," said House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis of California. That is because disparate political forces are converging, producing what most expect will be a record investment by the government. Republicans are themselves stung by the public criticism and Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Thad Cochran (R., Miss.) is from the affected region and commands a huge reservoir of support in Congress.

Also, Midwest farm interests represented by Republicans like Messrs. Hastert and Blunt have a major stake in reconstructing New Orleans. Another port -- Gulfport, Miss. -- is crucial to Southern poultry interests, but New Orleans has a wider regional reach, handling 71% of corn and 65% of soybean exports last year.

The disruptions have hit Midwest farmers at a difficult time. Storage facilities already are strained from big crops last year, and commodity prices have been falling amid efforts to empty grain elevators in time for new crops. If sales can't be completed, there is a risk of grain being stored outside, thereby reducing its value and the return to the farmer.

With rising energy and fertilizer prices and a summer drought in the eastern Midwest, including Speaker Hastert's Illinois district, there are sure to be demands for expanded agriculture assistance as part of any disaster package. Mr. Hastert indicated as much in an interview Friday, where he said the adverse effect of the port's closing on shipments should be considered.

Republicans Halt Death-tax Discussion (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 6, 2005

Senate Republicans agreed yesterday to postpone consideration of the bill to fully and permanently repeal the death tax that had been scheduled for this week.

Majority Leader Bill Frist promised to return to the bill as soon as possible but wanted to clear the legislative decks this week -- lawmakers' first after a month's recess -- to consider what could be done to help deal with the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

"The Senate will move from its previously scheduled agenda for Tuesday, September 6, and instead consider a resolution expressing the sympathy of the Senate for the victims of Hurricane Katrina," he said yesterday.

The decision by Mr. Frist of Tennessee comes in response to requests by Minority Leader Harry Reid and other Democrats who wanted the vote on the death-tax repeal to be delayed in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

"It doesn't look right," Mr. Reid of Nevada said yesterday.

He also endorsed the idea of creating a "Katrina Commission" to explore how the rescue and relief efforts could have been improved in the hours and days immediately after last week's hurricane.

"We're learning serious mistakes were made, and I don't think that is subject for debate," Mr. Reid said. "Those who put politics ahead of people in dire need must be held accountable."

Mr. Reid declined to say to whom he was referring except to express dismay that some have blamed local officials for failing to evacuate the city of New Orleans and maintain order.

Now is not the time for assigning blame, he said

Then Mr. Reid, like many lawmakers, went on to blame the federal government for a sluggish response.

"I think this is a federal responsibility," he said. "This is a huge federal issue and I think the federal government has not responded properly."

Some of the harshest political criticism came last week from members of the Congressional Black Caucus.

"Many of these Americans who now are struggling to survive are Americans of color," said Rep. Elijah E. Cummings, Maryland Democrat. "Their cries for assistance confront America with a test of our moral compass as a nation."

He also quoted the admonition of Christ to feed the hungry and clothe the naked, saying: "To the president of the United States, I simply say that God cannot be pleased with our response."

Congress Reworks Agenda To Focus On Relief (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON — Responding to the devastation of Hurricane Katrina and the death of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, congressional leaders announced today that they were retooling their legislative agenda to give top priority to storm relief and recovery measures.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said he would cancel a vote scheduled for this week on repealing the estate tax — a controversial measure that Democrats had decried as inappropriate relief for the wealthy at a time when so many poor storm victims are suffering in the South.

Frist also announced the postponement of confirmation hearings on the nomination of John G. Roberts Jr. to the U.S. Supreme Court, which had been scheduled to start Tuesday. Roberts, initially Bush's pick to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, was tapped today to succeed Rehnquist, who died Saturday night, as chief justice of the United States.

Frist said the decision to postpone the hearings' start — at least until Thursday, but not beyond Monday — was to honor Rehnquist and not in response to some Democrats' contention that more preparation time is needed now that Roberts is being considered for the court's top post.

Rehnquist will lie in repose at the Supreme Court on Tuesday and Wednesday morning. His funeral will be held Wednesday afternoon, followed by burial at Arlington National Cemetery.

The agenda changes come on the eve of Congress' return from a month-long August recess — a return that will be marked by a striking change in political climate. Republicans left town at the end of July buoyed by their success in passing energy, highway and trade legislation and eager to tackle other priorities, such as overhauling Social Security and repealing the estate tax.

But as they reconvene this week, their agenda and mood will be darkened by more sobering realities: a vast swath of the U.S. ravaged by Katrina; skyrocketing gas prices; the death of the chief justice; and spreading turmoil in Iraq.

In an unusual Labor Day news conference, Frist declared that Congress' new priority would be funding the relief efforts for hurricane victims and reconstruction of the battered Gulf Coast.

House and Senate leaders called Congress back into session last week to approve $10.5 billion to aid hurricane victims. Frist said another round of funding would be provided "when needed," but he did not say when or how much.

The entire Senate will be briefed by top Cabinet officials, including Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, on the recovery effort in the South. And the Senate is expected to pass a measure designed to help the storm-ravaged region reestablish its court system: The bill, which may also clear the House on Tuesday, would allow district, circuit and bankruptcy courts to relocate and operate outside their jurisdictions.

On Wednesday, Frist said, the Senate will honor Rehnquist and adjourn for his funeral. Then it will take up a routine appropriations bill that could be a vehicle for additional funding for small business loans and for state and local law enforcement agencies.

Frist has asked committee chairmen to make recommendations on measures that could be approved to help storm recovery, possibly including emergency aid for housing, unemployment insurance, healthcare, protection against price gouging and tax incentives for job creation.

In postponing the scheduled vote on repealing the estate tax, Frist did not say exactly when the Senate would return to the issue, but he denied he was acting in response to political pressure from Democrats.

Earlier in the day, the Senate's Democratic leader, Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, issued the latest in a series of demands that Frist cancel the vote on grounds that it would be "inappropriate and insensitive" to hurricane victims.

House leaders, so far, have announced no immediate changes in their legislative agenda.

Times staff writer Richard Simon contributed to this report.

Competition Starts In Congress To Aid Victims And To Investigate The Response (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 5 - Congressional leaders of the two parties raced on Monday to spell out competing plans to help victims of Hurricane Katrina, offering proposals for emergency health care, housing and economic support, among other initiatives.

Republicans said committees would announce plans for hearings into the apparently flawed response and increasing oil and gasoline prices.

Democrats said they expected the aftermath of the storm to be a reminder of the importance of federal power in the hearings on the selection of Judge John G. Roberts Jr. for the Supreme Court. Lawmakers postponed confirmation hearings for Judge Roberts, whom President Bush tapped on Monday to succeed Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who died on Saturday.

Pushed aside are Republican plans to try to repeal the estate tax.

"We are going to take a hard, hard look at our disaster response" at the local and federal level, the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist, said Monday at a news conference.

Mr. Frist said he expected the Senate energy committee to look at "price gouging, the excessive oil profits and what responsibility oil companies have in the skyrocketing fuel prices."

Mr. Frist, a physician who visited the region to help treat victims, said the Senate would pass measures to allow courts whose buildings were destroyed to meet in other jurisdictions. He said Senate committees would take up bills to give aid to storm victims, rebuild public works, revive the regional economy and prepare for future disasters.

Congressional leaders are to meet President Bush on Tuesday to discuss relief efforts, and a group of cabinet secretaries, including Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, are to brief the full Senate at the end of the day.

Senator Harry Reid, the minority leader, called for an investigation of the disaster response by a commission modeled after the 9/11 panel. Mr. Reid faulted the White House as failing to take responsibility.

"The buck stops at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue," he said.

At a news conference, Mr. Reid presented a package of emergency measures for storm victims, including dropping some residency and documentation requirements for Medicaid, easing access to Medicare drug benefits, increasing federal financial support for affected states and health care providers, providing emergency vouchers for housing, making federal payments to victims, and creating tax incentives to encourage people to take in the displaced.

In an interview, Mr. Reid also said Democrats were weighing measures to lower gasoline costs, including a proposal by Senator Carl Levin of Michigan for a price cap.

"That is on the table," Mr. Reid said. "We have to do something to address gas prices."

Bob Stevenson, a spokesman for Mr. Frist, said the proposed hearings on the oil crisis would seek to determine the cause of the price increases and the proper responses.

"Oil companies," Mr. Stevenson said, "have a responsibility to ensure that the prices reflected at the pump are at reasonable levels, and should that not be the case, I would expect there could be hell to pay in Congress."

House Republican leaders have said they will move immediately to pass relief measures in concert with the Senate while House committees hold investigations into the hurricane response and gasoline prices.

The House minority leader, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, called for a bipartisan group of House members to investigate the response and recommend emergency legislation.

"Waiting for multiple committees to act on a crisis of such breadth is not acceptable," Ms. Pelosi wrote in a letter to House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Republican of Illinois.

Mr. Frist and Mr. Reid agreed to postpone the confirmation hearings for Judge Roberts until after Chief Justice Rehnquist's funeral on Wednesday.

But Democratic and Republican aides said the parties were negotiating whether to take up the hearings on Thursday or on next Monday.

Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee who have been seeking more time to look into Judge Roberts's positions are pushing for the longer postponement. But aides involved in the negotiations said the Republicans wanted to begin as soon as possible, unless the Democrats committed to a final floor vote on confirmation by the end of the month.

Democrats are refusing a firm deadline to retain the threat of a filibuster, blocking confirmation by refusing to close debate, even though several Democratic senators have said such a move is extremely unlikely.

Whenever the hearings begin, Senator Charles E. Schumer, a New York Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, said, Democrats are quite likely to bring up Hurricane Katrina in the debate.

"One of the major controversies in the court is how strong should the federal government be," Mr. Schumer said, "and the hurricane has just made an argument, a devastating argument, that the federal government should be more powerful."

Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, another Democrat on the committee, suggested in a statement that the hearings should be further deferred while the public focused on the storm and mourned Chief Justice Rehnquist.

"In the midst of a national disaster of biblical proportions," Mr. Kennedy said, "it is difficult for the American people to participate fully in the selection of the next chief justice, one of the most important positions in our government and the chief protector of our Constitution."

Apparently trying to turn the debate on Judge Roberts into leverage over the president's next selection for the Supreme Court, Mr. Kennedy also argued that the Senate should withhold a vote on his confirmation until the naming of the next choice.

"We should know whom the president intends to propose," Mr. Kennedy said. "The American people care deeply about the overall balance of their highest court and its dedication as an institution to the protection of their rights."

Asked about that argument, Mr. Reid said, "Senator Kennedy has his opinions, and that is something we will talk about" at the caucus meeting on Tuesday.

Congress Comes Back To A Busy Agenda (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, September 6, 2005

Congress returns today from its August vacation to tackle a mountain of leftover legislative business, plus an even bigger challenge: a massive recovery package for the Gulf Coast cities that were flattened and flooded by Hurricane Katrina.

Awaiting action when lawmakers reconvene is Judge John G. Roberts Jr.'s Supreme Court nomination, a budget-cutting reconciliation bill filled with legislative riders that include oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, a phaseout or reduction of the estate tax, Social Security reform to let workers invest in U.S. Treasury bills, reauthorization of the Patriot Act, and a renewed crackdown on illegal aliens.

President Bush has had a string of legislative victories over the past eight months that included an overhaul of the bankruptcy laws, legal class-action reforms, a massive transportation bill and the Central American Free Trade Agreement.

But the next four months are expected to be far more contentious as a result of the decline in Mr. Bush's job-approval rating, which is hovering around 40 percent, and the increasing polarization in Congress, congressional strategists say.

"There will be a Republican leadership meeting Tuesday to discuss the fall agenda that will include immigration, appropriation bills, reconciliation and potential action on Social Security," said Ron Bonjean, chief spokesman for House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican.

"On top of that, we will be evaluating the needs of Hurricane Katrina's victims and working to get the areas affected by the hurricane back on [their] feet," he said.

Congress quickly approved an interim $10.5 billion assistance bill last week as the first step in the early recovery efforts, but congressional officials said a far more expansive aid package is expected in the next several weeks after further assessment of the damage caused by the Category 4 hurricane.

Other senior leadership officials said Friday there could be additional assistance to counter any downturn in the economy as a result of the disruptions in oil production in the Gulf of Mexico or the impact of higher fuel prices on key sectors of the nation's transportation and industrial sectors.

Some congressional aides, however, question whether a divided Congress will be able to handle both a massive regional recovery bill and everything else already on its plate in the final four months of this legislative session.

"Do you think we're going to be able to pass substantial Medicaid cuts and Social Security reform in the middle of this? You can't put that much on the plate," Steve Bell, New Mexico's Sen. Pete V. Domenici's chief of staff, told the Los Angeles Times.

Not a problem, said House Majority Leader Tom DeLay.

"We can do two things at the same time. We're going to keep our agenda moving," he said Friday.

But House Majority Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri said: "Some committees may have to reprioritize their agenda" to deal with the massive recovery programs that Congress will have to undertake.

"I think this is going to take some time. Now, how much it slows our September-October schedule, I don't know," Mr. Blunt said.

Mike Franc, senior congressional analyst at the Heritage Foundation, said, "A lot of the president's remaining agenda will be overshadowed by what happens in the Gulf of Mexico. If the federal response and the way everything is handled is done competently and effectively, that's going to be a major feather in Bush's cap."

As for the remaining agenda, Mr. Franc said nothing else "stands out as a particularly unique challenge."

"It's more of a steady-as-you-go period. Social Security could turn out to be a major achievement," he said.

Oregon Lawmaker Warned Of Danger Faced By New Orleans (HILL)

By Bob Cusack

The Hill, September 6, 2005

For years, Louisiana lawmakers have warned of a possible flooding disaster in New Orleans.

But one of the most outspoken legislators on preparing the city for a storm like Hurricane Katrina was a Democrat from Oregon.

DOJ_NMG_0002658

Earlier this year, Rep. Earl Blumenauer delivered a speech on the House floor that drew parallels between the 2004 tsunami in Southeast Asia and the vulnerability of New Orleans.

Blumenauer's predictions of a catastrophe came true as Katrina flooded New Orleans, leading to a death toll that is expected to climb into the thousands.

On Jan. 26, Blumenauer said a hurricane hitting New Orleans would lead to a "30-foot wall of water hitting the city, causing thousands of deaths and $100 billion in damage."

He added, "The experience of Southeast Asia should convince us all of the urgent need for congressional action. … Prevention and planning will pay off. Maybe the devastation will encourage us to act before disaster strikes."

In a Sept. 15, 2004, floor speech, Blumenauer said damage inflicted by a hurricane "might represent the loss of the city of New Orleans. … Now is the time to deal with policies that will make a difference protecting people."

GOP Agenda Shifts As Political Trials Grow (WP)

By Shailagh Murray And Charles Babington

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

As Congress returns from its August recess today, Republicans face a far more troubling political landscape than the one they left a month ago, according to lawmakers in both parties.

Gasoline prices have skyrocketed, the Bush administration is being widely criticized for its handling of Hurricane Katrina, and as the war in Iraq grows increasingly unpopular, the president's approval ratings have sunk to an all-time low. Further complicating the picture is a rare double vacancy on the Supreme Court, which could trigger sniping between the GOP's center and right wing if not deftly handled.

"We're going to have a busy time," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

As the pressure on Republicans builds, Democrats are sounding emboldened. One sign of GOP unease: The Senate was supposed to vote this week on whether to permanently repeal the estate tax, but Frist said yesterday that the bill will be temporarily shelved. The announcement came two hours after Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) called for Republicans to back off tax cuts in the wake of the Katrina tragedy. "Not now, for heaven's sake," Reid said.

Some conservatives worry that Bush has given Democrats an opening by naming John G. Roberts Jr. to succeed Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who died Saturday night. Roberts had been nominated to succeed the retiring Sandra Day O'Connor, and that confirmation process was scheduled to start today. Because Rehnquist was a solid conservative and O'Connor a centrist, the argument goes, liberals will fight much harder to keep a conservative -- such as Roberts -- from getting the O'Connor seat, whereas the philosophy of Rehnquist's successor is less vital to them.

Lawmakers in both parties said the surging price of gas and spot shortages are leading concerns in their states and districts, and Democrats will try to get the upper hand by calling for price caps and a requirement that oil companies and refineries disclose their pricing policies. Frist said Republicans would proceed with legislation to allow oil drilling in the Alaska wilderness.

Another immediate concern will be disaster relief. Frist, a surgeon who spent the weekend treating hurricane victims in New Orleans, said the Senate would focus on several Katrina-related matters, including aid to victims, rebuilding and economic development assistance, and examining the many ways that government fell short in dealing with the crisis. "We're going to take a hard, hard look at our disaster response," Frist said.

Although congressional Republicans facing reelection next year are unhappy with Bush's slide in the polls, there's no sense of panic, said Stu Rothenberg, who writes an independent political newsletter. "But inevitably, if we continue to see a softening in the president's numbers, every Republican is going to be expressing some concern, if not alarm," he said.

The biggest wild card, Republicans say, is the war in Iraq. The dominant issue before the hurricane will resurface when Congress tries to complete a defense bill.

"People don't see light at the end of the tunnel in Iraq," said Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa). "If the situation a year from now is the same, it's going to be the number one issue in the next election, and consequently for incumbent Republicans, a problem."

One of the more vulnerable GOP members is Rep. Michael G. Fitzpatrick, a freshman from a moderate district in the Philadelphia suburbs. Fitzpatrick does not air his concerns publicly, as a few Republicans are beginning to do, but he is worried about the safety of U.S. troops and has written to the Pentagon pressing for improved body armor and vehicle protection.

"I think everyone is on the edge of their seat right now, hoping for the best, but preparing for what comes next," Fitzpatrick said. If the situation does not improve soon, "I think you will see more members of Congress speaking up generally," he said.

Katrina could have bolstered Bush's standing, but instead his response may have weakened his standing in Congress, particularly among lawmakers from the affected Gulf Coast region. Sen. Mary Landrieu of Louisiana, a conservative Democrat who often supported Bush proposals, was outraged to hear White House officials disparage the local response. On ABC's "This Week," she said of Bush, "One more word about it after this show airs and I might likely have to punch him. Literally."

Sen. Trent Lott (R) of Mississippi, who lost his Pascagoula home in the storm, released a statement headlined "I Am Demanding Help for Mississippi." After a blistering critique of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, Lott thanked Bush for his efforts.

Some argue that the hurricane disaster, high fuel prices and continued problems in Iraq will increase chances that Bush will name a centrist, consensus nominee to replace O'Connor.

Even before Katrina hit, Republicans were struggling to keep their agenda on track. They had made little progress with revamping Social Security, but immigration reform was gaining momentum.

Bush and congressional Republicans might argue that soaring gasoline prices and a storm-damaged economy call for tax cuts -- in the name of helping middle-class people fuel their cars and keeping Katrina from slowing the economy, Rothenberg said. House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) said last week that Congress should consider tax cuts as part of a "stimulus package" in response to Katrina.

But Democrats say they are poised to pounce. "If they think they can go forward as if nothing's changed, they do not understand what the rest of America has witnessed over the past week," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), who heads the House Democrats' campaign committee.

Clinton And Bush In Charity Reprise (WP)

By Lisa Rein

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

HOUSTON, Sept. 5 -- Former presidents George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton announced a nationwide fundraising campaign Monday to help the victims of Hurricane Katrina, saying they will bring what they learned from reaching out to tsunami victims halfway around the world to a crisis on their doorstep.

"I guess I could say on behalf of all of us that nothing we can do can be an adequate response to the agony we've seen," Clinton said at a news conference at the Reliant Arena. "The reason we decided to do this, not that we think the governments won't do their part, is we need to have a fund where we can fill in the blanks and help people who otherwise will be totally overlooked," he said. "A lot of people, they have no cars, no homes, nothing."

A dozen members of Congress and local and state officials sat on chairs below the podium, among them former first lady Barbara Bush, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and Texas Gov. Rick Perry (R). In the exhibit hall a floor below, more than 4,000 evacuees were waking up on cots to another day of uncertainty in one of Houston's newest shelters.

The Bush-Clinton Katrina Fund will serve as an umbrella for special funds established by the governors of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama to assist those displaced in their states and will focus on collecting donations to assist in the long-term recovery plan for areas devastated by the storm, officials said.

The former presidents said they hope to step in where government and relief agencies leave off. "The fund will take the outpouring of generosity to the next level," Bush said.

That outpouring has already been substantial. The Chronicle of Philanthropy reported yesterday that $487 million has been raised in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. Corporate donations already were pouring in, including $20 million from Wal-Mart and the Walton Family Foundation, Bush and Clinton said.

With the administration facing public criticism for a slow response to the crisis, there was no sign of friction between the president's father and Clinton. When asked to comment on the criticism of President Bush, his father said: "We can always blame somebody else -- that's one of the things you do after a football game, figure out what went wrong. We're trying to make things better."

Later, on CNN, Clinton said of the hurricane response: "Our government failed those people in the beginning, and I take it now there is no dispute about it. One hundred percent of the people I've talked to here recognize that it was a failure, and I personally believe that there should be a serious analysis of it."

The Red Cross said it has logged 75,000 names on its online registry of hurricane victims staying at shelters in Texas and other states, a database created to help reunite splintered families.

Spokeswoman Tara Lynch also said that the organization has received an unprecedented $404 million in donations as of yesterday morning, much of it from online and telephone donations. She said the agency has opened more than 470 shelters in 12 states and is now helping hurricane victims in 30 states.

Clinton Is An Unexpected Partner In The Hurricane Effort (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney And John M. Broder

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 5 - As President Bush and administration officials fanned out across the Gulf Coast in the White House's campaign to deal with criticism that they had failed in managing the tragedy of Hurricane Katrina, there was one unexpected face in their crowd on Monday: former President Bill Clinton.

Mr. Clinton was at Reliant Center next to the Astrodome in Houston, where about 3,800 homeless New Orleans residents had decamped, standing next to former President George Bush as they announced the creation of the Bush-Clinton Katrina Fund to help hurricane victims. After that, the two former presidents, along with Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, toured the shelter, while President Bush visited storm-struck areas of Mississippi and Louisiana, providing a flow of television images suggesting a concerned White House on the march.

Mr. Clinton's visit to the Houston shelter on Monday is the latest time the former president has come to the current president's aid in his second term, from early in the year when Mr. Bush was criticized for his slow response to the tsunami, to initially defending the administration's response to Hurricane Katrina at the White House last week, to praising the credentials of Judge John G. Roberts Jr., Mr. Bush's choice for the Supreme Court. And it offered what many Democrats described as a vivid, if slightly disconcerting, insight into the complicated and increasingly transactional relationship between the Bush and Clinton families.

While officials in both parties said they had no doubt that both men were first and foremost intent on helping Americans, they also took note of the web of political benefits spun by this burgeoning alliance. It helps Mr. Bush during the roughest time of his presidency, Mr. Clinton as he tries to establish himself as a respected and admired former president and Mrs. Clinton as she potentially prepares to run for president in 2008.

For President Bush, Mr. Clinton's agreement to a request by the White House chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr., to join former President Bush in their second fund-raising project could hardly have been better timed. One of the crucial elements of a White House strategy to help Mr. Bush recover from the rounds of criticism he received in the wake of the disaster in New Orleans was to present him as above politics, and to avoid any kind of political entanglements with Democrats.

"It definitely helps Bush," said Douglas Sosnik, who was White House political director under Mr. Clinton. "Given what has happened to Bush in the last six or seven days, there is not a single aspect of this crisis at all that can be positive to Bush. So anything he can do to get politics out of this - given how vulnerable he is politically - the better for him."

At the same time, the political benefits for the former president and Mrs. Clinton were at least as striking. Mr. Clinton has been engaged in a campaign to establish himself as a respected force in American life after a rather messy departure from the White House, using his foundation for prominent work in the fight against AIDS in Africa.

He is also trying to be less polarizing than he was when he left the White House, an effort to become less of a political weight if, as expected, Mrs. Clinton runs for president, friends said. The presence of Mr. Clinton next to Mr. Bush will make it that much harder, some Democrats said, for Republicans to attack the Clintons.

"Isn't it interesting that Bush realizes he's in trouble and he has to phone President Clinton for cover?" said Bob Mulholland, a Democratic leader from California. "Bush is standing next to President Clinton for cover. You've got all these photos of President Clinton with both Bushes. It's hard for a Republican in the national arena to be attacking the Clintons with these kind of images out there."

White House officials did not respond to a request for comment.

Mr. Clinton's spokesman, Jay Carson, said of Mr. Clinton's involvement: "In a time of crisis like this, it is President Clinton's nature to do everything he can to help victims. His involvement is tied to nothing other than to help the tens of thousands of victims of the hurricane."

Still, the situation was complicated Monday. Mr. Clinton seemed to be struggling to be diplomatic in talking about the administration's response to the hurricane damage. He told CNN that "we failed once, but we don't want to fail a second time." But at times he seemed to be following the political directions of the White House in deferring questions about the past and turning them into questions about the future.

"It's an appropriate thing to look into, but not at this time - they're still finding bodies there," Mr. Clinton said in Houston.

By contrast, Mrs. Clinton was fierce in denouncing the administration, particularly for budget cuts it made to the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

"It was basically taken apart and denied funding," she said. Mrs. Clinton, in an interview, disputed the suggestion that her husband was joining hands with Mr. Bush and Mr. Bush.

"He is no longer in politics," she said. "He is a former president with an enormous amount of influence and just as during the tsunami, he is willing to serve his country. He has expressed strong feelings about the way this has been handled. My role is different. I'm on the front lines dealing with these issues day to day."

In Europe, High-Tech Flood Control, With Nature's Help (NYT)

By William J. Broad

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

On a cold winter night in 1953, the Netherlands suffered a terrifying blow as old dikes and seawalls gave way during a violent storm.

Flooding killed nearly 2,000 people and forced the evacuation of 70,000 others. Icy waters turned villages and farm districts into lakes dotted with dead cows.

Ultimately, the waters destroyed more than 4,000 buildings.

Afterward, the Dutch - realizing that the disaster could have been much worse, since half the country, including Amsterdam and Rotterdam, lies below sea level - vowed never again.

After all, as Tjalle de Haan, a Dutch public works official, put it in an interview last week, "Here, if something goes wrong, 10 million people can be threatened."

So at a cost of some $8 billion over a quarter century, the nation erected a futuristic system of coastal defenses that is admired around the world today as one of the best barriers against the sea's fury - one that could withstand the kind of storm that happens only once in 10,000 years.

The Dutch case is one of many in which low-lying cities and countries with long histories of flooding have turned science, technology and raw determination into ways of forestalling disaster.

London has built floodgates on the Thames River. Venice is doing the same on the Adriatic.

Japan is erecting superlevees. Even Bangladesh has built concrete shelters on stilts as emergency havens for flood victims.

Experts in the United States say the foreign projects are worth studying for inspiration about how to rebuild New Orleans once the deadly waters of Hurricane Katrina recede into history.

"They have something to teach us," said George Z. Voyiadjis, head of civil and environmental engineering at Louisiana State University. "We should capitalize on them for building the future here."

Innovations are happening in the United States as well. California is experimenting with "smart" levees wired with nervous systems of electronic sensors that sound alarms if a weakening levee threatens to open a breach, giving crews time to make emergency repairs.

"It's catching on," said William F. Kane, president of Kane GeoTech Inc., a company in Stockton, Calif., that wires levees and other large structures with failure sensors. "There's a lot of potential for this kind of thing."

While scientists hail the power of technology to thwart destructive forces, they note that flood control is a job for nature at least as much as for engineers. Long before anyone built levees and floodgates, barrier islands were serving to block dangerous storm surges. Of course, those islands often fall victim to coastal development.

"You'll never be able to control nature," said Rafael L. Bras, an environmental engineer at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology who consults on the Venetian project. "The best way is to understand how nature works and make it work in our favor."

In humanity's long struggle against the sea, the Dutch experience in 1953 was a grim milestone. The North Sea flood produced the kind of havoc that became all too familiar on the Gulf Coast last week. When a crippled dike threatened to give way and let floodwaters spill into Rotterdam, a boat captain - like the brave little Dutch boy with the quick finger - steered his vessel into the breach, sinking his ship and saving the city.

"We were all called upon to collect clothes and food for the disaster victims," recalled Jelle de Boer, a Dutch high school student at the time who is now an emeritus professor of geology at Wesleyan University. "Cows were swimming around. They'd stand when they could, shivering and dying. It was a terrible mess."

The reaction was intense and manifold. Linking offshore islands with dams, seawalls and other structures, the Dutch erected a kind of forward defensive shield, drastically reducing the amount of vulnerable coastline. Mr. de Haan, director of the water branch of the Road and Hydraulic Engineering Institute of the Dutch Ministry of Transport, Public Works and Water Management, said the project had the effect of shortening the coast by more than 400 miles.

For New Orleans, experts say, a similar forward defense would seal off Lake Pontchartrain from the Gulf of Mexico. That step would eliminate a major conduit by which hurricanes drive storm surges to the city's edge - or, as in the case of Katrina, through the barriers.

The Dutch also increased the height of their dikes, which now loom as much as 40 feet above the churning sea. (In New Orleans, the tallest flood walls are about half that size.) The government also erected vast complexes of floodgates that close when the weather turns violent but remain open at other times, so saltwater can flow into estuaries, preserving their ecosystems and the livelihoods that depend on them.

The Netherlands maintains large teams of inspectors and maintenance crews that safeguard the sprawling complex, which is known as Delta Works. The annual maintenance bill is about $500 million. "It's not cheap," Mr. de Haan said. "But it's not so much in relation to the gross national product. So it's a kind of insurance."

The 1953 storm also pounded Britain. Along the Thames, flooding killed more than 300 people, ruined farmland and frightened Londoners, whose central city narrowly escaped disaster.

The British responded with a plan to better regulate tidal surges sweeping up the Thames from the North Sea. Engineers designed an attractive barrier meant to minimize interference with the river's natural flow. It went into service in 1982 at Woolwich, about 10 miles east of central London.

Normally, its semicircular gates lie flush to the riverbed in concrete supporting sills, creating no obstacle to river traffic. When the need arises, the gates pivot up, rising as high as a five-story building to block rising waters. The authorities have raised the Thames barrier more than 80 times.

In Venice, the precipitating event was a 1966 flood that caused wide damage and economic loss. The upshot was an ambitious plan known as the Moses Project, named after the biblical parting of the Red Sea. Its 78 gargantuan gates would rest on the floor of the Adriatic Sea and rise when needed to block dangerous tidal surges.

Long debate over the project's merits repeatedly delayed the start of construction until May 2003. Opponents claim that the $4.5 billion effort will prove ineffective while threatening to kill the fragile lagoon in which Venice sits. In theory, the gates are to be completed by 2010.

"People fight doing things like this," said Dr. Bras, of M.I.T. "But when disaster strikes you realize how important it is to think ahead."

Planners did just that in Bangladesh after a 1991 hurricane created huge storm surges that killed more than 130,000 people. World charities helped build hundreds of concrete shelters on stilts, which in recent storms have saved thousands of lives.

In Japan, a continuous battle against flooding in dense urban areas has produced an effort to develop superlevees. Unlike the customary mounds of earth, sand and rock that hold back threatening waters, they are broad expanses of raised land meant to resist breaks and withstand overflows.

The approach being tried in California relies on a technology known as time-domain reflectometry. It works on the same principle as radar: a pulse of energy fired down a coaxial cable bounces back when it reaches the end or a distortion, like a bend or crimp.

Careful measurement of the echoes traveling back along the cable can disclose serious distortions and danger. Dr. Kane, of Kane GeoTech, has installed such a system in the Sacramento River delta, along a levee that is threatening to fail.

Could such a system have saved New Orleans? "It would have given them more information," said Charles H. Dowding, a top expert on the technology at Northwestern University. "The failure of a levee would have been detected." But experts say it is still unclear whether such a warning would have been enough to prevent the catastrophic breaches.

Dr. Bras says sensor technologies for detecting levee failure hold much promise. But he adds that less glamorous approaches, like regular maintenance, may be even more valuable, since prevention is always the best cure.

"We have to learn that things have to be reviewed, revised, maintained and repaired as needed," he said. "To see a city like New Orleans suffer such devastation - some of that was preventable."

He added that no matter how ambitious the coastal engineering, no matter how innovative and well maintained, the systems of levees, seawalls and floodgates were likely to suffer sporadic failures.

"Nature will throw big things at us once in a while," he said. "There's always the possibility that nature will trump us."

Time For A Tough Question: Why Rebuild? (WP)

By Klaus Jacob

It is time to swim against the tide. The direction of public discourse in the wake of Katrina goes like this: First we save lives and provide some basic assistance to the victims. Then we clean up New Orleans. And then we rebuild the city. Most will rightly agree on the first two. But should we rebuild New Orleans, 10 feet below sea level, just so it can be wiped out again?

Some say we can raise and strengthen the levees to fully protect the city. Here is some unpleasant truth: The higher the defenses, the deeper the floods that will inevitably follow. The current political climate is not conducive to having scientific arguments heard before political decisions are made. But not doing so leads to the kind of chaos we are seeing now.

This is not a natural disaster. It is a social, political, human and -- to a lesser degree -- engineering disaster. To many experts, it is a disaster that was waiting to happen. In fact, Katrina is not even the worst-case scenario. Had the eye of the storm made landfall just west of the city (instead of to the east, as it did) the wind speeds and its associated coastal storm surge would have been higher in New Orleans (and lower in Gulfport, Miss.). The city would have flooded faster, and the loss of life would have been greater.

What scientific facts do we need before making fateful political, social and economic decisions about New Orleans's future? Here are just two:

First, all river deltas tend to subside as fresh sediment (supplied during floods) compacts and is transformed into rock. The Mississippi River delta is no exception. In the early to mid-20th century, the Army Corps of Engineers was charged with protecting New Orleans from recurring natural floods. At the same time, the Corps kept the river (and some related canals) along defined pathways. These well-intended defensive measures prevented the natural transport of fresh sediments into the geologically subsiding areas. The protected land and the growing city sank, some of it to the point that it is now 10 feet below sea level. Over time, some of the defenses were raised and strengthened to keep up with land subsidence and to protect against river floods and storm surges. But the defenses were never designed to safeguard the city against a direct hit by a Category 5 hurricane (on the Saffir-Simpson scale) or a Category 4 hurricane making landfall just west of the city.

Second, global sea levels have risen less than a foot in the past century, and will rise one to three feet by the end of this century. Yes, there is uncertainty. But there is no doubt in the scientific community that the rise in global sea levels will accelerate.

What does this mean for New Orleans's future? Government officials and academic experts have said for years that in about 100 years, New Orleans may no longer exist. Period.

It is time to face up to some geological realities and start a carefully planned deconstruction of New Orleans, assessing what can or needs to be preserved, or vertically raised and, if affordable, by how much. Some of New Orleans could be transformed into a "floating city" using platforms not unlike the oil platforms offshore, or, over the short term, into a city of boathouses, to allow floods to fill in the 'bowl' with fresh sediment.

If realized, this "American Venice" would still need protection from the worst of storms. Restoration of mangroves and wetlands between the coast and the city would need to be carefully planned and executed. Much engineering talent would have to go into anchoring the floating assets to prevent chaos during storms. As for oil production, refining and transshipment facilities, buffer zones would have to be established to protect them from the direct onslaught of coastal storm surges.

Many ancient coastal cities of great fame have disappeared or are now shells of their former grandeur. Parts of ancient Alexandria suffered from the subsidence of the Nile delta, and earthquakes and tsunamis toppled the city's famed lighthouse, one of the "Seven Wonders of the Ancient World."

It is time that quantitative, science-based risk assessment became a cornerstone of urban and coastal land-use planning to prevent such disasters from happening again. Politicians and others must not make hollow promises for a future, safe New Orleans. Ten feet below sea level and sinking is not safe. It is time to constructively deconstruct, not destructively reconstruct.

The writer, a geophysicist, is an adjunct professor at Columbia University's School of International and Public Affairs. He teaches and does research on disaster risk management.

'Destroyed' City Clears Out (USAT)

By Patrick O'driscoll

USA Today, September 6, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — An evacuation of this city of 460,000 people was largely complete Monday, though National Guardsmen and Army troops continued searching homes for survivors of Hurricane Katrina — and for an unknown number of dead.

"We have advised people that this city has been destroyed," Deputy Police Superintendent W.J. Riley said. "There is nothing here for them and no reason for them to stay: no food, no jobs, nothing."

There were signs of progress amid the devastation. Repairs were completed on two flood walls that broke last week and allowed floodwaters to gush into New Orleans. Water levels had dropped 1 foot after a day of pumping. Electricity had been restored to some areas.

And for the first time since Katrina struck a week ago, some residents were allowed back into the flooded area to check on their homes. "It's all about salvaging what we can today," said David Jackson, an insurance agent who made it in to Metairie by canoe to retrieve clothes, documents and wedding photos.

Mayor Ray Nagin said the number of deaths in his city could reach 10,000. That would make Katrina the nation's deadliest natural disaster. No state or federal agency has issued an estimate of the death toll, however. The official count of the dead in the five states most directly affected by Katrina stood at 234.

Across the nation, more than a half-million people displaced by the hurricane were trying to restart their lives in strange surroundings. At least 240,000 were in Texas, where Gov. Rick Perry said no more could be accommodated. The American Red Cross said it was caring for 135,000 survivors in 14 states.

In Louisiana, more than 50,000 active-duty and National Guard troops in helicopters, boats and trucks joined in a house-by-house search, plucking survivors from rooftops and locating those who perished. Bodies floated in canals and lay on highways.

Nagin said it could be three months before the city is truly habitable, but that results were beginning to be seen. “We're starting to make the kind of progress that I kind of expected earlier,” he said.

The coordinator of military troops in Louisiana said order had been restored to the city, and he lashed out at suggestions that troops could not get food and rescuers to people because of a lack of cooperation between federal and local officials.

“That's B.S.,” said Lt. Gen. Russel Honore, commander of Joint Task Force Katrina. “There is no red tape.”

President Bush returned to the Gulf Coast areas hit by the disaster for the second time in four days. At a stop in Baton Rouge, Bush said all levels of the government were doing their best.

“Where it's not going right, we're going to make it right,” he said. “This is one of these disasters that will test our soul and test our spirit, but we're going to show the world once again that not only can we survive but we will be stronger … for it.”

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco, who has declined Bush's offer of a federal takeover of the relief operation, denied talk of a rift between officials of the governments involved in the effort. “There is no divide. We're all in this together,” she said.

Meanwhile, the price of gas tied a record in the face of reduced Gulf of Mexico oil production. The national average for regular-grade gas on Monday hit $3.057 a gallon, according to AAA. Adjusted for inflation, that matches the record of $1.417 in March 1981.

2 Orleans Levees Closed (WT/AP)

By Doug Simpson, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 6, 2005

METAIRIE, La. -- Residents of this suburb were allowed to return home briefly to gather possessions as floodwaters started to recede yesterday, and New Orleans' mayor struck a note of optimism as engineers repaired the city's levees.

Almost a third of New Orleans' police force was missing in action, but a caravan of law-enforcement vehicles from across the nation poured into the city to help establish order.

Late yesterday, the Army Corps of Engineers announced that it had repaired two of the city's levees, including the 200-foot-wide breach on the 17th Street Canal. But officials warned that it might take weeks to pump floodwaters from the city.

For the first time in the week since Hurricane Katrina devastated the area, New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin sounded upbeat about the recovery effort.

"We have more troops arriving, so we're starting to make the kind of progress that I kind of expected earlier," Mr. Nagin said.

In suburban Jefferson Parish, a line of cars stretched for miles, as many of the 460,000 residents got their first look at the destruction since being ordered to leave two days before the storm. The towns of Metairie and Kenner suffered heavy flooding, and thousands of homes were damaged.

Katharine Dastugue was overjoyed to find that floodwaters had gone across her lawn but stopped just inches from her doorstep. As she stood waiting for a boat to take her in, she made a list of things she hoped to salvage before being forced to leave again tomorrow.

"If I can just get my kids' baby photos," she said. "You can't replace those."

Estimates of the human toll of the storm were not known, but Mr. Nagin warned yesterday on NBC's "Today" show that "it wouldn't be unreasonable to have 10,000" dead in New Orleans alone.

So far, Louisiana officials have counted 59 deaths from the storm. In Mississippi, officials said Katrina killed 160.

Near Baton Rouge, La., officials opened an emergency morgue with the capacity to hold 5,000 bodies. Officials told Reuters news agency that the facility, installed in a warehouse in St. Gabriel, would be able to process 144 bodies a day with a staff of 100 working in shifts around the clock.

In New Orleans, the mayor said the city had the authority to force residents to evacuate but didn't say whether it was taking that step. Mr. Nagin did, however, say that drinking water will no longer be handed out to residents who refuse to leave.

President Bush yesterday paid his second visit to Louisiana, where he was greeted by an open letter in the New Orleans Times-Picayune, the state's largest newspaper, that called on him to fire every official at the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA).

Meanwhile, the arrival of police reinforcements provided relief to New Orleans' exhausted force. As many as 500 officers on the city's 1,600-member force were unaccounted for, police officials said.

"Some simply left because they said they could not deal with the catastrophe," said Deputy Police Chief W.J. Riley. Officials said officers were being cycled off duty and given five-day vacations in Las Vegas and Atlanta, where they would receive counseling.

Police Superintendent Eddie Compass denied that officers deserted in droves, acknowledging that some officers abandoned their jobs but saying he didn't know how many. Two police officers killed themselves. Another was shot in the head.

Mr. Compass said 150 had to be rescued from 8 feet of water and others had gotten infections from walking through contaminated floodwaters in New Orleans.

"No police department in the history of the world was asked to do what we were asked," Mr. Compass said.

As law-enforcement officials and volunteers search the city for survivors, they encountered a familiar obstacle -- people who have been trapped more than a week in damaged homes yet refused to leave.

"We have advised people that this city has been destroyed," said Deputy Chief Riley, who estimated that fewer than 10,000 residents were still in New Orleans. "There is nothing here for them and no reason for them to stay, no food, no jobs, nothing."

After sheets of metal and repeated helicopter drops of 3,000-pound sandbags succeeded in plugging the gap in the 17th Street Canal, the Corps of Engineers began pumping water back into Lake Pontchartrain. Floodwaters in the city were already receding yesterday, with the low-lying 9th Ward dropping more than a foot.

In Metairie, many residents were happy that the storm spared their homes, but angry that the failure of the levee system left them swamped.

"That's what so devastating, that ... levee breaking," said Bobby Patrick, a resident of the neighborhood now living in Houston. "My home didn't lose a shingle, but it's got six feet of water in it."

Since the storm, rumors had swirled that looters from New Orleans had begun breaking into evacuated homes in Jefferson Parish. Many were relieved to return home yesterday to find their belongings untouched -- and police checkpoints on every major street corner with ID checks for parish residents.

Along with survivors returning to survey the damage to their homes, the roads into the storm-struck region were jammed with volunteers bringing relief.

FEMA has urged Americans to contact nonprofit organizations if they want to volunteer or donate. But some volunteers insisted on independent action.

On Friday, Gary Maclaughlin of Santa Cruz, Calif., flew to Nashville, Tenn., where he bought a used school bus for $2,000. He used his credit card to buy $1,500 worth of diapers, bottled water, granola bars and peanut butter crackers. By Sunday evening, he was driving loads of evacuees from the New Orleans airport to a rescue shelter in Covington, La.

Water, Water Everywhere (WSJ)

By Ann Carrns, Kris Hudson And Dionne Searcey

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

Hurricane Katrina submerged New Orleans and quickly moved on, but draining the historic, low-lying city will be a daunting job sure to go on for weeks, or more likely, months to come.

Officials with the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, which is in charge of repairing the levees, are balking at putting a firm time frame -- or price tag -- on the drainage effort, saying the situation is dynamic and too many variables remain.

Over the weekend, portable pumps began arriving to supplement the city's existing network of permanent pumping stations, known as some of the most powerful in the world. An official with the Corps of Engineers' Mississippi Valley division said at a briefing Sunday in Baton Rouge that it could take between one to three months to drain the water, after all the pumps are operational.

But before the pumps could be used, engineers had to find a way to close several serious breaches in the system of levees and floodwalls meant to protect the city from massive Lake Pontchartrain to the north and the Mississippi River to the south. Otherwise, the water pumped out could flow back into the city.

A storm surge from Hurricane Katrina blew at least five big holes in the levees, inundating New Orleans and some adjoining areas with water a week ago. The levee system was designed to withstand no more than a category-three storm, and Katrina made landfall near New Orleans as a powerful category-four hurricane, overwhelming the system.

Officials said they had had plans in place to repair levees in the event of a breach but added that it's difficult to prepare for the exact conditions and location of a given rupture. The devastation also made it difficult to move repair materials into place.

Flooding nearly obscured a street sign near the 17th Street Canal breach.

"I don't know if you ever anticipate anything to be breached," Al Naomi, an official with the Corps of Engineers in New Orleans, said in a conference call with reporters on Friday. But if a storm hits that exceeds the system's design capacity, "You're going to have problems of some type, whether a breach or overtopping." In response to a question about whether anything was done to fortify levees in the days leading up to storm, Mr. Naomi said: "There's not much you can do in 24 hours, or in 48 hours, to make that situation any better."

By Monday, work was complete on repairs at the 17th Street Canal, which runs along the city's western border and drains into Lake Pontchartrain. Contractors had partially sealed off the canal's entrance to the lake by driving huge sheets of metal into the canal's base.

Work also was completed on repair of the actual breach -- located on the canal's eastern floodwall -- by dumping giant sandbags into it. Once the canal's pumps are working reliably, part of the steel sheets at the canal's entrance will be removed, so that pumped water can flow freely out of the canal into the lake.

At the same time, efforts were under way Monday to restart a major pumping station located near the canal along Interstate 10, which in normal times pumps rainwater out of the city and into the 17th Street Canal. "Now the job at hand is to get the pump station back working, so it can do its job," said Greg Breerwood, deputy district engineer for project management with the Corps of Engineers in New Orleans, in a telephone interview. But work was expected to proceed cautiously to prevent overloading the pumps and further destabilizing the damaged floodwalls. "We're taking it real slow," said Mr. Breerwood.

At 4:10 p.m. Monday, Col. Rich Wagenaar of the Corps of Engineers ordered that one of the main pumps be started at a station along the 17th Street Canal. If the pump keeps running, and the breach plug holds, the draining of New Orleans is under way. "We want to move water," Col. Wagenaar said.

At the London Avenue Canal, where two major breaches occurred, the mouth -- where the canal empties into Lake Pontchartrain -- has been closed off. But the pump on that canal can't be turned on until the breach itself is repaired, and plans for fixing that aren't finalized.

Work has yet to begin on repairing two more breaches along the Industrial Canal, on the city's eastern border, because crews can't get there yet. Contractors have been hired to remove debris that blocks access to the canal.

The Industrial Canal breaches, believed to have occurred in the early hours of the hurricane on Monday, Aug. 29, inundated low-lying neighborhoods in the eastern part of New Orleans and adjoining areas. Water from those neighborhoods has been draining on its own, flowing back through the breach into the canal.

Farther to the east of New Orleans, in flooded St. Bernard Parish, and to the southeast, in Plaquemines Parish, the Corps of Engineers hired contractors to make new breaches in levees over the weekend, to help drain the area. Pumps were assisting the drainage in St. Bernard, but not in Plaquemines due to high water, officials at the Sunday briefing said.

By Boat Through A Water World (WP)

By Manuel Roig-franzia

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 5 -- The bad places stink. Musty. Gassy. Spoiled and rotting.

DOJ_NMG_0002668

It's the smell of the swamp. And New Orleans is a swamp now, transformed in just eight days from the funkiest of gems into a wild place, a place of black waters, snakes, and spooky, echoing abandonment. Fires burn throughout the city on the surface of oil-slicked water that reaches -- with its spreading algae -- up to the streetlights in some neighborhoods.

There are entire swaths of New Orleans where no one can go without a boat, or hip waders, or foolish courage. But a few go anyway, searching for stranded pets or stranded neighbors, or both. The city -- the worst parts, at least, the deeply flooded east -- is best approached by water.

On the choppy surface of Pontchartrain, the giant lake that poured into the streets with such persisting ferocity, New Orleans looks like a walled medieval city. The huge levees built to keep water out now keep water in.

Edging along the giant lake's shore and poking through myriad canals reveal a netherworld of destruction and vigilantism in some of the city's toughest-to-reach sectors. To the west, a man with a shotgun guarded condominiums at the shredded Orleans Marina. Farther down the shore, a stockbroker slogged through waist-high water, carrying a whimpering pit bull. Way out east, a Catholic-Buddhist-transcendentalist prayed at an altar and took instructions from her long-dead father.

At a boat launch just west of the city, Mike Fitzpatrick wanted what everyone here wanted: a boat ride to get to his guns. He was lucky. He hopped into a little flatboat with a small group of reporters and pointed down the shore toward the smoldering Orleans Marina, where his cache of weapons lay hidden.

The ride took him past the Southern Yacht Club, on the city's western edge. It is charred, a blackened skeleton, overlooking a point pushing into Lake Pontchartrain where New Orleans teenagers would go to make out, using the code words that they were "off to watch the submarine races." Fitzpatrick, a riverboat pilot who people around here call a "Y'at" -- shorthand for the city's signature greeting, "Where y'at?" -- shook his head and grabbed for a ringing cell phone.

"It sunk?" he said to a fellow boat owner, floating past sailboats tossed onto decks and laid out like fallen dominoes. "Was it insured? Ah, good."

Across the marina from Fitzpatrick's place, a 30-foot yacht perched perfectly on top of pilings, 10 feet above the waterline. It was an incredible sight. A storm that treated New Orleans so roughly seemed to lift this boat into the air and then put it down with the most gentle touch -- barely harmed.

Not far away, heavy helicopters ferrying 7,000-pound duffel bags full of sand thundered down to the 17th Street Canal -- the great villain of Hurricane Katrina, with its 500 feet of broken levee that allowed thousands of homes to be engulfed before the gap was closed Monday.

Watching from a nearby bridge, Kenny Crumholt, a resident engineer with the Army Corps of Engineers, remembered the first sandbags dropped in days ago, the ones that disappeared beneath the surface, demonstrating the depth of the chasm. "We would drop them and they would sink," Crumholt said. "We were getting aggravated."

Along the canal, the fortunate -- the ones who live on the opposite side of the levee break, the ones whose houses are dry -- have built ladders out of old crates to watch the progress, or lack thereof. "If this would have broke on our side, it would have been all over for us," Sherry Blue said.

About a mile down shore, Renee Pastor -- a fast-talking redhead with a stubborn streak -- floated into the Orleans Outfall Canal on a rumbling powerboat for a rescue mission. She had to save her dogs left behind by an evacuating pet sitter, and she had to find Mr. McCobb, an elderly neighbor gone missing.

Pastor brought help -- serious help. Dale Coon, sunburned and sporting a barbed-wire tattoo on his left arm, stepped out of her boat and climbed up the canal levee, stuffing a .38 Special and .357 magnum into his pants front.

"That's one good thing about being from a family of rednecks," Pastor said. "Everybody's got guns."

After Pastor and Coon waded through a street turned pond to collect her bulldog, Chance, and her chubby Labrador, Max, they set off to find Mr. McCobb. Pastor's neighborhood of million-dollar homes, all backing up to a private park, was covered with foul, inky water. The rotten-egg stench of broken gas mains scented their slog past the oil fire, the house burned to its foundation, the submerged park, the BMW flooded to its rooftop.

Her house -- just renovated with pricey Asian flourishes -- sits on a virtual island neighborhood called Lake Vista, bounded on three sides by Lake Pontchartrain, Bayou St. John and the Orleans Canal. Pastor carried a slip of paper with an address, but navigating streets she once knew so well became a series of stops and starts. The water contorted all perceptions, toyed with her sense of direction.

"Go left, big ol' snake there," Coon called out.

The little rescue party, wearing the post-Katrina fashion statement of plastic pants with bootees that go over their shoes and suspenders, veered quickly. Water moccasins, among the deadliest of snakes, have been spotted in the city, and no one wanted to wait around to see if this was one of them.

The snake detour took them to a little white, wooden house. Pastor made everyone stop. "He might be hiding in there with a gun," she said.

"Hellooooo! We're here to help you. Don't shoot," she said, easing toward the house.

Coon turned detective.

"He ain't gone," he said. "Look."

In the driveway lay a survivalist's arsenal: two transistor radios, a cell phone, a half-empty bottle of Napa Valley zinfandel, tobacco, a pipe and some blackberry soda.

Coon stooped and picked up four shiny cylinders: shells from a .22 magnum. "Ain't been long since this been shot," he said, drawing a deep whiff. "He ain't gone. He's hiding. Freaked out. Scared."

Pastor yelled out again: "I'm coming in. Don't shoot. Don't shoot."

Inside the house, her calls went unanswered. Two guns and a pile of knives sat on a table by the door. But no Mr. McCobb.

Thousands Return To Jefferson Parish (LAT)

By David Zucchino

The Los Angeles Times, September 6, 2005

GRETNA, La. — When she saw the ruins of her beloved garden and realized that her prized koi had died in their own pond, Helene Dinh let out a tiny sob, then fell into the arms of her son-in-law.

"Oh, my fish . . . oh, oh, oh," she said, and the tears came.

Dinh, a tiny, spare woman of 61, had forced herself to return at dawn today to her brick ranch house in sprawling Jefferson Parish on New Orleans' southern edge. She had fled just before the parish was lashed by winds and floodwaters from Hurricane Katrina. Now, she said, she wished she had never made the trip back.

"It hurts so much to see this," she said, staring at a tree that had slammed down across her frontyard.

Dinh was among tens of thousands of parish residents allowed to inspect their homes for the first time since the hurricane struck one week earlier. Thousands came supplied with coolers crammed with food and water to sustain them until Thursday, when parish sheriff's deputies will force everyone to leave again.

The parish's temporary return offer, which was criticized by some parish officials as too dangerous, began at 6 a.m. sharp, when police removed cruisers that had blocked a four-lane highway at the western edge of the parish. An estimated 20,000 to 30,000 returning residents, most of whom slept in their cars on the highway Sunday night, sped into the township in a race to their homes that resembled a 19th century land rush.

Swerving past toppled trees and downed power lines, most found their homes intact. The parish, the second largest in the state with 480,000 residents, was spared the widespread flooding that left more than 80% of adjacent New Orleans underwater. About 15% of the parish was flooded, said parish Councilman Chris Roberts.

Although some homes are underwater, Roberts said, most are intact. Thousands lost sections of roofs and siding, and many were struck by falling trees and limbs. Electricity, phones and water have been knocked out, and stores have been looted. Even so, the scale of destruction and displacement was far less than in New Orleans.

The residents' return came as parish officials were condemning the Federal Emergency Management Agency and other national and state relief organizations for failing to offer assistance. Today, a week after Katrina hit land, the parish still has not received outside help, officials said, and is relying on municipal and volunteer assistance.

For instance, outside a Best Buy store, residents who had remained in their homes lined up today for food, water and supplies provided by a Hazard, Ky., radio station and the sheriff's department.

The parish decided to let residents return until Thursday to check their homes and retrieve belongings so that workers can move into neighborhoods for cleanup and repairs. There is a 6 p.m. curfew each night.

One of the first to arrive back home at first light today was Mike Buclalan, 29, Dinh's son-in-law. He pulled his grey Mitsubishi Montero SUV, loaded with three dachshunds and supplies, into the driveway of his one-story home on Bonnie Ann Drive.

His wife, Marie, rushed inside, searching for their cat, Harry Potter. The animal ran across her path and she scooped him up. "He looks fine," she said. "Just a little frazzled."

The house was fine, too, for the most part. Its roof and siding were intact, though the backyard fence had been blown over. A powerful stench rose up from the meat rotting in the kitchen freezer.

"Oh, man, I'm pretty happy," Mike Buclalan said, inspecting the living room. "I'd have to say I'm pleasantly surprised. It could've been a lot worse."

The damage was worse at Dinh's home a few miles away, where water had been blown into her living room and her elaborate backyard garden was a wreck.

It was Dinh's second time as a refugee. She had come to the United States in 1975 as a refugee from Vietnam.

When her husband died in 1984, gardening had become her therapy, she said. But now her lemon and persimmon trees had been crushed. Her six dead koi were belly up in her pond, smelling strongly of decay.

She couldn't find her four cats, and she broke down again and sobbed.

But later, two of her cats, Tabby and Meow-Meow, crept into the yard. Dinh let out a cry and said, "Tabby, you came home!"

Buclalan tried to console his mother-in-law, mentioning that her orchids had survived.

"All in all, we did OK," he said. "All we asked for was four walls and a ceiling. We're lucky."

Evacuees Allowed Back, For Half A Day (USAT)

By Patrick O'Driscoll

USA Today, September 6, 2005

METAIRIE, La. — Mary Salassi rocks on the porch swing at her son Henry's house as he and his brother-in-law wade a borrowed kayak into three feet of water on West Livingston Place. Dipping wooden paddles meant for stirring a crawfish-boiling pot, they row off toward Salassi's flooded town house, several blocks away.

“I'm not going to worry about it,” she says. “You can't go back and look at what happened. You have to go forward. Like I told my children and grandchildren: You have your family.”

Salassi turned 66 a week ago, the day Hurricane Katrina demolished much of southern Louisiana and Mississippi. “They all said, ‘You're never going to forget this birthday,' ” she muses. “My life's upside down, but I will come back.”

The Salassis were among the first evacuees allowed back to the western and southern suburbs of New Orleans on Monday, having driven all the way from Houston late Sunday. Through Thursday, Jefferson Parish is opening a 12-hour window — 6 a.m. to 6 p.m. CT — for hundreds of thousands to visit their storm-tossed neighborhoods, assess damage and grab a few belongings.

Then the people of Jefferson, whose 435,000 residents make it Louisiana's second-largest parish after New Orleans, must leave. Dubbed “residents-in-exile” by parish council president Aaron Broussard, they won't be allowed home again until power, water and other key services are restored. That could take weeks. Which is better than the months it may take in parts of New Orleans next door.

Most who endured several miles of bumper-to-bumper traffic to get into Jefferson Parish early Monday found that neighborhoods were wind-blown and shredded but dry or only damp; the high waters have receded.

But in Old Metairie, an enclave amid elegantly gnarled oaks on the west doorstep of New Orleans, the murky, sewage-tinged soup is still five feet deep in places.

“We're the highest point along what's called Metairie Ridge. We're where you run to in a flood,” says Newell Normand, the parish's chief deputy sheriff. That was before a now-infamous levee on the 17th Street Canal, which straddles the Jefferson-Orleans boundary, gave way hours after Katrina passed.

"I'm told that the 17th Street Canal pump will go on today, but I've been told a lot of things over the past week that didn't work out," adds Normand, who has been set up at an emergency command post still without power.

Old Metairie borders the canal, whose breach inundated much of New Orleans and eastern Jefferson Parish. It turned a natural occurrence of extremely bad weather into the worst disaster in U.S. history.

"It's a man mistake, not the hurricane," Salassi says.

Whatever the blame, residents who trickle into the neighborhood bring chain saws, boats, generators and rental trucks. Those who haven't left town drift over to a relief center at the Sam's Club parking lot off Airline Highway. National Guard troops in green camouflage have been paired with sheriff's deputies to direct traffic and keep the peace at major intersections.

Despite uncounted fallen trees and thousands of downed power lines, most returnees are able to drive home. Others have to wade or paddle.

David Jackson, an Allstate insurance agent, has come from LaPlace, La., to fetch clothes, documents and wedding photos from a house swamped with two feet of water.

"I came here in a pair of flip-flops and shorts, and my son's track coach lent me a pair of boots and a boat," says Jackson, 43. He glances down at the green rubber footwear and does a double-take. "Two left boots!" he laughs. "But right now, they're the best boots in town."

After three trips in a flat-bottomed Cajun canoe called a pirogue, Jackson loads his pickup and sets out. "It's all about salvaging what we can today," he says. "My family was the most important priority. From tomorrow on, it'll be probably 10- to 12-hour days minimum for me" as he sorts out insurance claims for his clients.

Michael Norton, a computer consultant, drove in from Austin and found two feet of water, too, and a toppled tree. "I had a contract out to take down the pecan tree in my back yard," says Norton, 38. "Too late." And it missed his house. Other homes haven't been so lucky.

Slung over Norton's shoulder is a shotgun. His friend, Dan Sanders, 38, packs a pistol on his belt. "We were expecting the worst," Sanders explains, noting reports of violence spilling out of New Orleans. After half of Oakwood Shopping Mall, on the parish's West Bank, was ransacked and torched last week, tension has spiked in the suburbs. A spray-painted sign in a West Bank neighborhood warns: "U LOOT — WE SHOOT."

But the sheriff's office says the return of residents has gone fairly smoothly. "We haven't had too many problems — yet," Normand says.

As electricity has been restored sporadically, a few older homes have caught fire, probably from old or faulty wiring, he says. More ominous: reports of carbon monoxide poisoning deaths among families who rode out Katrina and fired up gas-powered generators after losing power. "The water surrounded the houses, and they brought their portable generators inside," Normand explains.

Back in Old Metairie, Maria Maginnis, 38, sits in the cab of the family SUV, eager to leave after having been carried piggy-back by her husband, David, through waist-high water to their split-level on Atherton Drive.

"I didn't want to come," she says, dread still in her voice. She laments the condition of her house, which might not be home again for months. "All the sewage," she says. "I didn't expect that."

They first had fled to Nacogdoches, Texas, then drifted closer — first to Beaumont, Texas, then Baton Rouge, the Louisiana capital about an hour west of here. On Monday, they arrived before 3 a.m. Maria stayed in the car at first while David, with flashlight and waders, slogged down the block in the dark.

"The anxiety of seeing your house is what is driving you," David says. "I wanted to do some preliminary checks so it wouldn't be such a shock when the sun came up. Regardless of what shape you find it in, it's a relief."

After sunrise, the couple surveyed a foot of water in the house. They stayed only long enough to grab a few essentials: baseballs and bats, a football, a New Orleans Saints T-shirt, a PlayStation, children's books, and Swimmy, the pet blue fighting fish for sons Cade, 8, and Connor, 4.

"The main thing for us is the kids," explains David, 39, who works for a major Louisiana fresh-tuna supplier. "They're separated from their friends, their everyday activities, their school. The waiting list for schools is incredible."

For Maria, the visit has lasted long enough. "I don't want to come back until it's livable," she says. "I am so ready to go."

Services Providing Oil, Phones And Electric Restarting (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

USA Today, September 6, 2005

Gulf Coast oil production rigs and refineries shuttered by Hurricane Katrina began to ease their way back into operation over the holiday weekend in moves expected to help relieve U.S. price run-ups and fears of shortages.

Yet facilities generating 70% of the oil and more than half of the natural gas in the Gulf of Mexico remain closed down, the U.S. Minerals Management Service said.

And though several Gulf Coast refineries restarted or were poised to do so this week, four others that account for more than 5% of U.S. capacity were expected to remain shut for weeks or months.

The halting progress was emblematic of the slow-but-steady rejuvenation of the infrastructure — utility lines, ports and oil pipelines — underpinning the hurricane-ravaged region.

Oil producers such as ExxonMobil are resuming production that was halted when they evacuated offshore workers in preparation for Katrina. The gulf's rich supply of 4,000 offshore oil-and-gas operations, linked to land by 33,000 miles of pipelines, account for more than 25% of U.S. oil production.

As much as 92% of the gulf's oil production was shut when the storm hit more than a week ago, helping push benchmark crude-oil futures to record prices.

Meanwhile, several key refineries were relaunching. Marathon Oil's 245,000-barrel-a-day refinery in Garyville, La., restarted last week and was expected to be at full capacity by today, company spokeswoman Linda Casey said. Motiva Enterprises' 235,000-barrel-a-day refinery in Convent, La., has restarted. Two Norco, La., facilities — a 225,000-barrel-a-day Motiva plant and a Valero Energy refinery — were to restart by midweek.

The Louisiana Offshore Oil Port, a critical facility for unloading and distributing imported crude oil on the gulf, said it's operating at about 75% of capacity after power was restored at its Clovelly, La., storage facility. It's expected to be at full capacity in a week.

But four refineries southeast of New Orleans and in Mississippi were hit more severely and it wasn't clear when they would restart. Those include Chevron's 325,000-barrel-a-day facility in Pascagoula, Miss., and ConocoPhillips' 255,000-barrel-day facility in Belle Chasse, La.

Key oil pipelines that closed down in advance of the storm are also ramping up, said the Association of Oil Pipe Lines. The Colonial Pipeline, which transports refined oil from Houston to New York City, is at 80% capacity.

Two crude-oil pipelines that run from the gulf to Illinois and from Texas to the Southeast are at 75% and 50% of capacity.

About 1 million customers in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama were still without power late Monday, down from 2.7 million when the hurricane struck, the Energy Department said.

Entergy has restored power to key sites in New Orleans after restarting its Market Street substation. Those include part of the French Quarter and the lights on the Crescent City Connection bridges.

"We're hoping the lighting will give people hope that the city's coming back," company spokesman Chanel Lagarde said.

Entergy was also close to restoring power to two key water pumps so city and federal workers could begin draining the city of much of its standing water.

It will be two to four weeks before power is completely restored in outlying counties, Lagarde said. Parts of New Orleans will remain dark for months.

Gulf ports are major gateways for exports of wheat and soybeans and imports of steel, rubber and coffee, handling about 25% of U.S. cargo.

The lower Mississippi River opened during the weekend for barges or shallow-depth ships that can carry low volumes of products such as grain or coal. That means those vessels can offload materials for transfer to larger ships headed to the Midwest.

Among the reopened ports was the Port of Mobile in Alabama. But two key facilities, the Port of New Orleans and the Port of Southern Louisiana, are expected to remain closed for weeks.

About 1.1 million customers in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama are without service. That's down from 1.7 million after Katrina hit, BellSouth spokesman Jeffrey Battcher said.

About 90% of the outages are in hard-hit New Orleans and Gulfport, where it could take four to six months to restore service.

"We've got central offices completely destroyed," Battcher said.

Meanwhile, Verizon Wireless, Cingular Wireless and Sprint Nextel say cellular phone service has largely been restored in the Baton Rouge, Biloxi and Jackson metropolitan areas.

Although progress has been made in New Orleans, with some cell towers operating, service is still spotty, the companies say.

Utility Crews Help Turn Lights Back On In Parts Of The Gulf Region (NYT)

By Barnaby J. Feder

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

JACKSON, Miss., Sept. 5 - Randall W. Helmick, the man whose job it is to get the lights back on in New Orleans and many other parts of Louisiana and southern Mississippi, had finally reached his limit.

So on Friday afternoon he ordered the televisions turned off in the temporary command center for Entergy, the power company for 1.1 million households and businesses that lost electricity in Hurricane Katrina. The news reports were not helping Mr. Helmick's 100-plus-member team concentrate on coordinating the efforts of thousands of repair workers scattered over hundreds of square miles.

"The focus of the news coverage was on the disaster in New Orleans, and it was depressing and distracting people," Mr. Helmick said. "There was nothing we could do to get the power on in New Orleans, and I saw it draining people's energy."

This week the TV's are back on, but so are many more lights - over half of Entergy's affected customers by Monday evening, mainly in places well away from New Orleans. And even in New Orleans itself, the company had restored some power by nightfall Monday, including to the Convention Center, the warehouse district and the docks where cruise ships tie up. Electricity was also flowing to some parts of the French Quarter, Harrah's Casino and a few hotels near Canal Street. Entergy sent its first work crews into the city on Sunday to see how much could be restored using equipment that had not been flooded and the underground part of the network, made to withstand flooding.

But no one should expect electricity soon elsewhere in New Orleans, said Mr. Helmick, who works behind a plain table adorned with a makeshift sign, "Storm Boss."

"It will be extremely slow going because the rest is underwater or reliant on overhead distribution lines that were heavily damaged," he said. "Now we face some key decisions on whether to focus more resources on the city or the surrounding areas."

Working from an Entergy training center in Jackson, 180 miles north of New Orleans, Mr. Helmick does not want or expect his colleagues to ignore the plight of the company's home city, where Entergy's 22-story headquarters building near the Superdome is a prominent landmark. After all, he and about 1,600 Entergy employees, normally based in or near New Orleans, had to evacuate - leaving homes, relocating families - the weekend before Hurricane Katrina struck. Mr. Helmick's family is now in Baton Rouge, La., but some of his colleagues have moved theirs as far away as Atlanta.

The best thing Entergy could do for New Orleans, Mr. Helmick said, was to restore service as quickly as possible to cities like Jackson and Baton Rouge that have been absorbing refugees. That recovery approach follows traditional utility practice: focus on restoring vital public services where possible and otherwise rebuild by expanding outward from the parts of the power grid still functioning.

Mr. Helmick says he thinks of himself as an air traffic controller rather than a field general. To restore Entergy's power grid as rapidly as possible, the efforts of its distribution companies in Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi and Texas most be coordinated with the repair of transmission lines and substations.

The amount of power Entergy generates at its plants must be carefully balanced with the network's ability to deliver it. And the effort requires management of outside resources like the thousands of temporary repair workers from other utility companies or from contractors who specialize in disaster recovery.

Although bristling with phones and PC's, Mr. Helmick's improvised command center belies the years of thought and practice behind Entergy's response. Not only had the company rehearsed its hurricane plan in April, as it does every year, but it had specifically practiced for a storm landfall near New Orleans.

On Saturday, Aug. 27, the day before the storm bore down on New Orleans, more than half the employees in the city were told via e-mail and Web notices not to come to work on Monday and to take whatever steps were necessary to protect their families.

Most of the rest were told to leave the city but stay in touch. The core group of storm managers went to Jackson while other senior managers were dispatched to Baton Rouge and Little Rock, Ark.

But last spring's drills did not anticipate several realities, including the flooding in New Orleans, the civil unrest and the delays in obtaining thousands of workers from other companies, who were still repairing the damage Katrina had caused in Florida. At no time did the company dream it would become more than temporarily homeless itself, and have to determine what to do with thousands of displaced employees.

Last Sunday, Entergy acknowledged that it may be a corporate refugee for months and announced that J. Wayne Leonard, the chief executive, and other senior managers would establish temporary headquarters 10 miles west of here in Clinton, Miss. Entergy is moving to the posh campus that was the headquarters of the telecommunications giant WorldCom before it collapsed in an accounting scandal.

Mr. Leonard vowed to return eventually to New Orleans but said that he had no idea when that would be possible.

In some respects, Entergy has never performed better. As of Monday evening, the company had reconnected 575,000 customers - more than twice as many customers as it handled in July after a tropical storm, Cindy. The reconnected include vital oil refineries and nearly all of its major commercial customers north of New Orleans. But Katrina's impact was so much more extensive than its predecessors that more than 500,000 customers are still without power.

Those still without power include customers in rural areas where days of work may add only a few users, those too flooded to receive power and those like the refineries downriver from New Orleans where Entergy workers must traverse treacherous marshes.

Within New Orleans, where Entergy is also the natural gas utility, the company is just beginning the painstaking and potentially hazardous task of inspecting and repairing its gas distribution network. The system is functional but is likely to have developed potentially deadly leaks.

In Jackson, where 20 percent of Entergy customers still lack power, hundreds of maintenance crews converge each night on the sprawling parking lot around the Coliseum and the adjoining exhibition center.

Inside the exhibition hall, not far from where the Red Cross provides food and clothing to refugees, Entergy's caterer serves dinner for thousands. Buses ferry the workers to the hotels, church campgrounds and other facilities in which Entergy houses the repair crews. During the weekend, more than 100 men were sleeping on cots in abandoned office cubicles of the largely empty WorldCom campus.

Entergy has hired more than 10,000 workers from other utilities and contractors, all of whom must be trained to work on its network. So far, according to Entergy, the only serious casualty has been an employee of Air2, a contractor based in Timonium, Md., who was crushed last week while handling 75-foot transmission poles.

The workers often arrive in convoys, like the 47 repair vehicles from FirstEnergy, a utility holding company in Akron, Ohio, that pulled into the Coliseum parking lot Saturday. The group arrived from Florida, where it had spent nine days repairing storm damage.

Local Entergy officials like Haley Fisackerly have been scrambling for fuel and other resources required to keep the crews working. On Friday, Mr. Fisackerly learned that a local contractor had photocopied an Entergy letter, which authorizes fuel priority for the contractor's firm, and given it to family members to help them jump gas lines. That led to a hasty redesign of the authorization form to thwart such finagling.

The need to prevent theft once fuel has been acquired is one of many reasons Entergy has found itself requiring far more security workers than anticipated. "We're all running on adrenaline," said Mr. Fisackerly. "People realize there's a worse disaster farther south, so we are trying to fend for ourselves."

According to out-of-state repair workers, that awareness has also made Entergy's customers in this region some of the most grateful they have encountered. "One guy came out and said he wanted to give me a great big hug," said Randy Myers, a contract line repairman from Wyalusing, Pa. "That's not the reception we get on Long Island."

Inside City, The Deluge Came After The Storm (USAT)

Those who stayed in New Orleans describe initial relief followed by desperation

NEW ORLEANS — The fall of New Orleans was a catastrophe with an added cruelty: hours of false hope, when it seemed the city had been spared the worst, not doomed to a sodden grave.

By noon last Monday, people thought the crisis had passed; by noon the next day, they knew it had just begun.

In between came that moment of exquisite horror when each person still in the city grasped that destruction would come not by great wind or mighty wave, but by water rising inch by inch.

Deborah Caldwell, cowering in her attic, realized there was no way to go but up.

Twanda Otis looked out a second-story window and saw water a few feet below.

Pat Thomas stepped outside for a rake and found she needed a dam.

They didn't know that a 20-foot chunk had burst out of the levee along the 17th Street Canal and that Lake Pontchartrain was filling their city like a soup bowl. They did know this: It was time for fight and flight.

So Caldwell grasped her only implements of escape: an ax and a household hammer. Otis, hugging her newborn, stepped uncertainly into a wobbly boat. Thomas waded off into chest-deep water polluted with who-knew-what.

At dawn Sunday, Aug. 28, Hurricane Katrina was 24 hours from New Orleans. It was a Category 5 hurricane with sustained winds as strong as 160 mph and a potential storm surge 25 feet high — easily enough to top the levees and flood walls that keep water from the city.

For decades, engineers had feared that New Orleans' flood controls weren't sufficient to withstand anything stronger than a Category 3 hurricane. The city sat largely below sea level, surrounded by the Mississippi River, the Gulf of Mexico and Lake Pontchartrain, a huge tidal basin.

The city was like the little pig who built his house from straw. Years ago, James Lee Witt, then director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, had asked, “What do you do about New Orleans?”

What would New Orleans do about Katrina? About 80% of its people had left or were leaving.

This is the story of three who stayed.

Caldwell, 44, a casino employee, holed up with her family in her stilt-legged shotgun house not far from the Superdome. She was motivated by a desire to stay put and by a religious fatalism: She was a Christian. She trusted the Lord. She didn't have a problem dying, if it came to that.

Otis, 20, a cook at the Bourbon Street restaurant Remoulade, had two good reasons to leave: her baby, Richard, born seven days earlier, and her 5-year-old son, Philip. She, her children, her boyfriend and nine relatives packed into a van and tried to get out of town Sunday morning. They never made it through a snarl of traffic. Finally, they turned back.

Thomas, 62, a retired school counselor, knew that hurricanes nearly always missed the city and never flooded her Carrollton neighborhood, whose stately homes had withstood a century of storms. So she decided to stay with her dog, Ginger.

On Sunday night, as Katrina closed in, she had rice and beans and a big bottle of wine with a few other neighbors who stayed behind. They were sure they could beat the storm.

That's New Orleans: Laissez les bon temps rouler. Let the good times roll.

Before dawn Monday, Katrina had weakened slightly, picking up drier air from the west, and dropped to Category 4. Even better, the storm began turning just east of New Orleans, perhaps sparing it from the worst storm surge.

About 10 a.m., Katrina passed 35 miles east of the city. Winds above 100 mph battered downtown; Pontchartrain, normally a foot above sea level, rose 3 feet. Water began spilling over some flood walls and levees, but they held.

By lunch, the worst of the storm had passed. While some neighborhoods had flooded, particularly along the south side of Pontchartrain, many areas, including the historic French Quarter, had been spared serious water damage.

"The thing we're happy about is that there wasn't as much loss of life or property damage as there might have been," FEMA spokesman James McIntyre said. Some officials were talking about a relatively quick rebound, but McIntyre warned: "This is still a dangerous situation."

On its website, the Army Corps of Engineers, which maintains the levees, declared: "The fact that Katrina … didn't cause more damage is a testament to the structural integrity of the hurricane levee protection system."

Caldwell's house survived the storm. There was some water in the street Monday, but when the family retired for the evening, they had phone service, running water and plenty of food.

Otis and her children rode out the storm at her parents' house, which was undamaged. There seemed little reason for fear. Everyone thought the worst had passed.

At dinnertime, Thomas and her neighbors celebrated their good luck with a New Orleans feast of blackened fish and shrimp cakes.

But New Orleans' armor had begun to crack.

The water level on Pontchartrain had peaked 7 feet above sea level early Monday afternoon. A levee had failed on the city's east side. By late afternoon, water had climbed to the tops of the walls of some one-story homes near the canal, forcing residents to their roofs.

After nightfall, water broke through a flood wall atop a levee along the 17th Street Canal, a main drainage outlet into Pontchartrain. Water from the swollen lake had been pouring over the wall all day, eating away the earthen levee that holds it up. Finally, a 20-foot chunk of the wall burst forward. The rushing water crumbled an additional 400 feet of flood wall.

The corps said it might use barges to block the breaches, or helicopters to fill the holes by dropping sandbags, stone, even Jersey barriers into them — but there was no way to do anything until the next morning's light.

All night, Pontchartrain drained unchecked into the city.

Tuesday morning, it became clear that New Orleans' good fortune had been fool's gold.

Water began to rise through the floorboards of Caldwell's one-story home, forcing everyone into the attic with clothes, fruit, water, flashlights and a bucket, partly filled with water, for a toilet.

The water downstairs was 3 feet deep and rising. Reality was starting to kick in. It was survival time, Caldwell realized.

She and the others chopped a hole through the steeply pitched roof. They took turns poking their heads out and waving a white towel at helicopters passing overhead: FEMA, Red Cross, the military. None indicated it had seen her.

Finally, Caldwell and her 19-year-old son eased into the oily water. Using ice chests, they floated from porch to porch to the end of the block, where they latched onto a chain-link fence and moved along it to dry land. They flagged down a boat. After a night at an open-field camp for evacuees, they were on a bus to Houston.

When Otis and her children drove to her aunt's home nearby, there was ankle-deep water on the street outside her second-floor apartment. Soon, it had climbed halfway up the first floor.

Her father took a boat from a fire station around the corner. Otis stuffed one bag with Pampers and another with baby formula and bottled water. Clinging to her children, Otis got in the boat and floated off. They reached dry land, eventually walked to the Superdome and later boarded a bus to the Houston Astrodome.

Thomas awoke Tuesday well-rested and ready to clean up the windblown mess outside. But when she opened her door, she thought, "Oh my God! What is this?" Water, which had covered only the street the previous night, had risen over the sidewalk and was lapping at the third of her five front steps.

Thomas knew it was time to move to higher ground. She had the keys to another house but had to walk in water up to her chest for several blocks to get there.

Over the next few days, she lost telephone service and running water. A nearby drugstore was looted. There were gunshots at night and no sign of police.

Thomas wanted to leave, but if she was going to catch a bus out of town, she would have to leave Ginger behind. Then she ran into a neighbor who had a car in a garage downtown. If they could get to it, they would drive to Baton Rouge.

A journalist offered her a ride downtown. So early Friday morning, Thomas loaded Ginger into the car for a circuitous drive through storm-damaged neighborhoods. Soon, they passed the convention center, where a vast, vaguely threatening-looking throng waited for evacuation buses.

Then there was a reassuring sign ahead: a police car at the curb. As she passed it, Thomas saw that the cruiser was battered, abandoned and stripped of its tires.

Laissez les bon temps rouler. The old city's motto had become its epitaph.

US Prepares To House Hurricane Victims (FT)

By Joshua Chaffin, Sheila McNulty And Dan Roberts

Financial Times, September 6, 2005

Authorities as far away as Utah and Detroit are preparing to house evacuees from Hurricane Katrina for many months, as the US grapples with the longer term implications of relocating hundreds of thousands of refugees.

While rescuers try to assess a regional death toll estimated by the New Orleans mayor at up to 10,000, it is becoming clear that the next phase of the tragedy may involve an exodus of people unparalleled in modern American history. "We are basically moving the city of New Orleans to other parts of the country," said Michael Chertoff, secretary of homeland security. "This is a tremendous medium-term and long-term challenge."

The Federal Emergency Management Agency, which is co-ordinating the various agencies involved, said it was too early to tell how many people were involved. But based on the demographics of the region, it estimated more than 1m would need help moving from temporary shelters to longer-term housing.

As refugees began to fan out across the country, President George W. Bush on Monday declared emergencies in states far from the storm, including Utah, Colorado, Georgia and North Carolina. The emergency declarations made federal aid available to help those states deal with the thousands left homeless.

But efforts to co-ordinate the relief strategy are also complicated by resistance among many of those affected, who worry about what awaits them.

"They don't tell you what you're going to do or how you're going to live when you get there," said Darrell Johnson, a cook from New Orleans now sheltering in Baton Rouge. Elsewhere, victims of the storm evacuated to Houston said they were worried about being forced to go back to the hellish conditions they escaped last week.

Rick Perry, Governor of Texas, on Monday prepared to airlift victims of Katrina to other states and bring in cruise ships to house the overflow, as relief operations in the state approached capacity. Texas has received about 230,000 evacuees, though more continue to arrive.

Authorities are also scouring military bases, sports stadiums, hotels and other facilities for lodging. As well as placing huge strain on state and federal resources, the disaster presents politicians with the sensitive question of how much rebuilding will take place in New Orleans and the surrounding areas.

Launching a relief fund with Bill Clinton, former president George Bush warned "recovery is going to take years". His son, president George W. Bush, made his second visit to the region on Monday. After criticism of the government's slow response, Mr Bush promised to "do what it takes" to help victims get back on their feet. Meanwhile, Admiral Timothy Keating, co-ordinating the military's response, said thousands of troops were likely to remain in the area for "months not weeks". The army is leading efforts to repair levees and pump water out of flooded streets - a process some warn could take up to 80 days.

1 Million People Can't Go Home For Months (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

The vastness of the displacement created by Hurricane Katrina became more clear yesterday as officials struggled to respond to the needs of more than 1 million people who will be out of their Gulf Coast homes for months to come.

So many homeless people flocked to Texas in the past few days that Gov. Rick Perry (R) declared that his state was full and could take no more. Electronic highway signs in Houston directed bus drivers with evacuees to Fort Chaffee, Ark., but that facility quickly filled up as 9,000 people arrived within 16 hours Saturday. Arkansas officials asked for the signs to be removed.

With shelter space in the deep South filling up, the Federal Emergency Management Agency yesterday began to airlift storm survivors to states as far away as Michigan, Utah and California.

FEMA officials said they have secured as many as 50,000 shelter beds in often faraway states, but the flow of people to those states has sometimes been chaotic.

The office of Michigan Gov. Jennifer M. Granholm (D) said, for instance, that FEMA officials told them that more than 1,000 people would be flown to Battle Creek by yesterday evening, but 140 arrived. The airlift of 400 Hurricane Katrina evacuees to the D.C. Armory was delayed indefinitely.

In all, FEMA officials said, more than a quarter million people are living in shelters set up by the American Red Cross, the National Guard, local churches and municipal officials in cities from Albuquerque to Memphis.

Most of the homeless are from Louisiana, where officials estimate about 1 million people evacuated before the hurricane, and another 100,000 were evacuated afterward.

FEMA officials said that about 50,000 people are in Louisiana shelters, but Brecke Latham, spokeswoman for Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (D), said that virtually none of the 1 million evacuees have been able to return to their homes. Many are now living in hotels, with family or with friends, but officials said they are preparing for many of them to need help as their money, or their welcome, wears out.

In Mississippi, 15,000 people are in shelters and many more are unable to return home. An official in Gov. Haley Barbour's office said that "several hundred thousand" Mississippians are believed to have been displaced and are living elsewhere.

While FEMA and Red Cross officials praised the outpouring of help and offers of lodging from the states, some voiced concern that evacuees were being moved too far from their homes. Speaking at the Astrodome in Houston, Jesse L. Jackson said it will be a shock for many people to wake up in places like Salt Lake City or Minnesota. "It's a long way from home, from where they lived and acculturated," he said.

The Albuquerque Convention Center was one typical relocation site yesterday, and it received 100 people who had spent much of the past week in the Superdome. Carisa Malanum, sales director of SMG, the company that manages the center, said that 500 to 900 more evacuees are expected.

She said that the people can stay in the center indefinitely, but that officials hope to move them into more permanent lodgings within a few weeks. More than 500 Albuquerque area households have signed up to host a family, she said, and an additional 600 apartment units have been offered.

The new arrivals "seem to be doing fine," Malanum said. "We'll have people to help with psychological and emotional issues."

According to FEMA spokesman Butch Kinerney, the agency has been involved in placing more than 229,000 people into shelters. Another 63,000 survivors have been evacuated with unknown destinations. He said a significant number of people in Louisiana and Mississippi are still living in shelters without electricity or running water, and that their relocation out of the area is a top priority. Almost 60 percent of Louisiana and 40 percent of Mississippi remain without power, he said.

Texas officials decided to stop accepting new evacuees after placing almost 130,000 in shelters and providing hotel or family lodging for 100,000 more.

"We are concerned about our capacity to meet this great human need as thousands more arrive by the day," Perry said. "We want to make certain every evacuee has a safe haven where they can receive medical care, water, food and other assistance."

Perry said that some evacuees will be moved to other facilities in Texas, while others will be flown out of state from Houston and Dallas. It was unclear how officials would decide which evacuees would be sent elsewhere, or how much choice they would have on where to go.

"So far, people just seem to be happy to have a place to stay and some food to eat," Kinerney said.

Waves Of Evacuees Swamp Host Cities (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf

USA Today, September 6, 2005

More than 500,000 evacuees from Hurricane Katrina are on the move. It is a storm surge of the dispossessed, an exodus on a historic scale in the USA.

The forced migration from flooded Gulf Coast homes is swamping cities in Louisiana and Texas. The waves are rolling to Michigan, New Mexico, Arizona and as far as Oregon and New York. School officials in many states are cutting red tape to enroll more than 160,000 displaced children.

Federal, state and local officials are grappling with housing the homeless after a stumbling start. Chastened by scenes of chaos last week at New Orleans' Superdome and convention center, they are running short-term shelters in sites that range from Houston's Astrodome to three Carnival Cruise Lines ships that will provide berths for about 7,000 evacuees in Galveston, Texas, and Mobile, Ala.

What comes next for governments: Planning longer-term quarters for the most impoverished of the displaced, who may be dispersed to even more disorienting surroundings outside the Deep South.

Meanwhile, charities are groping through an emergency of a long-lasting kind that they've never seen before. “We're trained to deal with major evacuations, but not with the thought that people might never go home again,” says Keith Berger, who oversees four shelters as chairman of volunteers for San Antonio's Red Cross chapter. “We're writing a brand-new book here.”

The Red Cross is caring for 142,000 storm victims at 487 shelters in at least 12 states. Many churches and other private groups are pitching in to transport, house and feed evacuees.

This country hasn't seen mass movements of refugees since Southerners fled Civil War armies. The newly uprooted Americans find themselves added to the 25 million people worldwide who, the United Nations says, have at least temporarily lost their homes in environmental disasters or wars.

In sympathy for the homeless, the welcome mat is out. Nationally, charitable donations are breaking records set after the 9/11 terror attacks and December's Asian tsunami. In Texas, where nearly 250,000 are camping out, emergency shelters have an oversupply of volunteers handing out food and clothes.

Evacuees are taking Detroit Mayor Kwame Kilpatrick up on his offer of free hotel rooms for 500 families. The First African Methodist Episcopal Church of Los Angeles is painting a house donated by comedian Arsenio Hall, preparing to offer a year's free room and board to a Gulf Coast family.

David Perez, owner of a San Diego oil and gas company, spent $250,000 to charter a jet to Louisiana. At a shelter there, he told reporters, he offered rides to California. He got 80 takers, who were put up at San Diego's Kearny High School. Perez then turned the jet around and went back for another load of evacuees.

Robert Lang, director of the Metropolitan Institute of Virginia Tech in Alexandria, Va., likens the generosity to the reception Americans gave South Vietnamese refugees after Saigon fell to communists in 1975. “There's a tradition in this country of providing safe harbor to those who encounter disaster,” Lang says.

There are signs of local uneasiness, too. Unnerved by TV reports of looting and sniping in New Orleans, some homeowners near the Astrodome hired security guards. In Baton Rouge, the display cases for guns at the Wal-Mart in the Cortana Mall have been empty since Thursday. Sales clerk Damon Cephas, 23, says buyers made a run on the weapons as evacuees began making the 80-mile trip from New Orleans. Wal-Mart stores have since stopped selling guns.

"People act like they are in fear of their lives," Cephas said. "I think all of that (violence) was being done by a small number of bad people. Not everybody from New Orleans is like that, but all the people saw was the bad stuff."

Houston authorities say there have been some vehicle burglaries and a few intoxication arrests involving hurricane victims. But the new arrivals are overwhelmingly law-abiding, no rowdier than the out-of-towners at "a Super Bowl or an All-Star Game," assistant police chief Brian Lumpkin says.

Still, police have stepped up patrols in surrounding neighborhoods. To restrict evacuees from meandering outside the Astrodome and the adjoining Reliant Arena and Reliant Center, officials are shoring up perimeter fences. Authorities aren't using the word "curfew," but they're telling the 23,600 people at the Astrodome complex to be inside by 11 p.m. or they'll be locked out for the night. On a more welcoming note, shelter residents are getting invitations to the nearby Six Flags amusement park, museums and malls.

Many Katrina evacuees are low-income African-Americans. New Orleans was 67% black, and 35% of the city's blacks were living below the poverty line, U.S. Census Bureau figures from 2000 show. That raises a potential for racial conflict. Leaders of the Congressional Black Caucus last week advocated placing black families in cities with large black populations.

The evacuees are making other kinds of substantial impact wherever they've landed:

•Baton Rouge, which had a population of 228,000, swelled by 200,000 evacuees, instantly surpassing New Orleans as Louisiana's largest city. Hotels are bursting. Roads are clogged with traffic. Local service stations are suffering gas shortages and long lines. On busy Florida Boulevard, Wendy's and Church's Chicken stores were warning patrons that there were no more french fries.

•More than 6,000 evacuee students enrolled in Houston kindergarten through high school classes last week, and the number could reach 10,000, Kevin Hoffman of the Houston Independent Board of Education estimates. Saying Texas shelters are full while "there are shelters set up in other states that are sitting empty," Texas Gov. Rick Perry ordered emergency officials Saturday to airlift some evacuees to other states that have offered help.

•Some resilient, middle-class evacuees are already putting down new roots elsewhere. In Baton Rouge and Jackson, Miss., so many of them are buying houses that Sen. David Vitter, R-La., calls it "the great land rush." The average home price in Baton Rouge has jumped about $25,000, to $200,000, since Katrina, real estate agent Beth Alford says. One New Orleans law firm bought 50 houses in Baton Rouge, sight unseen, says Ann Prewitt, a Madison, Miss., agent.

No racial violence has been reported in any city, but that remains a potential problem, says Jorja Leap, an adjunct professor of social welfare at UCLA.

If the government doesn't allocate low-income, black evacuees to cities with federally backed plans for housing and other services, "I don't think they're going to be absorbed seamlessly into the fabric of American life," Leap says. "Whether it's something as mundane as parking places or seats on a bus in public transportation, competitive pressure on resources will bounce into issues of money and color."

Leap says evacuees are apt to be psychologically battered by "very nearly the same postwar pattern" she discovered in the 1990s in interviewing refugees in Kosovo, Bosnia and Serbia. They'll pass through successive stages of "protest, despair and detachment," she says.

The evacuees' losses of social networks and paying jobs are "a form of identity theft," says Mary Pipher, a clinical psychologist. Her 2002 book, The Middle of Everywhere, examined the impact of refugees from Cambodia and other countries on Lincoln, Neb., where she lives. "Our identities are built around the people around us, the things that we do."

Roy Bernardi, deputy secretary of the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development, says the government wants to disperse evacuees from cities already heavily impacted. The government's focus is slowly shifting from emergency shelter to finding housing that can be used by hurricane victims for as long as a year.

HUD issued a plea last week to mayors and county executives across the country for inventories of what's available. The tally should be in this week. HUD also is identifying how many of the 26,000 properties it owns are vacant. And it's studying how many of the manufactured housing kits it owns could be put up.

If HUD has its way, poorer New Orleans residents who were bused to shelters in Texas will be relocated to every U.S. region. The new quarters may be on military bases or in old hospitals, university dorms, nursing homes, schools and public housing.

Detroit's Kilpatrick says his city will work with HUD to place evacuees in permanent subsidized housing, getting them out of the rooms that about 60 area hotels are opening for them. “I want them to really be a part of our community,” he says. “I'd say 90% will stay.”

The process of planning beyond six months to a year will be complicated by uncertainties. Eight days after Katrina, no one can paint a picture of what the human dimensions of the storm's aftermath will look like in the long term. Some questions it's too early to answer:

•How many people will choose to return to once-beloved places they may now associate with traumas of wind, water, fear and loss? “I'm never going back,” Elena Temple, spokeswoman for the U.S. Conference of Mayors, says tearfully. A New Orleans native and current resident of Washington whose family escaped, she doubts that her home in the Garden District will ever be habitable again. She's sure all the family pictures are gone. “Twenty years from now, when I have children, how am I going to be able to explain what my city was like when I grew up?”

•Even if the pull of home is strong, how can people go back if jobs are not re-created? Joseph Gregory, a Gulfport, Miss., optometrist with several offices on the Gulf Coast, has moved temporarily to Jackson but says he may move on to Dallas to restart his practice. His house has been reduced to a slab. His offices survived, but his patients scattered to the winds.

•With 40% of Gulf Coast homeowners lacking flood insurance, how many can afford to rebuild houses that have washed away?

Rebuilding New Orleans is an especially thorny task. The Army Corps of Engineers says it will take at least 38 days to pump water out of the city. That would be just the start of a comeback. The scope of rebuilding could be contentious. To the irritation of Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco, a Democrat, U.S. House Speaker Dennis Hastert, a Republican, has said “it doesn't make sense” to rebuild a city several feet below sea level. He later issued a statement saying he was not “advocating that the city be abandoned or relocated.”

“They may not choose to develop the entire site,” says Lt. Gen. Carl Strock of the Corps of Engineers.

Lang of Virginia Tech's Metropolitan Institute says that if New Orleans can rebuild, it has a future. Families have lived there for generations, and people will return because the city has its own ethnic identity, language and cuisine, Lang says. “It's one of the most iconic places that has as strong a regional identity as exists in the United States,” he says. “That probably favors reconstitution.”

Homesick or not, few evacuees can afford to be jobless for long. Officials in Texas, Tennessee, Georgia and other states with evacuee inflows have started programs to link the newcomers with employers. Craigslist, the Internet-based classified advertising service, is replete with job offers for evacuees willing to relocate for good.

Moves may be permanent for evacuees like the 25 members of Carl Douglas Jr.'s extended family. Rousted from their three homes in New Orleans, they are getting to like the Baton Rouge area. Douglas, 68, says that since reaching a shelter in Gonzales, La., last week, they have been overwhelmed by the welcome: kind volunteers, a comfortable kennel for the dogs, a veterinarian on call. “The people here have been wonderful,” Douglas says. “We think we might just move here, period.”

Some Of The Dispossessed Say They Won't Return (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, September 6, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Displaced residents of this city — especially the poorest blacks, who were hardest hit by the storm — are pondering whether they will try to return to a town the tour guides often missed, one that has suffered decades of crime, corruption and grinding poverty.

"Katrina had a tremendous impact on the black people who lived here," said Lance Hill, director of a diversity training program at Tulane University. "This city was tough on a lot of them even before the hurricane. A lot of them were already unemployed or had minimum-wage jobs. Many of them were renters. They don't have anything to come back to. A lot of them are just not going to come back."

Before the storm, most Americans knew New Orleans as a blend of old Southern elegance and Bourbon Street decadence. The aftermath, however, has highlighted a primarily black city in which one-third of the African American population — more than 100,000 people — lives below the poverty line. Many of those hardest hit by the storm are not sure whether they want to go back.

"I didn't have no money for gas," said Thomas Lallande, a 60-year-old black man, as he rubbed his raw feet after finally evacuating.

Lallande said he wanted to leave before the storm but couldn't afford to. As the flood rose chest high last week, he waded from his submerged apartment in the 9th Ward to the Superdome, where he and thousands of people — nearly all of them black — waited for days without food, water or security.

Lallande escaped New Orleans — he was recuperating at a Baton Rouge shelter Monday — and, for now, he has no plans of going back: "What for? I don't have nothing back there."

And where some saw grim images and shattered futures, the city's most destitute saw rare opportunity.

"Actually, some people were a little better off after the storm," said a 26-year-old man who spoke on condition of anonymity as he took groceries out of a store last week. "I had gotten to the end of my rope. Now, I got a little something."

But even middle-class African Americans are reconsidering their futures in New Orleans. Herman and Christy Taitt, devotees of the city's music and culture, said they already had calls out to several different cities.

Herman, 44, is the head maintenance manager at Dillard University, and Christy, 37, is an accounting supervisor at a pharmaceutical firm. They had a house and three cars — including a Corvette — but they always thought they might have done better outside New Orleans.

Last week, at a Kinko's computer in Baton Rouge, they found aerial photos of their New Orleans home on the Internet. Water had inundated their neighborhood.

"Family kept us here," Herman Taitt said. "And I love the history of this place. The culture. It's the birthplace of jazz. The food. The parties. You can have a good time here. So we stayed. We allowed ourselves to have a second-class status to Southern white folks."

But now, Herman Taitt said, his elderly father is missing — and a crucial bond to the city has been broken.

"We're looking at Houston," he said. "We're looking at L.A."

New Orleans teacher Karen Francois, 53, said her apartment in the 9th Ward was destroyed. Though she would like to return to her job in January, she's thinking about Arizona after that.

"I'll be sad because I don't think there are people like us anywhere else outside of New Orleans," she said. "But you can't get any money there. There's no real opportunities in New Orleans — not for us."

New Orleans has always been a city of ironies. The first European settlers were Frenchmen lured in the 1700s by a Scottish pyramid schemer who paid land speculators with profits he reaped from newer real estate investors.

By the 19th century, New Orleans was a major cotton producer and market for slaves, many of whom built the beautiful antebellum buildings that drew so many tourists over the last century.

It was also home to one of the nation's largest free black communities. Many of the free were "Creoles" of mixed ancestry, sometimes the offspring of privileged plantation owners and black concubines. Some free blacks even owned property — including slaves.

Now, New Orleans' small but influential black middle-class community is one of the oldest in the nation. Many of them were educated at one of New Orleans' predominately black colleges, including Dillard University and Xavier College, the nation's only historically African American Catholic college and a leading producer of black medical and dentistry graduates.

New Orleans' three-tiered racial structure — white, black and Creole — plays a subtle but decreasing role in the city, residents say. New Orleans natives, especially people of color, say they can tell who's black, and who's Creole, by differentiating between kinky or smooth hair. Most of the city's black leaders have Creole ancestry.

"I can distinguish because I'm from there. My older sister used to go to 'Brown Bag parties' " in the 1950s, said Eric Spurlock, who fled his home in the 9th Ward. "They would hold up a brown paper bag, and if you were darker than that you would have to pay 25 cents to get in."

Francois said she considered herself Creole and acknowledged that her status afforded her access in New Orleans that was not extended to many of her African American friends.

"I went to a white university, I can speak as they do, act as they do," said Francois, the schoolteacher. "Whites are comfortable around me, but it's not that easy for other people I know."

The problems of urban America linger here. Last year, New Orleans' per capita homicide rate was among the nation's highest, as was its illiteracy rate.

In the last decade, the city has been rocked by a series of bribery scandals and police brutality scandals that led to investigations of a former mayor, a parish judge and a variety of other city administrators.

"They was killing each other in broad daylight," complained Tynia Williams, 42, explaining the city's problems with street crime.

Williams had to evacuate her apartment in Jefferson Parish, right on the New Orleans municipal line. She worked and had family members in New Orleans proper, on the other side of the 17th Street Canal.

Williams said her home was destroyed, but she is not sentimental about it. She is looking for work in Baton Rouge.

"The politicians were crooked, the judges were dirty," she said. "A judge convicted my son for murder and sentenced him to a life sentence, and two months later the judge got convicted."

In 2002, Mayor C. Ray Nagin came to office with a mandate to clean up city corruption and to lift residents out of poverty. The latest in a succession of black leaders who have broken into New Orleans' political system since 1978, Nagin ordered the arrests of dozens of city employees on bribery and related charges in the early months of his administration. Several federal corruption investigations were in process when Katrina hit.

In an effort to lower crime, city leaders had set about a controversial plan to replace many public housing projects with single-family homes and businesses. The notorious St. Thomas housing projects, for example, were replaced a few years ago by a Wal-Mart.

Supporters of the program say it is one reason crime had, in fact, been somewhat reduced in New Orleans. Detractors said it would displace black project residents, many of whom went to live in the eastern part of the city, one of the areas hit hardest by the flood.

They needn't have bothered with the debate — Katrina displaced more poor people than gentrification ever could.

Filling A Desperate Need For Shelter Begins With Cruise Ships And Proposals (NYT)

By By Ernest Beck And Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

Phase 1 of the government's plan to provide desperately needed transitional housing for tens of thousands of hurricane evacuees is scheduled to begin this morning, when homeless elderly people from various Texas locations board 30 buses destined for two Carnival cruise ships in Galveston, Tex.

Relief plans also call for housing evacuees in emergency trailers, hotels, motels, military bases and schools.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency chartered three vessels from Carnival Cruise Lines of Miami, the world's largest cruise-ship company, to lodge evacuees of Hurricane Katrina for up to six months. (All guests whose bookings have been canceled have been offered full refunds, according to the company).

The two ships, each capable of holding 2,600 people, will remain docked in Galveston; another, with an occupancy of 1,800, will be in Mobile, Ala. They will be used primarily for elderly victims and people with special health problems, with families a second priority, according to James McIntyre, a FEMA spokesman.

Red Cross personnel and the ship's medical team will be on board, but "this is not for those who are severely ill, it's for those who can be effectively independent," Mr. McIntyre said. Nor is it for those expecting luxuries associated with cruises.

"We bought a basic package without amenities - a room to live in, based on need, and food to eat," Mr. McIntyre said. "This is not about being bathed in luxury - it's to get people out of the Astrodome."

A FEMA spokesman said the agency has also put out a call to producers of "manufactured housing" and recreational vehicles - campers and the like - asking for assistance, and has placed orders for more than 50,000 trailers.

"They're looking at all types of housing, whatever anybody has right now and can ship right away," said Joanne Foist, a spokeswoman for Fleetwood Homes, one of the nation's biggest makers of manufactured housing. Fleetwood is based in Riverside, Calif., but it has 11 plants in Georgia, Tennessee, Kentucky and Texas that could supply about 400 homes a week to the hurricane-hit areas.

Mr. McIntyre pointed out that travel trailers were a bit roomier than the cabins on cruise ships, and added that they would be dispatched to locations in Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana, home states of the displaced, to "return them to some normalcy in their life as quick as possible," he said.

As rescue efforts for the devastated Gulf Coast cities gather pace, relief organizations and policy makers - as well as architects - are also thinking about the next phase. Daniel Libeskind, the celebrity architect known for his crystalline forms and his plan for a soaring Freedom Tower at ground zero, has an idea to help the tens of thousands left homeless by Hurricane Katrina: give them refuge in a low-cost modular shelter he has designed.

What Mr. Libeskind has in mind is a far cry from his more avant-garde buildings, like the Denver Art Museum extension and the Jewish Museum in Berlin. Imagine instead a compact 580-square-foot house with two small bedrooms, a bathroom, a kitchen and possibly a veranda, all for an estimated price of $3,700 or less. Featuring a pitched roof and latticework siding, the house, which is based on his design for a village in Sri Lanka flattened by the tsunami, is a dignified response to the crisis, Mr. Libeskind said, and could be built in about two weeks, depending on the materials.

"People should not be treated like sardines," he said. "These are not barracks."

After a disaster, there is no shortage of possible ways to house the displaced. But there is no best answer. Tents and shipping containers, for example, which have been used in other disaster zones around the world, have many drawbacks.

"In a hot environment, the idea of tents and things of that nature without ventilation or privacy makes for serious conditions," said David Downey, the director of the Center for Communities by Design, a resource center of the American Institute of Architects in Washington for architects interested in sustainable communities.

Shigeru Ban, the renowned Japanese architect, who is designing one of the multimillion-dollar homes in the enclave known as the Houses at Sagaponac in the Hamptons on Long Island, suggested in an interview on Friday that Katrina relief groups use his design for temporary housing made of cardboard tubes and plastic beer crates.

Called paper tube structures, the shelters were used after the 1995 earthquake that badly damaged Kobe, Japan, and after quakes in Turkey and India. One advantage is the cost: using donated materials from local companies and volunteer builders, "the houses are practically free," Mr. Ban said. They can be assembled by six people in six hours, once the materials are assembled.

Any temporary housing, however, has a way of becoming permanent once an initial emergency subsides, financing dries up and news media attention dwindles. Months after Hurricane Andrew flattened a large swath of South Florida in 1992, tent cities put up by relief organizations were still sheltering people, a source of much anger and resentment.

In Punta Gorda, on the west coast of Florida, more than 11,000 homes were wiped out when Hurricane Charley roared through in August of last year. Officials brought in 550 three-bedroom mobile homes as a temporary measure, but today the makeshift community - called "FEMA Village" - remains home to 1,500 people.

Its residents, most of whom lived in public housing before the storm, have had few opportunities to change the situation. Mr. McIntyre says the Punta Gorda mobile homes are "the standard" for those that may be used to house Katrina refugees.

Compared with a mobile home park, a fancy passenger ship - anchored in the Gulf, its cabins full of people in need of housing for months - sounds more inviting. Yet cruise ships are not ideal. On a ship, people would be far removed from any semblance of the life they once knew. A cruise ship, said Roberta Cohen, a co-director of the Brookings-Bern Project on Internal Displacement at the Brookings Institution in Washington, "is not a return to normalcy - it's some sort of 'first world' fantasy idea."

Beyond cruise liners and trailers, a growing number of architects are responding to global crises with innovative designs and concepts for affordable temporary housing that can be erected on the site with local materials or easily shipped to a disaster region, including packed-mud structures, durable prefabs and biodegradable "flat pack" units. Sean Godsell, an Australian architect, has designed temporary housing using shipping containers, calling them Future Shacks.

Like all good designs, those promoted by architects can be tweaked to fit different environments and cultures. Kevin Teague, an architect who is working on the Sri Lanka houses in Mr. Libeskind's New York office, said that plastic or fiberglass could be substituted for concrete blocks to make structures lighter.

Still, it is not clear how popular such housing might be. And much depends on the amount of aid made available by governments and relief agencies. Despite the low cost of his shelters, Mr. Ban managed to get only 50 or so cardboard dwellings built in Kobe and 30 in Turkey, aiding a tiny portion of the thousands left homeless and destitute.

Until now, Mr. Ban and Mr. Libeskind have not been in contact with relief organizations. "My energy alone," said Mr. Ban, "cannot build for the mass of the people."

U.S. Delays Planned Airlift Of Evacuees To D.C. Armory (WP)

By Hamil R. Harris And Theola S. Labbe

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

The proposed airlift of 400 Hurricane Katrina evacuees to the D.C. Armory yesterday was temporarily delayed by federal officials who sought more time to develop a comprehensive national plan for placing victims across the country, authorities said.

"We temporarily paused some airlifts while we identified cities and states who were ready and willing to receive these evacuees," said Russ Knocke, spokesman for the U.S. Department of Homeland Security.

"It is very important that we have an organization in place so that there are city and state officials as well as nonprofit groups ready and willing to receive and care for these individuals," he said.

Knocke said evacuees could be airlifted to the Washington area as early as today.

The postponement frustrated some city officials who had stocked the cavernous D.C. Armory with supplies and hundreds of cots in anticipation of the arrival of evacuees. It also reflected confusion nationwide as federal officials contend with dwindling shelter space in the deep South and a mass movement of displaced people that has sometimes been chaotic.

"There are certain evacuees who have been rescued from their nightmarish scenarios, and they have been taken to certain airports where they are waiting for airlifts and people are able to receive them," Knocke said. "We are working more closely with state and local officials to develop a comprehensive plan while all the while airlifts from the New Orleans airport have continued."

The airlift delay came as District officials were waiting to learn whether the 10 buses they sent to New Orleans on Friday would bring back storm victims. The buses did not take on storm survivors in New Orleans and were rerouted to Baton Rouge and then to other cities. Along the way, survivors who had the chance to board buses reportedly declined. Additionally, city officials confirmed that two bus drivers left the convoy yesterday.

But D.C. Council member David A. Catania (I-At Large), who proposed that the District assist storm victims, said yesterday that the buses had completed part of their mission by delivering food and water, while medical personnel on board treated storm victims in shelters.

Catania said he was disappointed that storm evacuees had not arrived in the District but was confident that they would.

"This is an exercise that requires flexibility and patience," Catania said. "In the next couple of days, we'll have evacuees in Washington. We'll still have them."

On Sunday night, Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D) arranged with Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee (R) to house hurricane evacuees after an Arkansas military base received 9,000 evacuees, twice as many as it had prepared for. Yesterday, the state was sending many of the evacuees at Fort Chaffee to summer church camps that had been empty.

Catania said Barbara Childs-Pair, director of the D.C. Emergency Management Agency, spent the day on the phone with federal officials trying to learn the status of the evacuees. City officials had expected them to arrive at Andrews Air Force Base yesterday. Officials at the base told The Post that they had no knowledge of a flight.

"The federal coordination of this disaster is certainly lacking," Catania said. But he added that the additional time would give city officials and nonprofit groups more time to prepare the D.C. Armory. An industrial-size air conditioner is scheduled to arrive today, Catania said.

Meanwhile, Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.), who said she sought a reason for the airlift delay, said she was told that federal officials needed time to start a tracking system to determine the identity of each person taken to a temporary shelter.

She said she was appalled to learn that such a concern could have delayed evacuees' arrival here.

"These evacuees have been waiting to go someplace now for three or four days," Norton said. "If they are just setting up a tracking system four or five days after the disaster, they've added insult to outrage. The only question ought to be is, 'Do you want to go to x?' "

At the armory, where preparations continued throughout the day, volunteers arriving in the late afternoon learned from the American Red Cross, which will manage the shelter, that the evacuees would not arrive as planned.

Gwen Rogers, 36, of Alexandria was hoping to donate two boxes of her daughter Cheyanne's baby clothes and toys, and lend a helping hand.

"I'll be back," Rogers said after signing up on the volunteer sheet.

City officials announced yesterday that they would seek reimbursement from the Federal Emergency Management Agency for providing aid. Williams planned to send a letter to the agency requesting reimbursement for costs that the city estimates could run as much as $6 million.

FEMA spokesman Mike Howard said yesterday that 14 states had been approved for federal disaster relief aid and that the agency was considering applications at 100 percent reimbursement.

Texas Agencies Cut Red Tape For Evacuees (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, September 6, 2005

HOUSTON -- Roderick Tureaud, 31, a welder by trade and the father of twin girls, spent his morning Monday in a tent outside the Astrodome filling out job applications and calling prospective employers. .

It was Labor Day, traditionally a time to celebrate the value of work. Tureaud and his wife, Rhodesia, 31, hope for a more personal celebration -- by finding a job for him and a school for her to continue her nursing studies.

There is also the problem of finding child care for Robin and Raven, 3.

"It's a new life now," Tureaud said. "The old life is gone, and we're going to make this one work. We don't have any choice."

Moments earlier, at a news conference a few hundred yards away, former Presidents Clinton and George H.W. Bush announced formation of a fund-raising foundation to help victims of hurricane Katrina -- bushclintonkatrinafund.org.

"A lot of these people have no cars, no work, no home, no nothing, they will depend on us to give them a future," Clinton said.

As Clinton and other high-level officials noted, it will take a national effort to provide that future. But Houston is the front line of that effort.

The nation's fourth-largest city is the ad-hoc home to more than 100,000 evacuees in shelters, motels, hotels and private homes. Officials expect many of the evacuees will not return to their former homes.

The impact on Houston, which calls itself the "city of opportunity," has been swift. The City Council met in emergency session. Two schools closed due to declining enrollment are being reopened to enroll children from evacuee families.

The Astrodome, largely abandoned since the Astros' Major League Baseball team moved to a new stadium, has been given new life as the largest shelter for Katrina victims. Officials said they have made tentative plans to keep it open as a shelter until December.

With more than 220,000 evacuees spread throughout Texas, Gov. Rick Perry on Monday ordered state health officials to develop plans to meet the short and long-term medical needs.

The plan to airlift some evacuees out of Texas has been halted, Perry said, as the Federal Emergency Management Agency develops a multi-state strategy.

The Harris County Housing Authority will announce this week a plan to find several thousands housing units.

Many people who have taken refuge in the Astrodome and three other shelters in public buildings had spent several days waiting to be rescued from the Superdome or the New Orleans convention center.

"Some are very grateful, but others are angry and say things like: 'You're lying to me just like they did in Louisiana,'" said Dianna Gunnels, manager of outplacement services for a company that works for the Texas' equivalent of the state unemployment office.

"I tell them, 'We're doing the best we can.'"

If some evacuees react with anger because of their experience at the Superdome or other gathering spots, others are grateful at the welcoming attitude they found in Houston.

"We were like dogs, thrown-away dogs, to the police in New Orleans," said Antoinette Lamerson, 38, who fled with her three children. "Houston is so much different. We're poor again but we're free and safe."

The Texas Workforce Commission has trailers at the Astrodome to take job applications and help evacuees contact their home states so their unemployment checks can be forwarded to the new Astrodome zip code. A job fair is set for this week in the parking lot .

The Texas agency that deals with child support checks has set up shop in the convention center across from the Astrodome. Like much of the relief effort, it was put together in a rush.

Alex Camacho, an agency employee, said he thinks the support checks from Louisiana and Mississippi can begin to be sent to newly opened Post Office annex at the Astrodome by the end of the week. Robin Allen, 45, who fled to the Astrodome with her six children, hopes he is right.

"Without that check, I can't begin to start over," she said. "We're here to stay but I need to support my kids."

Allen plans to enroll her five-school age children in school when the Houston district sends registrars to the Astrodome on Tuesday. Elea Batiste, 54, plans to to enroll her four grandchildren.

"Unless your kids are in school, you're not really living here, just surviving," she said. "But we're going to live here if we can."

Texans Handle Influx Of Evacuees (USAT)

By Dan Reed

USA Today, September 6, 2005

FORT WORTH — The Lone Star State is big, wide and generous, but even this great state is beginning to fill up with evacuees from New Orleans and the Gulf Coast.

Along Interstate 45 near Houston, electronic signs flashed messages telling evacuation-bus drivers to divert to Fort Chaffee, Ark., near Fort Smith on the Arkansas-Oklahoma border, the Associated Press reported.

In Houston, Dallas and San Antonio, sports arenas and convention centers are hosting thousands of evacuees. In Fort Worth, they are settling into convention and meeting halls, a high school athletics complex, an unfinished jail and even a nearly deserted terminal at the an old general aviation airport.

Individual families are also taking in far-flung relatives — or strangers.

Texas officials estimate that nearly a quarter of a million people have become new residents of the state since Katrina stormed ashore Aug. 29. With most of the state's official shelters nearing capacity, Gov. Rick Perry called on three big Texas-based airlines — American, Southwest and Continental — for help in flying evacuees to other states.

In Fort Worth, Carlos Walker can't even keep track of how many relatives are coming and going.

“We've got 36 people living here right now,” Walker said Sunday evening. “It was up to 40, I think.” It went down only temporarily because some members of his wife's extended family, all from the New Orleans area, left to go pick up still more relatives.

Some the nine branches of Nakisha Walker's family now living under her roof already are looking for more permanent housing. But the Walkers, who normally share their home with their four small children and a nephew, expect it will be weeks or even months before their home returns to normal.

Nakisha Walker said "God knew what he was doing" when her family felt compelled to buy a four-bedroom home that she fretted was too big. "He knew we would need a lot of space."

"People have been so good to us," she added, standing almost waist-deep among donated clothes, shoes, toiletries and bedding that have turned two large rooms, a living room and a dining room into a mini-warehouse.

At night, family members bunk side-by-side on the floor in the bedrooms and a big game room upstairs. The kitchen overflows with food, stacks of bottled water and an assortment of goodies, nearly all from members of the Walkers' church, friends and faculty members at Paschal High School, where Carlos Walker is an assistant football coach. The teenage athletes at the school dug into their own pockets to help out.

This spontaneous outpouring of generosity is evident throughout the state, as churches began converting fellowship halls and Sunday school rooms into temporary housing. Civic groups have organized fundraising campaigns.

Many merchants are giving large discounts to people who can prove they are from the storm-battered region.

In McKinney, a suburb 30 miles north of Dallas, one group of individuals converted an abandoned Wal-Mart store into a privately run shelter in 24 hours. In Weatherford, 20 miles west of Fort Worth, a church took in nearly 40 families.

In Fort Worth, Larry Kelly and his wife, Jean, made several runs to discount stores over the weekend to buy underwear, socks and other necessities and bring them to collection points around the city.

On Sunday, they were in a steady line of trucks and sport-utility vehicles dropping off relief supplies at the sheep barn at the Will Rogers Memorial Center. The sprawling complex includes an exhibition arena that hosts the Fort Worth Stock Show and Rodeo each winter.

Texans' response, Kelly said, is part "cultural, yes, but a lot of it comes from the very deeply ingrained belief system here. And it's that belief system that motivates people to respond this way."

Randy Austin, a former pastor and now head of security at Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary in Fort Worth, was among a group of 75 young people and adults who came to the center to do what they could.

"We came here to pray and witness to people," said Austin, who also serves as an auxiliary chaplain with the Fort Worth Police Department. "But we learned that God needed us to sort clothes and carry in all this stuff that people are donating. And that's great. We'll still get to pray and witness, but right now God needs our hands and our backs more."

Inside the nearby Amon G. Carter Jr. Exhibits Hall, about 400 evacuees have settled in and another 400 are expected.

A medical team led by faculty members from the University of North Texas Health Science Center's Texas College of Osteopathic Medicine checked out arriving evacuees. Many were just scared, hungry and dehydrated. Some were chronically ill and had been without their medication for days.

The outpouring of aid and care from Texans overwhelmed many of the evacuees.

The first thing Dave Arns, a 57-year-old restaurant worker from New Orleans, did after his medical checkup was attend a rodeo — sitting in prime seats donated to evacuees. "I will never go home to New Orleans," he said. "As of now, I am a resident of Texas."

Houston Finds Business Boon After Katrina (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

HOUSTON, Sept. 5 - Perhaps no city in the United States is in a better spot than Houston to turn Katrina's tragedy into opportunity. And businesses here are already scrambling to profit in the hurricane's aftermath.

Oil services companies based here are racing to carry out repairs to damaged offshore platforms in the Gulf of Mexico; the promise of plenty of work to do sent shares in two large companies, Halliburton and Baker Hughes, soaring to 52-week highs last week. The Port of Houston is preparing for an increase in traffic as shippers divert cargoes away from the damaged ports of Pascagoula, Miss., and New Orleans.

Owners of office space here are witnessing a surge in leasing as New Orleans companies, including that city's oldest bank, scramble to set up new headquarters in Houston, helping to shore up its sagging property market. With brio that might make an ambulance-chaser proud, one company, National Realty Investments, is offering special financing deals "for hurricane survivors only," with no down payments and discounted closing costs.

All this, of course, is capitalism at work, moving quickly to get resources to where they are needed most. And those who move fastest are likely to do best.

Meanwhile, even small businesses and cheap hotels are benefiting from the population surge, which could total up to 250,000 people. Some hardware stores have sold out their entire supply of gasoline cans and generators to people preparing for an eventual return to the devastated region.

"It feels like the only things left in south Louisiana are snakes and alligators," said John E. Olson, co-manager of Houston Energy Partners, a hedge fund that operates out of a skyscraper downtown. "Houston is positioned for a boom."

Long known for its commercial fervor, Houston is the largest city in the South and has a metropolitan population of more than four million. It has one of the nation's busiest ports and remains unrivaled as a center for the American energy industry.

Halliburton, for instance, moved its headquarters to Houston from Dallas in 2003, joining dozens of companies based here that provide services for oil and natural gas producers.

Halliburton differs from many oil services companies in that it also does significant business with the federal government. The company, which has contracts in Iraq, has a contract with the Navy that has already kept it busy after Hurricane Katrina. The company's KBR unit was doing repairs and cleanup at three naval facilities in Mississippi last week.

Halliburton was also planning to go to New Orleans to start repairs at other naval facilities as soon as it was considered safe to do so, Cathy Mann, a spokeswoman, said.

Executives at other Houston companies said they were wasting little time in carrying out repairs in the Gulf of Mexico, where at least 20 offshore rigs and platforms are believed damaged or destroyed. Tetra Technologies, which repairs or decommissions old platforms in the gulf, had employees in a helicopter the day after the storm passed to survey the damage.

"I always hate to talk about positives in a situation like this, but this is certainly a growth business over the next 6 to 12 months," said Geoffrey M. Hertel, Tetra's chief executive. By Friday, Tetra had been able to send an 800-ton barge it owns, the Arapaho, to the gulf to be used for platform repairs, Mr. Hertel said.

Some here are wary about seeming too gleeful in light of New Orleans's misery. Houston officials were quick to point out on Friday that they were making a convention center downtown available to evacuees from the disaster zone, potentially forcing some events to be canceled. And the Port of Houston Authority tried to soften the blow to other ports as it started to receive shipments diverted from Louisiana and Mississippi.

"We sincerely hope that these great gulf coast ports can get back to work as soon as possible," the port said in a statement last week.

But the new business is obviously welcome. "We're getting inquiry calls since the beginning of the week," Felicia Griffin, a spokeswoman for the port, said on Friday. "We're prepared to do whatever is necessary to meet the needs of our customers."

If the storm works to Houston's benefit, it would not be the first time a natural disaster of extraordinary size sparked some economic dynamism here. The hurricane of 1900 in nearby Galveston, which killed more than 6,000 people and almost leveled the most thriving commercial city in Texas, paved the way for Houston, located 50 miles inland, to emerge as a regional center for shipping and the refining of oil discovered in East Texas fields.

The displacement of companies to Houston from New Orleans is an abrupt acceleration of a trend that has been going on for decades. Many large companies, particularly those in the energy business, have made that move over the years, leaving New Orleans more dependent on tourism and other service industries.

A surge of business activity in Houston this time around might lift the fortunes of a city that is still struggling to recover from the collapse of Enron and two decades of job cuts in the energy industry, which has shrunk as production of oil in Texas and the United States has declined.

Rising oil and natural gas prices in the last two years have strengthened the finances of Houston's largest energy companies, but have done little to improve employment prospects in the city, where the unemployment rate was 5.5 percent in July, compared with 5 percent nationally. During the last oil boom in the 1970's, 150,000 jobs were created in the business of oil field equipment, according to Barton Smith, director of the Institute for Regional Forecasting at the University of Houston.

However, since the 1980's, about 130,000 of those jobs have been lost as oil and natural gas exploration migrated farther away from Houston, largely to countries in West Africa, the Middle East and Asia - and companies were able to produce oil field equipment more cheaply abroad. Houston remains essential for energy research and is the undisputed center for energy deals and finance, but those activities employ relatively few people.

Partly as a result, Houston has one of the most moribund big-city real estate markets.

"There are many instances of companies coming to Houston for temporary space," said Louis B. Cushman, vice chairman of Cushman & Wakefield, a commercial real estate company here. In its own offices, Cushman has finally been able to sublease some extra space to a business of 8 to 10 people that had been in New Orleans. Mr. Cushman said his firm had found offices for two companies that had already decided they were not going back.

One company that has temporarily exchanged New Orleans for Houston is Whitney Holding, the parent company of Whitney National Bank, founded in 1883 and one of the oldest banks in New Orleans. Another New Orleans oil exploration company, Energy Partners, said in a statement last week that it was also making Houston its temporary headquarters. Other companies are following suit.

"It's exploding," said Stephen D. DuPlantis, senior managing director at CB Richard Ellis. "When I talk to owners of office buildings, they say people are not even negotiating. As tragic as it is for New Orleans, it is a boon for Houston."

Dwaine Ofczarzak, the general manager of Buffalo Hardware, an independent store near central Houston, has seen out-of-towners who seem to be preparing to leave and some who are settling in.

On Friday, Mr. Ofczarzak sold out his supply of five-gallon gasoline cans to people from Louisiana. But some shoppers were coming in to get keys made for their new homes and talking about enrolling their children in local schools. "I have friends who've already done that," he said.

The newcomers may take some getting used to. "Everybody is still pretty much in awe," Mr. Ofczarzak said. "And with everybody coming in the buses, it hit home."

As Evacuees Pour In, A Flood Of Generosity And Some Unease (WSJ)

By Jose De Cordoba, James Bandler and Ann Zimmerman

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

HOUSTON -- As pastor of Impact Houston Church of Christ, the Rev. Charlie Middlebrook is matching refugees from Hurricane Katrina with volunteers who have offered to share their homes.

But the outpouring of generosity hasn't blinded Mr. Middlebrook to humanity's less noble impulses. With the help of a law firm that is donating its services, he is conducting background searches on all refugees as well as on those who have volunteered to take them in.

"We want to send somebody who is not a danger to you," Mr. Middlebrook tells a caller offering to house a hurricane victim. "We are trying to be very careful." Mr. Middlebrook is requiring from all parties Social Security numbers or driver-license numbers.

Katrina's dislocation of hundreds of thousands of people from Gulf Coast states is inspiring extraordinary acts of charity. In less than a week donations to victims have exceeded $400 million, on top of millions of volunteer man-hours. As of late Monday afternoon, the American Red Cross said it is sheltering more than 135,500 evacuees at more than 470 shelters in 12 states.

To Jerome Lyons, a New Orleans construction worker who spent five days trapped in waterlogged New Orleans, the wave of help in Houston seems more powerful than the hurricane. "All races, all colors, all express their love," he says. Mr. Lyons, who was rescued by boat from his home, says strangers have given him money on the street to help him get a new start.

But the massive displacement is also creating new fault lines. Many refugees, having lost nearly everything or having had little to lose in the first place, are seeking more than shelter from the storm. They're seeking new lives, competing with locals for jobs and crowding their children into new schools.

Noel Jones, a 38-year-old Houstonian, predicted that some arriving workers are likely to be shut out of construction and manufacturing jobs because of competition from Mexicans and Mexican-Americans. Mr. Jones said the competition often forces him and other African-Americans as well as poor whites into low-paying service jobs.

"Don't stop" in Houston, is Mr. Jones's advice to Katrina refugees. "It ain't meant for you."

DOJ_NMG_0002691

Texas Gov. Rick Perry has already called for an airlift of evacuees to other states from Houston and Dallas. He cited strains on Texas, which is hosting about a quarter of a million refugees from Katrina.

Cities and families providing shelter and other help have no way of knowing how long their assistance will be needed. Duchesne Academy of the Sacred Heart, a private, all-girls school in Houston, enrolled 150 students from a related New Orleans school as of Friday, waiving tuition through January. "Hopefully, they'll go home in January," says Beth Speck, Duchesne's director of admissions. "If not, we'll see what happens then."

Interviews with evacuees from New Orleans suggest that some have no intention of returning. Even a modest job in a new home may represent an improvement over what they left behind. Reco Parker, 31, a hairstylist now staying at Houston's Astrodome complex, says he's going back to New Orleans, but only long enough to try to salvage the more than $1,000 worth of hairstyling equipment he left behind. He plans to return to Houston, saying he's bowled over by Texan hospitality.

"They seem like loving people here," he says, adding that he's scared of staying in New Orleans after the hurricane.

One caller to Impact Houston Church of Christ was Janice Stocks, who has offered to share her three-bedroom country home with a couple from 50 to 70 years old. "It's the right thing to do," says Mrs. Stocks, whose husband is an executive with a Houston chemical company. "That could be us on the road, without a place to go."

But she acknowledges some questions and concerns. "What is one supposed to do? Drive with them to the grocery? Drive them to the doctor's office?" As far as the duration of the arrangement, she says, "We are willing to go the whole yard, as long as we get along with one another. I hope we get a good family."

Mayor Laura Miller of Dallas, which has 45,000 refugees in shelters, hotels and homes, worries about the welcome mat fraying. "A group of doctors volunteering at Reunion Arena and the Convention Center told me that they're having fun now, but worry how they'll feel in two weeks, when they're tired from combining volunteering with their day-to-day jobs," she says.

The prospect of dealing with long-term refugees is prompting the federal government to consider some dramatic solutions -- for instance, creating a city of 50,000 people where none exists now, says Lt. Gen. Carl Strock of the Army Corps of Engineers. Gen. Strock says the corps is considering sites for such a city as well as sites for possible trailer and mobile-home parks.

"After the hurricanes in Florida, we went in and built, essentially, trailer parks," he said. "We have general plans on the shelf always but specific planning for New Orleans began before landfall" of the hurricane. He added that authorities also are looking at military bases, including those that have been closed but once housed military personnel.

Those decisions will come later, said Lt. Gen. Strock. Right now authorities are just trying to continue evacuating residents to safer temporary facilities, such as the Astrodome.

Mr. Middlebrook, the Houston pastor, says virtually all callers have been as enthusiastic and sincere as Roxanne Grice, a member of the congregation who on Saturday night cooked a feast of ribs and beans for some 20 hurricane victims. "I just want to hug somebody," said Ms. Grice, stirring a huge pot of beans as she waited for her guests to arrive.

The church did receive a call from one man offering to share his one-bedroom apartment with up to "four ladies." Mr. Middlebrook declined the offer.

In Baton Rouge, A Cool Welcome (WP)

By Wil Haygood

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La., Sept. 5 -- When this city's mayor, Melvin "Kip" Holden, issued a stem-winding warning that he would not tolerate "lawlessness" from arriving Hurricane Katrina evacuees, it seemed a page torn from the playbook of the celebrated former governor Huey Long, exposing an us-against-them dictate.

But many blacks here -- and those arriving from New Orleans -- were suddenly wondering whether this city was about to turn into a kind of ground zero of class warfare between blacks and blacks.

Holden himself is black, which had the potency of lifting the debate above the usual black-white fault lines.

"We know we don't want that criminal element," Sheila Mosby, 40, said while sitting on her front porch on the south side of this city and recalling scenes of recent looting in New Orleans. "I can understand trying to survive. But that element coming here, well, they might try to rob stores. To tell you the truth, it's really going to be something."

DOJ_NMG_0002692

While dabbing at sweat beads with a pink hand towel, Mosby, who is black, went on: "Like Mayor Holden said, if they come down here and try to break into people's houses, and stores, there's a place for them."

She -- like the mayor -- was referring to the Baton Rouge jails.

Mosby said she envisioned "shoot to kill" orders if break-ins do occur.

Orders for the police? "No! From the people who live in these homes. They will shoot to kill. They gonna let these people know, 'You ain't in New Orleans. You in Baton Rouge.' "

This city of approximately 260,000 people, which lies 90 miles northwest of New Orleans, has not had the dramatic racial narratives of many other southern cities. There were bus boycotts in the 1960s -- and those of a certain age still remember a violent confrontation that took place during that decade between local Muslims and police here, which resulted in gunfire and injury.

Holden's comments seemed to bring to the surface the reality that local resources may well be strapped; that the holding-on blacks of this community realize there is sudden competition, from other blacks, for help in escaping poverty.

All day Sunday, hundreds had lined up at the Department of Social Services office to get assistance, especially food stamps. Many were Katrina evacuees, but hardly all.

"Now my biggest concern is the schools," said Tara Willimas, 34, a medical transcriber who is black and resides in Baton Rouge. "We don't mind sharing, but there's going to be competition for jobs."

Many, including the mayor, contend this city's population could more than double in the coming days and weeks, exceeding half a million.

"I can understand these people coming here from New Orleans," said Isadore Brown, 32, who also was standing in line for food stamps. He's a crane operator, a black man who says the power at his Baton Rouge home went out, ruining food. Brown says he already has visions of criminals from New Orleans running amok. "They're coming down here from New Orleans making us fear for our lives," he said. "Some people have talked about not leaving their house."

Already, this city -- home to Louisiana State University -- has been showing signs of tension. Some stores are closing early, leaving many to wonder whether they're doing so because of those unsettling images of blacks looting in New Orleans -- or simply because stores are running out of supplies. And it has not been uncommon in recent days to hear gunshots ring out in the night.

"Why do store owners all of a sudden want to close up their stores at 10 p.m.?" wonders Tammy Ruffin, 33, also black. "Many of these stores used to be open 24 hours."

There are upwards of 30 evacuees now staying at the Shiloh Missionary Baptist Church on Eddie Robinson Sr. Drive -- named after the legendary Grambling football coach who grew up on this street. Eula Smith -- wife of Pastor Charles T. Smith -- directs volunteer efforts at the church, which serves a predominantly black congregation.

She says she immediately began to wonder about class divisions in the aftermath of Holden's comments.

"I don't know if the mayor was trying to alienate people or what," she said, seated in her office, the hallway buzzing with the sounds of New Orleans children playing tag. "He didn't say it right. Every population has this criminal element. But it sounded like he said all New Orleans people are thuggish."

Sleep has been hard to come by for Smith and her harried staff. She yelled out for someone to brew more coffee. "Now we do have to be careful," she continued, "that some of our people aren't using this situation to their benefit, getting into our shelters, and what have you. But Baton Rouge is bigger than Mayor Holden anyway. I think he said what he said for the benefit of his white voters, because he's looking to the future."

Simmering class divisions aside, the bugaboo of racism also has reared its head. Barbara Martin, 58, was a teacher in New Orleans. She and her husband, Alphonse, who are black, evacuated here. "Soon as the mayor made his statement about New Orleans," she said, "no-vacancy signs went up everywhere here on apartment complexes."

"We have sat in our car and watched whites go in these places and come out with paperwork to get apartments. The mayor is black. His head must be in the sand," she said. She goes on, her husband amen-ing her every word: "I accept what he said in terms of lawlessness. I don't believe in lawlessness myself. But what he said affected everybody. Some people were on lockdown here, as if we were going to tear up the city."

Martin says she has been made to feel "uncomfortable" in Baton Rouge. "I'm a middle-class black person, and I'm being treated by the color of my skin."

Hundreds Refuse To Evacuate (LAT)

By Scott Gold, David Zucchino And Stephen Braun

The Los Angeles Times, September 6, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Search teams pressing to evacuate the living and find the dead after a full week under the high-water sway of Hurricane Katrina found their efforts complicated Monday by the refusal of hundreds of residents to leave the paralyzed city.

President Bush returned Monday for a second tour of the disaster zone, praising emergency workers in Baton Rouge, La., and stressing the work of religious charities during a visit to a church packed with evacuees. Federal officials said relief operations were proceeding apace, but Bush's tour was soured by an ongoing feud with Louisiana's governor over who would manage National Guard troops in the state.

A senior New Orleans police official said Monday that some 10,000 inhabitants remained in the city, hidden inside flooded residences, apartments and housing projects, surviving on foraged scraps and food drops by the military. Searchers have been frustrated by hundreds of holdouts who have refused to leave their homes, fearing possessions will be pillaged, pets will die and their way of life will be erased.

"There are, to our surprise, thousands of people still in the city that we're trying to identify and locate," said Deputy New Orleans Police Chief Warren Riley. "We're trying to convince them there's nothing for them here — no food, no jobs, nothing to let them live the way they're used to."

But there were nascent signs of progress too. The gaping break in the city's 17th Street Canal levee was finally stopped up by metal sheets, tons of earthen fill and a strand of massive 3,000-pound sandbags. Engineers and contractors working on the breach and two other levee ruptures said water levels dropped by as much as a foot Monday in some parts of the city. The next step is "de-watering," the removal of water that is expected to take months.

More than 50,000 anxious evacuees began returning for the first visit to their submerged homes in Jefferson Parish, which borders the city on the west and the south. They waited for hours in cars lined for miles along a clogged highway.

"I was scared to come back," said Mike "Opie" Johnson, 37, who retrieved a pillow-case full of his mother-in-law's jewelry. "I heard there were looters everywhere, but turns out there weren't too many looters in this parish."

Thousands of residents arrived lugging coolers crammed with food and water to sustain them until Thursday, when parish sheriff's deputies will force everyone to leave again. Authorities cautioned that many other residents might not see their homes for months. In New Orleans, Mayor C. Ray Nagin also tamped down expectations, warning that it would take 10 years to rebuild the city and that storm-related deaths could rise as high as 10,000.

A week since Katrina blasted through the Gulf Coast, bursting levees and flooding out hundreds of thousands of residents, New Orleans remains bereft of the spark of high life that has made it a tourist and jazz mecca. It has descended into a nightmarish tableau of gas-line fires, sporadic gunfire and the sound of helicopters on searches for residents still trapped.

Soldiers, looters and scavengers sloshed through murky water under picturesque 18th century flats with trademark iron-gated balconies. The century-old jazz haunts of Storyville and Basin Street, where Louis Armstrong and Sidney Bechet played for tips, were silent as graves. The old port blockaded by Union ironclads during the Civil War remains useless, its entry canals bottled up by loose barges, scrap metal, silt and flood debris.

Yet many survivors ignored pleas to evacuate, foraging for sustenance by day and staying hidden at night in a city deprived of basic functions.

"They're trying to starve us out," said Barnell Roman, 53, who drank a warm beer on the porch of his two-story home on Elysian Fields Avenue in the Mid-City neighborhood.

Roman said he and a dozen other neighborhood residents were no longer able to cadge food or water from National Guard troops posted nearby. Faced with shrinking supplies, two neighbors gave up and accepted a ride from authorities to an evacuation point, he said.

On Interstate 10, where a flooded highway exit served as a ramp to launch rescue boats, search crews said hundreds of people had declined to be rescued over the last two days. One Texas crew operating east of the interstate was turned way by 450 people living in houses surrounded by water. On Monday, the crew rescued 183 people but was turned away by 150 more, said Billy Parker, manager of the Texas Task Force One Water Strike Team.

"They have water up to the porch, but they don't want to go," Parker said. "They sit up on the second floor and say: 'We got food. We got water. We're staying.' " Parker said his crews had no authority to forcibly remove anyone but had passed the information on to state and city agencies.

Nagin has said the city will remove all residents. He has not provided details on how or when the process would be carried out. But Riley warned Monday that officials were considering "stopping food drops" to the stragglers to increase the pressure on them to leave.

There were emerging signs that water-borne bacterial disease has begun to fester among survivors being brought out of the flood zone by military and police search teams. Medical authorities working in the city report treating several cases of vibrio vulnificus, a gastrointestinal disease that spreads through exposure to polluted water.

Health officials said they clearly identified strains of the disease, which has effects similar to cholera, among some storm refugees. But they do not yet have a handle on the number of cases.

"We are seeing some cases," said Von Roebuck, a spokesman for the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta. "It could be life-threatening."

Among healthy people, the illness can cause vomiting, diarrhea and abdominal pain but is generally not life-threatening. It can be cured with antibiotics. But it can be more serious among people with chronic liver disease and compromised immune systems, leading to fever, chills and septic shock.

"The water quality in the streets continues to deteriorate," said Nagin, who said he was concerned about West Nile virus and other mosquito-borne diseases. "There is some really nasty looking stuff out there."

In a visit to the Louisiana Emergency Operations Center in Baton Rouge, Bush told several hundred local, state and federal public safety officials that their efforts in evacuating and providing medical treatment and food to tens of thousands of flood survivors brought "immediate light to people who needed help."

Bush returned to the storm-torn Gulf Coast region for the second time in three days to boost the morale of authorities and urge churches and other religious organizations to aid the flood victims of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama.

"I want to thank every church member who's helping people who have been displaced," Bush said as he toured the Bethany New World Prayer Center in Baton Rouge, consoling refugees along with televangelist T.D. Jakes and Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco.

Behind the scenes there were tensions between Blanco and the administration over the White House's attempt last week to force her to cede the constitutional authority she wields over the Louisiana National Guard.

A senior administration official who spoke on condition of anonymity confirmed Monday that top White House officials had pressed her to allow federal officials to unify National Guard and active-duty troops under one chain of command. The official said that "we wanted to unify the command and control for security" under Army Lt. Gen. Russel L. Honore, who is heading National Guard troops in New Orleans.

But Blanco has resisted, fearing the White House is attempting to paint her as the weak link in last week's slow-moving government disaster operations. On Monday, Blanco's aides learned only at the last minute that Bush was touring the state capital in Baton Rouge and complained that she was being punished for holding tight to her constitutional authority over state-based National Guard units.

When the two sat together at the Emergency Operations Center, Bush smiled benignly while Blanco stared ahead solemnly. At one point, Bush leaned over to give her a peck on the cheek, but her stern gaze did not waver.

Later, Blanco minimized rumors of sniping and said she supported the work of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which has drawn sharp criticism in recent days. "This debate was simply about an organizational structure," she said. "We needed the versatility to use the National Guard members as they needed them."

After attending a meeting with Bush, Blanco and other federal and state officials, James Lee Witt, the former Clinton administration FEMA director, said that "in two days, you'll see a different program down here."

But Witt, who was hired as an advisor last week by Blanco to shore up her emergency planning and to blunt federal efforts to seize authority over military relief operations, also said that the Bush administration had "minimized FEMA" by folding it into the Department of Homeland Security.

"You can't report up through three different chains of people and make things go fast," Witt said. "FEMA needs to be put back as an independent agency with the people and resources to do its job well."

Homeland Security Director Michael Chertoff and FEMA head Michael D. Brown have been under fire for moving aid in too slowly and for not coordinating with local officials. They continued to defend their performance.

During one news conference Monday, a perturbed Brown resorted to listing his previous experience dealing with public emergencies.

"Yeah, I've been through a few disasters in my life," he said.

During a Monday meeting to unveil a fundraising foundation to aid hurricane victims, former Presidents Clinton and George H.W. Bush agreed that sniping between disaster officials should cease while relief operations were still underway. But Clinton said a national commission should investigate mistakes made in the first days after the hurricane, which hit Aug. 29. And he also questioned FEMA's current structure.

"It has something to do with how they reorganized after I left," Clinton said.

Shoring up his organization, Chertoff named a new federal official to help oversee rescue and recovery operations in New Orleans. Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen, the Coast Guard's chief of staff, will be deputy federal officer under Brown. The Coast Guard has been widely praised for making more than 15,000 rescues of people trapped by the hurricane.

Allen's job will be to set up a new headquarters in New Orleans and work with Honore, who commands Joint Task Force Katrina, the military group in New Orleans.

Troops at the heart of relief operations in New Orleans and Mississippi continued to grow Monday. Major Gen. Bennett Landreneau of the Louisiana National Guard said the total number of forces in the city would climb to 10,000.

Honore, the commanding general of the First Army, seemed to be everywhere during the day.

He directed troops, met with Bush and Blanco, and charmed and blustered at television news anchors who began to mimic his gruff phrasing — repeating his "boots on the ground" to refer to growing troop strength and ending questions with his terse, "Over!"

The general waved off the political firestorm over the Bush administration's halting response, chalking the chaos following Katrina's assault to the vagaries of nature.

"The storm did this. It wasn't anything the government did," Honore said. "The storm had the damn vote. You can't vote that damn water out of the city of New Orleans. Now let's take care of the evacuees! Let's get it on!"

"Over!"

'No Reason To Stay,' But Some Won't Leave (DMN)

By Lee Hancock

The Dallas Morning News, September 6, 2005

NEW ORLEANS – By persuasion and by force, authorities worked Monday to complete the biggest evacuation of an American city in modern times.

Despite a week of flooding, hellish conditions and slim prospects that the city would be livable for months, some people still didn't want to leave.

"This city has been destroyed, has completely been destroyed," Deputy Police Superintendent Warren Riley said. "There's absolutely no reason to stay here. There are no jobs. There are no homes."

Nonetheless, he said, "Unfortunately there are still people that do not want to leave this city."

In the Garden District, police backed by California National Guardsmen stopped pedestrians and bicyclists at a major intersection and ordered them into vans even after some protested that they would be leaving friends and family behind.

It was a stark contrast to suburban areas where Hurricane Katrina's impact was less devastating. Residents were allowed to return to their homes temporarily to inspect damage and salvage belongings.

As authorities began removing dead bodies, engineers scored an initial success in the battle against the floodwaters. Louisiana officials said Monday afternoon that the 17th Street Canal levee, where a huge breach caused the disastrous flooding, had been patched.

After several days of helicopters dropping huge sandbags into the gap, the flow finally stopped and pumps were able to begin pushing water back to Lake Pontchartrain. But much of the city remained under water. Meanwhile, President Bush, who has come under intense criticism for his administration's response to the storm, made his second trip to inspect the damage and chaos. He pledged that "all levels of the federal government are doing the best they can."

'Lock down the city'

In New Orleans, the effort to impose order involved about 4,000 U.S. Army troops and Marines, National Guardsmen and law enforcement officers from across the country. They were patrolling city streets with local police in an effort to, in Mr. Riley's words, "lock down the city."

It wasn't easy. Army Lt. Gen. Russel Honore told ABC that fewer than 10,000 people remained in the city, based on aerial reconnaissance. That would be a fraction of New Orleans' half-million residents, but still a formidable number of holdouts.

Mayor Ray Nagin – who said Monday that the death toll in his city could reach 10,000 – declared that the city had the authority to force residents to evacuate. He would not say if authorities were doing that, but he announced that people who refuse to leave will no longer be given drinking water.

The deputy superintendent stressed voluntary evacuations, saying: "We are working with them and talking to them, trying to convince them to leave."

While some officers went further, others, in a neighborhood off Interstate 10 called Gentilly, said they could only warn people to get away from water that could carry encephalitis, typhoid, dysentery and toxic pollutants.

Some people wandered the streets, and others scavenged in hotels and apartments for whatever they could find to survive. On Chef Menteur Highway, 73-year-old Navy veteran Silas Walker huddled beside wrecked gas pumps at a gutted Shell station.

"This is the area of the typhoon," he said, rocking back and forth in green hospital pajamas and sock feet. "I don't want to leave."

A police officer who tried to talk Mr. Walker into leaving was frustrated, but sympathetic.

"Some of these people have had so much psychological stress, all they been through, that they have lost their minds," he said.

Boat crews and air searchers continued combing the city for survivors, while police officers from Texas and other parts of Louisiana cruised neighborhoods, handing out food and patrolling for looters.

Humvees packed with heavily armed troops and SUVs filled with SWAT police officers prowled largely deserted streets and guarded the 18-wheelers hauling fuel for emergency vehicles and generators.

In Washington, military officials said that 8,500 active-duty personnel and 38,000 National Guard troops would be deployed in the hurricane-afflicted areas by today, along with 21 Navy ships.

Collecting the dead

The grim task of retrieving the dead began Monday as refrigerated trucks began fanning out across the city, collecting bodies from hospitals, roadways and apartments.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency is overseeing the recovery, setting up a temporary morgue near the New Orleans airport.

One FEMA truck stopped at midafternoon to pick up corpses in the Garden District. It was parked on the grassy median where the city's famous streetcars normally run, while workers wearing masks and white protective suits lifted body bags in.

"We just really got started, and we got nine so far," said Sgt. Richard Hazlewood, a Louisiana state police officer helping the truck navigate through neighborhoods.

In the poorer neighborhoods, the squalor grows worse by the day. Floodwaters have steadily gone down, leaving a malodorous, contaminated stew of sewage, chemicals, garbage and the bodies of animals and people.

DOJ_NMG_0002697

In badly hit areas like the Ninth Ward, several residents said, neighborhoods are infested with snakes, prowled by packs of abandoned dogs and dotted with bodies of the dead.

A New Orleans police officer who passed through the area late Sunday on his way to check on his flooded home said some residents were wandering confused and disoriented through the filthy water.

"There were people really about like zombies, like that Night of the Living Dead movie," he said.

Even in the city's lushest neighborhoods, stores have been looted and streets are dotted with garbage and reeking water.

Trying to bring order has sometimes resulted in violence. Police across the city say they've dealt for the past week with sporadic gunfire. Officers based in the French Quarter say they had particular problems from Iberville, a desperately poor area just outside the famed tourist destination.

Police said that a Sunday morning shootout that left two civilians dead and two wounded did not involve U.S. Army Corps of Engineers contractors on their way to help patch a levee, as initial reports indicated.

The incident in East New Orleans began, officials said, when an emergency worker heard gunshots and called police for help. When officers responded, the gunmen began firing at them, and a backup tactical team ended up killing and wounding several of the assailants, Mr. Riley said.

Even in areas packed with police, looters roamed. Several U.S. Marshals and a state police officer, all brandishing M-16s, pulled over a van Monday morning and hauled out five people armed with machetes, knives, rifles, stun guns, brass knuckles and handguns.

The van had been hot-wired, stolen and decorated with an obscenity about Katrina. Inside, police also found a large cache of expensive-looking musical instrument cases. Its occupants were heavily tattooed 20-somethings who sat sullenly, three of them holding mongrel dogs.

"They're from New York, New Jersey," a deputy marshal said. "Looks like they've come down here to do a little looting and stuff."

The officers made the group sit on the ground until a truck came to take them and all but their weapons to an evacuation point. Even though they had obviously stolen the car and possibly the equipment, officers said, they could do nothing but ensure that they left the city unarmed.

"What can we do but evacuate them?" the exasperated deputy marshal said.

In New Orleans, Not Everyone Wants To Be Rescued (CSM)

By Patrik Jonsson

The Christian Science Monitor, September 6, 2005

NEW ORLEANS - Gregory Scott steers a commandeered pleasure boat through the flotsam of New Orleans's flooded 17th Ward, occasionally scraping bottom - actually, the roofs of submerged cars.

The area of modest two-story and shotgun-style homes seems empty of life - and officials believe that hundreds who tried to ride out hurricane Katrina here may have perished in their attics. But Mr. Scott, who makes his presence known by blasting a hand-held horn as he maneuvers the boat forward, knows there's life - even laundry - in some quarters.

"There's people all through here," says mate Timothy Waters.

A mucky brown soup flows through what used to be the 17th Ward's neighborhood of Holly Grove, the only spot Scott has ever called home. Under almost 10 feet of water, the Beautiful People club is gone. Scott's own house, with a broken window where he climbed out just ahead of rising waters, is part of a scene so macabre that even New Orleansian vampire-novelist Anne Rice might struggle to imagine it.

Yet while thousands finally got out over the Labor Day weekend, Scott and Waters are holding on - just two of many who are fierce in their determination to stay, keeping their feet planted in the muck of this Cajun Atlantis.

Such decisions perturb emergency-response officials, who warn that public-health risks posed by the fetid floodwater may worsen, and that two months of flood conditions may await residents who insist upon staying put. A stubborn resistance to leaving, they add, will only waste time and resources of an already-overtaxed search-and-rescue operation. The mission remains dangerous, as a nonfatal crash of a civilian rescue helicopter late Sunday illustrated.

Dennis Nunez, a Louisiana wildlife officer, has seen hundreds of people living deep in the neighborhoods. Some told rescue workers to move on, to save others first. In one mostly Vietnamese neighborhood, people were feeling comfortable enough to have gone fishing, and were drying fresh fish on their porches. "They won't come out," says Mr. Nunez. Less panic, more patience

As response to Katrina enters its second week, 17,000 National Guardsmen patrolled the Big Easy by foot, helicopter, and boat, and the atmosphere shifted from one of panic and scattered violence to one of a soggy siege. Here on the Jefferson Parish line, a few miles from where the 17th Street Canal was breached last Tuesday, the water line has fallen hardly at all as of Sunday afternoon.

On Sunday, many hangers-on gave up. Rescuers pulled one woman, barely conscious, from her home, mattress and all. The job of the day: Extricating a frightened, 400-pound man. Another woman came ashore with three cat carriers, each one containing three cats.

But the conflict between the stranded and the rescuers is playing itself out in ways that, at times, seem bizarre. Rescue helicopters have even come under sniper fire, police say, as some resist relocation.

"It's hard on the rescuers, to risk their lives and have somebody say, 'I don't want to be saved.' It boggles your mind," says Lt. Col. Pete Schneider, a spokesman for the Homeland Security Department, in Baton Rouge, La.

Rescue volunteer Jef Talbert, who has arrived from Texas in a friend's flat-bottom boat (which he's promised to return without bullet holes), says it's an odd feeling to be loading every gun he owns before he heads out to rescue people.

Scott, Waters, and six other men are locals who are aiding with the rescue, camping on a plot of high ground. They've rescued hundreds since last Tuesday, asking only food and water in return. They're using whatever equipment is at hand - whether an 18-wheel truck (which they stalled out in deep water) or a waterski boat with a 130 horsepower Yamaha four-stroke on the back.

As they shove aside downed wires and look for submerged cars and street signs that can damage the propeller on "their" boat, Scott and Waters shout at one house and toot the horn. Two men emerge onto the porch.

"Day 7," yells Anthony Belt, refusing his rescuers, indicating he's got food. He also has a flat-bottom sloop in case he really has to get out.

As the number of those in need, or want, of being rescued diminishes, rescuers are shifting priorities: If they see someone has stockpiled supplies, they've stopped handing out more food.

"If they're not coming out, we're not going to force them," says Lieutenant Colonel Schneider. "But we can't keep coming back to resupply." Fish dinner

If some survivors are struggling, increasingly aware that they are surrounded by a huge septic tank, others seem to be doing fine. Rescuers report seeing large Vietnamese families cooking fish and "looking very comfortable," some even keeping fish in makeshift pools, then hanging them out to dry.

Indeed, the stayers-on may be clinging to a belief that, beyond the muck, is hope. For some, a desire to protect their property is the driving factor in their decisions to stay, and others simply have nowhere else to go and are clinging to their patch of the globe. After surviving for a week in hellish conditions, many say perhaps things will only get better, suggests Mike Lindell, a psychologist at Louisiana State University. "We're in uncharted territory for human behavior."

Two women who had walked through chest-high water from the Superdome to their homes to get fresh clothes were glad to jump in Scott's boat, but then started to bicker with each other. Scott wanted none of it. Voice rising, he sounded off, saying the women should lay aside petty differences as they pass through waters of death. As the boat neared a staging area where rescue workers bring their human cargo, one woman, Tina Collins, turned around and said, quietly, "thank you."

Back on the levee, Scott, a tailor and French Quarter doorman, says he's found a new calling that lets him stay close to home, bringing his neighbors to safety when they're ready. Despite the rough conditions, he has no wish to leave.

"They say a rat has many holes, but I've got only one," he says. "And I plan on going down in it."

Crews Plug Levee Break A Week After Storm (AJC/AP)

By Doug Simpson, Associated Press Writer

DOJ_NMG_0002699

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 6, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — A week after Hurricane Katrina swept through, engineers plugged the levee break that had swamped much of the city and floodwaters began to recede, but along with the good news came the mayor's direst prediction yet: as many as 10,000 dead.

Crews had put up metal sheets and dropped 3,000-pound sandbags from helicopters onto the 17th Street canal leading to Lake Pontchartrain to plug the 200-foot-wide gap, and water was being pumped from the canal back into the lake.

State officials and the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers say once the canal level is drawn down two feet, Pumping Station No. 6 can begin pumping water out of the bowl-shaped city.

Some parts of the city already showed slipping floodwaters as the repair neared completion, with the low-lying Ninth Ward dropping more than a foot. In downtown New Orleans, some streets were merely wet rather than swamped.

"We're starting to make the kind of progress that I kind of expected earlier," New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin said even before the plug of the break, which opened up a day after the hurricane and flooded 80 percent of the city.

The news came as many of the 460,000 residents of suburban Jefferson Parish waited in a line of cars that stretched for miles to briefly see their flooded homes, and to scoop up soaked wedding pictures and other cherished mementoes.

"A lot of these people built these houses anticipating some flood water but nobody imagined this," sobbed Diane Dempsey, a 59-year-old retired Army lieutenant colonel who could get no closer than the water line a mile from her Metairie home. "I'm going to pay someone to get me back there, anything I have to do."

"I won't be getting inside today unless I get some scuba gear," added Jack Rabito, a 61-year-old bar owner who waited for a ride to visit his one-story home that had water lapping to the gutters.

Katharine Dastugue was overjoyed to find that floodwaters had gone across her lawn but stopped just inches from her doorstep. As she stood waiting for a boat to take her in, she made a list of things she hoped to salvage before being forced to leave again Wednesday.

"If I can just get my kids' baby photos," she said. "You can't replace those."

In New Orleans, Nagin upticked his estimate of the probable death toll in his city from merely thousands, telling NBC's "Today" show, "It wouldn't be unreasonable to have 10,000."

As law enforcement officers and even bands of civilians — including actor Sean Penn — launched door-to-door searches of the city for survivors, they were running up against a familiar obstacle: People who had been trapped more than a week in damaged homes yet refused to leave.

"We have advised people that this city has been destroyed," said Deputy Police Superintendent W.J. Riley. "There is nothing here for them and no reason for them to stay — no food, no jobs, nothing."

Riley, who estimated fewer than 10,000 people were left in the city, said some simply did not want to leave their homes — while others were hanging back to engage in criminal activities, such as looting.

Nagin said the city had the authority to force residents to evacuate but didn't say if it was taking that step. He did, however, detail one heavy-handed tactic: Water will no longer be handed out to people who refuse to leave.

With almost a third of New Orleans' police force missing in action, a caravan of law enforcement vehicles, emblazoned with emblems from across the nation and blue lights flashing, poured into the city to help establish order on the city's anarchic streets.

Between 400 to 500 officers on New Orleans' 1600-member force were unaccounted for. Some lost their homes. Some were looking for families. "Some simply left because they said they could not deal with the catastrophe," Riley said. Officers were being cycled off duty and given five-day vacations in Las Vegas and Atlanta, where they also would receive counseling.

At a news conference in Baton Rouge, police Superintendent Eddie Compass denied that officers deserted in droves, acknowledging some officers abandoned their jobs but saying he didn't know how many.

Two police officers killed themselves. Another was shot in the head. Compass said 150 had to be rescued from eight feet of water and others had gotten infections from walking through the murky soup of chemicals and pollutants in flooded areas.

"No police department in the history of the world was asked to do what we were asked," Compass said with a mix of anger and pride.

The leader of troops patrolling New Orleans declared the city largely free of the lawlessness that plagued it in the days following the hurricane. And he angrily lashed out at a reporter who suggested search-and-rescue operations were being stymied by random gunfire and lawlessness.

"Go on the streets of New Orleans — it's secure," said Army Lt. Gen. Russel Honore. "Have you been to New Orleans? Did anybody accost you?"

Hopeful signs of recovery were accompanied by President Bush's second visit to Louisiana, which exposed a continued rift between state and federal officials over the slowness of a relief effort. The first significant convoy of food, water and medicine didn't arrive in New Orleans until four full days after the hurricane, and the mayor and others said some survivors died awaiting relief.

Louisiana's largest newspaper, The Times-Picayune, called for the firing of every official at the Federal Emergency Management Agency in an open letter to President Bush that it published.

At a stop in Baton Rouge, Bush said all levels of the government were doing their best, and he pledged: "So long as any life is in danger, we've got work to do."

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco has refused to sign over National Guard control to the federal government and has turned to a Clinton administration official, former Federal Emergency Management Agency chief James Lee Witt, to help run relief efforts.

Blanco, a Democrat, was not informed of the timing of Bush's visit, nor was she immediately invited to meet him or travel with him. In fact, Blanco's office didn't know when Bush was coming until told by reporters.

Late Monday, Blanco denied there was tension with Bush.

"We'd like to stop the voices out there trying to create a divide. There is no divide," she said. "Every leader in this nation wants to see this problem solved."

In Texas, U.S. Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt declared a public health emergency for that state, saying it would speed up federal assistance to help almost 240,000 storm evacuees — the most of any state.

While the New Orleans' refugees were mostly poor and black, Jefferson Parish brought the storm's destruction to a much wider economic cross-section.

The sprawling parish stretches from Grand Isle on the Gulf of Mexico to Lake Pontchartrain in the north, and includes some of the metropolitan area's most exclusive neighborhoods.

In the enclave of Old Metairie, the rows of palatial, six-bedroom homes sustained little structural damage but had some of the worst flooding. Water rippled up the knobs at front doors and completely covered Mercedes-Benzes and BMWs in garages.

Many residents were happy that the storm spared their homes, but angry that the failure of the levee system left them swamped. Some were considering a lawsuit against the federal government for having a levee that could survive no more than a Category 3 hurricane.

"That's what's so devastating, that goddamned levee breaking," said Bobby Patrick, who is now staying in Houston. "My home didn't lose a shingle but it's got six feet of water in it."

Since the storm, rumors had swirled that looters had crossed over the parish line and begun breaking into evacuated homes in Jefferson. Many were relieved to return home Monday to find their belongings untouched.

Across the neighborhood, residents took what items they could fit in a boat. One woman loaded up her boat with her collection of cashmere sweaters, her cat and the 1957 Leica camera that belonged to her grandfather. A man packed his pickup truck with his silverware, his wife's clothes and a cherished animal figurine.

Unlike the poor in New Orleans, these refugees had other places to go. And few here planned to stay through what could be a long recovery. With police checkpoints on every major street corner, even looting was not a major concern.

Said personal trainer Rod McClave: "I'm more concerned about them damaging my stuff just for the hell of it."

New Horrors Discovered As Recovery Effort Goes On (MH)

By Lee Hill Kavanaugh, Natalie Pompilio And Martin Merzer

The Miami Herald, September 6, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0002701

NEW ORLEANS - Ghastly new evidence of Hurricane Katrina's horror emerged Monday night when a sheriff reported the recovery of 22 bodies lashed together around a pole - a desperate, futile attempt to survive the storm.

Sheriff Jack Stephens of St. Bernard Parish, just east of New Orleans, said rescuers found the bodies tied with rope and wrapped around a pole in the tiny village of Violet along the eastern bank of the Mississippi River.

The bodies were found soon after the storm in a flooded area of the village but still haven't been identified, he said. He said he believed they had tied themselves together, one by one, so they could escape the rising water.

The report came on a day when rescue crews still sought the living and the dead, and when New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin shared a grim estimate of Katrina's human toll - as many as 10,000 people dead, though he didn't cite the basis for that statement.

And more: Biloxi Mayor A.J. Holloway said he expected the death toll in his Mississippi city to exceed that of Hurricane Camille, which killed 200 people in 1969.

Meanwhile Monday, engineers repaired the ruptured 17th Street Canal levee in New Orleans and floodwaters receded a bit as some suburban residents, carrying suitcases and heavy hearts, briefly returned to their homes and sifted through the sodden debris.

Many of those who briefly returned to suburban Jefferson Parish or stayed there throughout the ordeal reported a landscape dotted with bodies.

On Stella Street, Eric Breaux said he saw 15 corpses, most of them caught in barbed wire at the Metairie Country Club. "I don't want to see it again," he said. "I personally tied three dead bodies to street signs."

Authorities permitted residents of the area, a parish just west of New Orleans that includes Metairie and Kenner, to inspect their houses and recover possessions worth removing.

Many neighborhoods still were flooded to the rooftops, but others had dried out, leaving behind an awful, reeking residue. About 460,000 people lived in the suburban parish before the storm, and now some labored on a day that felt like anything but a holiday.

"We have lost everything," Carol Crokem of Kenner said as she surveyed what was left of the home on West Tulane Lane where she and her husband raised three children and two grandchildren.

Maggots gathered at her front door, and sewage and garbage polluted the interior.

In Metaire, Vinson Serio, 59, stacked dining room chairs outside while his wife, Claire, 57, swept malodorous black water from their home. Among the destroyed possessions: his daughter's never worn wedding dress.

"I'm grateful it wasn't death," Serio said. "But it's bad as far as destruction, emotional destruction."

As they and others viewed the wreckage of their houses and their lives - and as the water in and around New Orleans slowly receded, President Bush conducted another partial tour of the region, though he again bypassed New Orleans.

"We're here for the long term," Bush said during a stop in Poplarville, Miss., 45 miles inland but savaged by Katrina. He's been harshly criticized over the federal response.

At the same time, rescue crews continued searching for people still believed trapped throughout the vast region assaulted by Katrina more than a week ago - and for people who chose to stay.

"To our surprise, there are still thousands of people - thousands of people - inside this city who we are trying to identify and relocate," said Warren Riley, deputy chief of New Orleans' police force. "There is absolutely no reason for them to stay. No jobs, no food. ...

"We advise people that this city has been destroyed."

Though there were some exceptions, the large-scale rescues of the weekend seemed nearly over, signifying a shift from finding the living to preparing to recover the dead.

Crews aboard U.S. Navy search-and-rescue helicopters spent much of the morning searching in vain, buzzing the rooftops, floating just above putrid, fuel-stained olive-black waters.

Car and truck roofs remained submerged, and holes in rooftops attested to previously successful rescues.

"You see some of the roofs without holes right next to the ones that have them," said Ren Owens, 26, a Naval rescue officer. "It kind of makes you wonder what's in there or who's in there."

DOJ_NMG_0002702

Throughout the day, squads of National Guard troops probed sections of the city, searching for holdouts or the trapped, producing war-like scenes that seemed almost cinematic.

In the city's Garden District, troops formed lines along either side of the oak-lined streets and conducted reconnaissance missions. They found 56 people in a parking garage a few buildings away from their newly commandeered headquarters on St. Charles Avenue.

They picked up 85 more at the intersection of Napoleon and St. Charles avenues, where rescue boats dropped off people plucked from flooded houses.

The order for forced removals hadn't yet come, said Maj. David Parker of the Oklahoma National Guard, but if it does, he's prepared. "We'll use sheer force," he said, "or coercion of some type."

Elsewhere, at a spot not yet reached by the patrols, a helicopter fluttered overhead and a woman yelled at it. "Please come down," Jarnette Williams said, waving her arms frantically. "We want to leave."

Riley said at least 400 of his 1,600 officers were unaccounted for, but 4,000 soldiers, National Guard troops and police officers from other cities and states augmented his demoralized police force. He said they were bringing order to a city that had descended into anarchy.

Nagin, the New Orleans mayor, said Sunday night that all uniformed New Orleans officers would be pulled off the streets and sent for evaluation and counseling, but Riley offered no such indication Monday.

"We feel the city is very secure," Riley said, though he reminded everyone of the magnitude of the challenge and the scale of the work that remained. "This was probably the greatest catastrophe in an American city."

Asked for his estimate of the death toll, Nagin told NBC's "Today" program: "It wouldn't be unreasonable to have 10,000" dead.

During his visit, Bush stopped in Baton Rouge, a city largely untouched by Katrina but now nearly overwhelmed with evacuees. Its population mushroomed from 225,000 to 325,000 within a week, city officials said, and soon could reach 450,000.

Although the federal effort has been widely criticized as slow, insufficient and uncoordinated, Bush was upbeat.

"All levels of the government are doing the best they can," he said during a stop at a shelter at the Bethany World Prayer Center in Baton Rouge. "So long as any life is in danger, we've got work to do.

"Where it's not going right," he said "we're going to make it right."

Stung by accusations of racism, given that most of the victims are black and poor, he met with several African-American ministers, but many people remained unconvinced.

"How else can you explain it?" said Ronald Walters, a political science professor and director of the African American Leadership Institute at the University of Maryland. "Look at how the president responded to hurricanes that took place on the other side of Florida in predominantly white populations. ...

"White life has always been more valuable than black life," Walters charged. "That explains it for people."

Bush hasn't responded directly to the allegations.

In Small Town, Huge Morgue Takes Shape (NYT)

By Peter Applebome

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

SAINT GABRIEL, La., Sept. 5 - After the wind, after the flood, after countless bodies are fished from muddy bayous or lifted off street corners or carried down from roofs or attics, the road ends here.

At a warehouse next to the modest city hall in this ragged town just past where the sprawl of Baton Rouge gives way to farmland, refrigerated trucks on Sunday began the task of bringing what is expected to be thousands of bodies to the temporary mortuary set up to process victims of Hurricane Katrina.

All day long on Monday, trucks bearing equipment and supplies and sometimes victims clattered down the narrow street just over the railroad tracks to what is called the Disaster Portable Mortuary Unit. There a staff of 100 workers - morticians, forensic pathologists, anthropologists, medical examiners, coroners, fingerprint technicians, radiologists, dental technicians and others - will identify bodies and prepare them for burial.

No one knows how long it will take or how many bodies to expect.

Mayor C. Ray Nagin of New Orleans warned on the NBC program "Today" that "it wouldn't be unreasonable to have 10,000" dead in the city.

Capt. Marlon Defillo, spokesman for the New Orleans police, said city officials did not expect to have even a rough estimate of the number of dead until the end of this week.

"It's not going to be low," Captain Defillo said.

So far only 23 bodies have been brought to the mortuary, and the official death toll for Louisiana stands at 71. Officials said the low count was due mostly to the arduous recovery process and the desire for accuracy. But some also said there was no way to make any kind of reliable projection, so the estimate of 10,000 deaths could turn out to be way off base.

Whatever the number, nearly all bodies will come here, where officials say they are committed to what seems an almost impossibly contradictory mission - handling with dispatch the victims in a death toll that could rival that of any natural disaster in American history and treating each body with the knowledge that it was someone's father, someone's mother, someone's child.

"Our goal is to do everything we can under the circumstances to treat each body with as much dignity and respect as we possibly can," said Bob Johannessen, a spokesman for the Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals, which is managing the mortuary operation with the Disaster Mortuary Operational Response Team of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. "We're trying to treat them all as individuals."

Mobile units in New Orleans began collecting bodies from streets and flooded areas on Monday and going house to house in some neighborhoods to look for the dead. Until now, bodies had been left to rot in the streets while rescuers focused on searching for survivors.

Some corpses were tied to road signs and electricity poles so they would not float away, but many have decomposed beyond recognition.

Mr. Johannessen said bodies would first be taken to collection sites where preliminary information would be gathered to help identify them, including where they were found and any documentation or personal effects found with them.

They will then be put in body bags, loaded onto refrigerated trucks and sent to this town of 5,300 just south of Baton Rouge, home to two prisons and the only long-term treatment facility for Hansen's disease, or leprosy, in the continental United States.

The mortuary facility is about the size of football field and had been used by businesses to store merchandise. It can process about 140 bodies a day and is set up to accommodate 1,000 bodies, but it can be upgraded to handle "in excess of 5,000," Mr. Johannessen said. He said he expected that the facility would be able to handle whatever need arose.

Mr. Johannessen said bodies taken to the center, many of which have been decomposing in toxic water for a week, would first be decontaminated so they can be handled safely.

Then officials will begin gathering forensic data, including dental X-rays, photographs, fingerprints and DNA samples, in an effort to identify bodies. Medical records, including information like pacemaker serial numbers or evidence of artificial hips or knees, will be compiled into a profile of each victim and stored in a database made accessible to families looking for missing people. Relatives will not be allowed to visit the bodies at the mortuary, Mr. Johannessen said.

The state is looking for burial space, and victims not immediately identified will be buried there. Officials said families could later move bodies to family plots.

Local residents, who were not told about the facility in advance, had mixed reactions to its presence. Chief Keith Ambeau of the police department acknowledged that some residents had expressed fears about health, odors and the stigma of a giant mortuary operating, perhaps for months, next to a residential area.

"It's human nature to have some concerns about bringing in dead bodies," Chief Ambeau said. "People are going to worry about disease, contamination. But I've been saying all morning, my office is right here. I'm not going to put myself in danger. I think for the most part people are compassionate here. Their hearts go out to those people. New Orleans is only 75 miles away. Those are our brothers, our sisters, our loved ones."

But at a house just a few hundred yards from the mortuary, three residents shuddered at the thought, with one woman expressing concerns about safety and property values.

And echoing the issues of class and race brought up by the tragedy, she asked why it was put in her neighborhood, its residents largely, but not entirely, black and lower income. The per capita income in the town is $8,952, compared with $16,912 for the state and $21,587 for the nation.

"You look around this neighborhood for yourself," said the woman, who is black and did not want to be identified. "You look at what color lives here. What their economic situation is. There's plenty of empty land in Louisiana. Why put it here?"

A few houses closer to the site, Paula Chong, who has two grown children and lives with a baby granddaughter, said she would prefer the mortuary to be elsewhere but believed it would be safe.

"We just need to turn to God," Ms. Chong said. "All I ask is that they be careful and do everything in accordance with the law."

Besides, she said, in the extended family that is south Louisiana, it is a facility that she may need, too.

Counting her missing cousins, Ms. Chong said: "I've got, what, 4, 5, 9 or 10 still missing? Lots of my cousins. So why would I complain when I still have family of my own missing?"

Along Gulf, Aiding The Living And Counting The Dead (WP)

By Timothy Dwyer And Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 5 -- Federal officials opened a vast morgue to collect the dead and health officials scrambled to create a health care network to help the living, while states across the country struggled to find housing and other provisions for the more than 1 million people driven from their homes by Hurricane Katrina.

Although the storm's announced death toll was just over 200 on Monday, officials began to brace themselves and the public for a body count that could reach well into the thousands.

Meanwhile, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers said it had closed gaps in levees damaged by the hurricane and had begun pumping water out of the city and into Lake Ponchartrain. The flood in the swamped Ninth Ward had dropped by a foot, and downtown streets were wet instead of inundated.

The vast scope of the calamity triggered by the storm was still emerging. officials estimated that more than 1 million people -- many of whom fled with only the clothes on their back and a few prized possessions stuffed in a bag -- have been forced from their homes, most likely for many months.

Amid mounting recriminations about the slow pace of the government response to the calamity unleashed by last week's storm, President Bush visited the stricken area for the second time in four days, and his administration appointed a federal official to assume control of recovery efforts in storm-ravaged New Orleans.

Homeland Security Director Michael Chertoff tapped Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen to coordinate the government's relief efforts in the city. Allen will report to beleaguered FEMA Director Michael D. Brown, who will keep responsibility for the rest of the Katrina-affected Gulf Coast region.

Bush also declared a state of emergency in eight states -- as far away as Utah and West Virginia -- bringing to 13 the number eligible for special federal aid as a result of the hurricane.

Federal agents, troops and law enforcement officers from around the country continued to pour into New Orleans, and police officials expressed confidence the city was mostly safe from the marauding gangs that had terrorized citizens in the storm's chaotic aftermath.

The rapidly growing scale of the effort was evident in the official statistics of federal personnel involved as of midday Monday: 38,000 National Guardsmen, 6,000 FEMA responders and 4,000 from the U.S. Coast Guard, according to the Department of Homeland Security. The USS Iwo Jima, an amphibious assault ship, pulled into New Orleans port Monday and will assist in aid efforts.

Across the state, doctors and nurses worked feverishly to cobble together a new health care network, transforming abandoned stores, basketball arenas and other spaces into hospitals to treat the hurricane's victims.

The relief effort even grew to include counterfeit clothes, 100,000 items of which were taken from U.S. Customs Service storehouses and distributed to evacuees in Houston's Astrodome. Two cruise ships anchored in Galveston, Tex., were to begin taking on evacuees as well -- as many as 2,600 each.

About 990,000 customers remained without power Monday because of Hurricane Katrina, the Energy Department said, down from 1.3 million on Sunday.

Allen's appointment in New Orleans came as the president moved to reassert his leadership in the wake of withering criticism about what many local officials and residents saw as his administration's lethargic response to the deadly storm. Bush made his second visit since Friday to the devastated region, talking to evacuees in a church-run shelter and meeting with disaster-relief officials in Louisiana before speaking to emergency personnel in Poplarville, Miss.

"I understand the damage. I understand the devastation. I understand the destruction. I understand how long it's going to take," Bush said in Mississippi. "And we're with you. That's what I want you to know."

As Bush visited the region, rescue workers continued their search for survivors. As choppers maneuvered overhead, rescuers trolled debris-strewn city streets in flat-bottom boats, going house to house, peering in windows and knocking on doors in an effort to evacuate the estimated 10,000 New Orleans residents thought to still be in the city.

Often, they found people who refuse to leave.

Keith Edwards, a rescue worker from Arkansas, tried in vain to talk an elderly woman into abandoning her home in a public housing complex not far from the Superdome. Sitting at a table in her darkened apartment, the woman refused his offer to be evacuated by airboat. "Hon, you don't know how dangerous this is?" Edwards said. ". . . the water out in your front yard will kill you."

One New Orleans police officer said the search was still focused on the living. "We're going up to buildings looking for people," said the officer, who said he was not authorized to speak on the record. "When you break the window and the smell comes back at you, you know they're dead." And they move on. "You just can't worry about the dead right now," he explained.

But other workers are. The bodies of those left dead in Katrina's wake were scheduled to start to arrive Monday in a massive warehouse outside Baton Rouge. Lifted from the fetid waters swamping this city, they will be transported in refrigerated trucks to the temporary morgue. A similar morgue has been set up in Mississippi.

As officials forged ahead with the recovery work, Bush spent the day near the storm-ravaged Gulf Coast. Some critics said the impression of a slow federal response to Katrina was only deepened by the president's visit to the region last week, during which Bush seemed tentative in his comments and was kept away from some of the most dire misery spawned by the storm.

Some civil rights leaders have questioned whether the response to the storm was hindered by the fact that many of those most severely affected are poor and black -- a charge dismissed by federal officials. In the face of the growing denunciations, senior administration officials have fired back by blaming local officials for the inadequate response to the hurricane.

Bush seemed intent on rising above the finger-pointing during his visit, saying that "all levels of government are doing the best they can" to restore order and to address basic needs of the storm victims.

"So long as anybody's life is in danger, we've got work to do," Bush said. "That's why I want people to be assured we're going to do it."

Bush posed for pictures with children and talked with several of the 800 people staying at Bethel World Prayer Center in Baker, a few miles north of the Baton Rouge airport. Some asked the president about the growing use of the word "refugee" to describe them.

"A refugee is a prisoner of war or something," said Paulette Jolla, a New Orleans who left before the storm hit. Also in on the conversation was Terry Thompson, 42, of New Orleans, who said the president agreed to urge officials to start referring to those who escaped the storm as "displaced citizens."

"I don't know who came up with the term 'refugee' anyway," said Thompson. "He said if that term was making us feel like we were less, he didn't want to do that."

Thompson, who served in the National Guard in the Persian Gulf, said the military should have been called upon earlier to bring in helicopters to help evacuate residents and deliver food and water. "He's going over there to save the Iraqis and all that," Thompson said. "But he responded terribly to this tragedy."

Others were more charitable. "It's good that he came," said Iris Henderson, 38, who is at the shelter with her daughter and one grandchild. "People said he doesn't care but it seemed like he does. He showed that he's human. He's trying to do what he can."

Among those joining Bush on his visit to the shelter were the Rev. T.D. Jakes, who is one of the nation's best known African American religious leaders; Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (D), first lady Laura Bush, Baton Rouge Mayor Melvin L. "Kip" Holden and Chertoff.

As Bush visited the region, some residents of Jefferson Parish were allowed to return briefly to their homes for the first time since they were forced to flee. A line of vehicles miles long began moving into the parish west of New Orleans at about 6 a.m .; officials planned to allow traffic in for 12 hours, though they encouraged residents to inspect their property, pick up personal items and leave.

Mississippi officials said the situation in the state was improving -- slowly. The availability of fuel continued to be "a significant problem" in some areas, said Gov. Haley Barbour (R), but, overall, he said, things were getting better.

Many Of The Dead Never To Be Identified (AP)

By Tim Dahlberg, Associated Press Writer

The AP, September 5, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — They died on flooded city streets in the Big Easy and in country homes in Mississippi. One survived seven months of combat in Iraq only to die near his boyhood home. An 80-year-old woman died sitting in a bedroom chair when a tree crashed through the roof. One man was killed when he went out to his car to charge his cell phone during the storm.

A woman known only as "Vera" was struck by a car after the hurricane hit, according to her husband.

Most of the dead from Hurricane Katrina don't have names yet. Many will never be identified because their bodies decomposed in the floodwaters and heat before they were found.

For some, a few details are emerging from relatives who want them remembered:

_ Jewelry shop owner David "Kip" Logan, 49, liked to play golf and hunt and attended a Baptist church. His last act was to tell his wife to run as a tree cracked and fell on the porch of his Laurel, Miss., home, collapsing an awning on top of him.

Deborah Logan suffered two broken vertebrae and broken fingers, but stayed with her husband as neighbors pulled him from the wreckage, dug a damaged car out of the debris and drove him to the hospital.

"I held his head in my hands the whole way," Deborah Logan said.

_ For some reason, 43-year-old Vicky Thaggard wrote a letter to her preacher four months ago describing how she wanted her funeral carried out. She died when a tree fell on her car in Leake County, Miss.

"Different people think you know before you die," said Kay Cain, her niece. "I don't know. ... Why else would she leave a letter like that?"

_ Whenever Merry Thompson went out for a drive, she was accompanied by a 3 1/2-foot-tall stuffed toy, Sylvester the cat. It was a tribute to her late father, who was named Sylvester, and it was guaranteed to draw stares from drivers around Eagle Lake, Miss.

The 43-year-old died when a tree fell on her mobile home.

"She's crazy — not looney bin crazy — but she just had a lot of personality," her son, Nick Thompson, said. "She's very outgoing and warm."

_ Josh E. Russell had spent a tour in Iraq, then switched to the National Guard from the Marine Corps so he could spend more time at home. The 27-year-old was killed when the Humvee he was riding in hit debris on a highway in Pearl River County, Miss.

Russell was nervous about being called into action, sent into the teeth of the hurricane, said his widow, Jamie Russell.

"He didn't want to go, because he knew it was going to be a bad storm. But he went, because that was his duty," she said.

These are just a few of the dead whose names are known and whose stories are being told. But there are sure to be thousands more in months ahead.

Many, like the man whose body was on a wooden cart on New Orleans' Rampart Street near downtown may simply be buried in anonymous pauper's graves. The elderly man was wrapped in a child's bedsheet decorated with the cartoon characters Batman, Robin and the Riddler. He had one shoe on, one off.

Identifying the dead will be a daunting task, made even more desperate because many will likely be bloated and decomposed by the time they're taken away. FEMA officials said they would try to locate dental records, but urged family members to bring in photos, fingerprints or even a toothbrush or provide DNA samples.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff warned the nation to prepare for the worst as bodies believed to be in houses and in floodwaters are recovered.

"It is going to be about as ugly of a scene as I think you can imagine," Chertoff said.

Slowly, though, some faces are being matched with the dead, mostly by family members.

For days, mystery shrouded the body of "Vera" as closely as the sheet that eventually cloaked her body. She stayed there in the Garden District, at the corner of Jackson and Magazine, with a spraypainted tribute on the sheet over her: "Here lies Vera. God help us."

Vera turned out to be 66-year-old Elvira Smith, who lived with her common-law husband, C.N. Keene, about five blocks from where she was killed. Sitting shirtless and with a growth of beard on the front porch of his modest duplex, Keene said he last saw his wife Monday after the hurricane struck.

Keene said she was on her way to Jewel's grocery when someone driving in the frantic aftermath of the hurricane struck her just a few feet from the store entrance and sped away. The next day, Keene said he walked over and put a bedspread over her body but he didn't want to return to it.

On Saturday, Keene was sitting on his porch when a man came up to him with some news.

"Some guy I didn't even know named John came by and said, 'I've just buried Elvira in the park,'" Keene said. Her body remained in the same spot, but a short wall of bricks had been built around her, anchoring the tarp.

"I told him I appreciated it," Keene said.

Bacterial Disease Afflicts Some Evacuees (LAT)

By Scott Gold

The Los Angeles Times, September 6, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Authorities said Monday that some of Hurricane Katrina's evacuees have contracted a bacterial disease that is considered a more benign cousin of cholera, but is potentially fatal in people whose immune systems have been compromised.

Officials at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta said the bacterium, vibrio vulnificus, may have been picked up by people with open wounds who were forced to wade through polluted floodwaters for a long time.

Von Roebuck, a CDC spokesman, said officials have detected the disease among some storm evacuees and stragglers but have not been able to determine how many cases there are. It does not appear that anyone has died, Roebuck said.

Since flooding began, authorities have predicted that New Orleans could be stricken with a host of diseases, particularly as unretrieved bodies remained in the water. This appears to be the first confirmation of illness caused by the storm and the flood.

New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin said Monday that the possibility of epidemics is a critical concern.

"The water quality in the streets continues to deteriorate," he said. "There is some really nasty looking stuff out there. I worry about it every day. The more time that passes, there are more dead bodies left floating, and more mosquitoes breeding and hatching. They bite people who are dead."

Nagin said he is also concerned about a wide outbreak of the potentially fatal West Nile virus. For two days, he has called upon the federal government to provide crop dusters that can coat the city with chemicals to kill mosquitoes breeding in the floodwaters. That had not occurred by Monday evening.

He said he is also concerned about airborne toxic hazards and natural gas in the area.

Those health threats are why every resident must leave the city for now — even those living on dry land, he said, adding that they "will be able to come back."

Vibrio vulnificus belongs to the same family as cholera — and those stricken with the bacterium were only discovered, officials said, because tests were done amid false reports that cholera had been discovered among evacuees.

Among healthy people, vibrio vulnificus causes vomiting, diarrhea and abdominal pain but is generally not life-threatening. It can be readily cured with antibiotics such as doxycycline or cephalosporins, with no long-term effects.

It is substantially more serious in people with chronic liver disease or people who have compromised immune systems, such as those taking transplant drugs. In those cases, the bacterium escapes into the bloodstream, where it causes fever and chills, septic shock — characterized by sharply decreased blood pressure — and blistering skin lesions.

About half of those who contract bloodstream infections die, according to the CDC.

There is no evidence that the bacterium spreads from human to human.

The bacterium can also cause skin infections if people have open wounds, which can lead to skin breakdown and ulceration.

About 45 hospitalizations and 16 deaths are reported each year in the Gulf Coast states, but many experts believe the actual number of cases is far higher. Most cases occur between May and October, when the ocean is warmer.

In New Orleans' 9th Ward, O'Neil Broyard, 67, said Monday that he is not concerned about the threat of disease, although several feet of increasingly fetid water stands just behind his business, the Saturn Bar.

Broyard has been mucking around in the water for days. During the height of the flooding, 2 feet of water was in the bar and he spent three days cleaning it out. He said he took precautions every time he slogged through the water.

"I washed up good," he said. "I got that antibacterial soap and I just put it on my feet."

Like thousands of others left in town, Broyard rejected the mayor's call to evacuate. Instead, he said he was intent on guarding his bar, a small, strange gem in the east of the city that has acquired a cult following over the years for its collection of surreal, comic paintings by a local artist and its earthy, no-nonsense management.

Hurricane Refugees Reach Safety Carrying Many Health Problems (WSJ)

By Betsy McKay, Marilyn Chase and Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

Hurricane victims moving out of the floodwaters of New Orleans and elsewhere are arriving at shelters and medical facilities with troubling health problems, including infectious diseases caused by exposure to contaminated water.

Doctors are seeing many patients with infected wounds and gastrointestinal illnesses, and worry that more are coming in the days ahead. A reported outbreak of gastrointestinal illness sickened a large number of people at a Mississippi shelter. Doctors also are treating a wave of patients with broken bones, dehydration and chronic illnesses such as diabetes and heart disease that were destabilized during the past week.

To prevent disease outbreaks, the federal Health and Human Services Department shipped 90,000 doses of tetanus vaccine, 22,000 doses of Hepatitis A vaccine and 36,000 doses of Hepatitis B vaccine over the weekend to states and health facilities, said HHS spokeswoman Christina Pearson. The department also has provided antibiotics as well as medications for chronic illnesses such as heart disease, diabetes and anxiety. Overall, the government said it has deployed 100 tons of medications and other supplies for victims of the hurricane.

A temporary government medical facility set up last week in Baton Rouge, La., is filling more than 1,400 prescriptions a day, said Ms. Pearson. The facility has seen about 3,500 patients since Tuesday, and an average of about 100 of its 250 beds have been filled.

At a huge Red Cross shelter at the River Center complex in Baton Rouge, volunteer physician Chris Montgomery says he and other doctors have treated several evacuees with skin infections from contaminated water, as well as lacerations and a few cases of diarrhea.

"We're very worried about easily spreadable skin infections," says Dr. Montgomery, a family physician from Poplar Bluff, Ark. He is particularly concerned about serious infections such as an overgrowth of bacteria in the colon that is common in nursing homes and hospitals. The shelter's approximately 6,000 residents include some elderly and infirm patients. The makeshift clinic also is providing continuing medical care to many shelter residents with diabetes and heart and lung problems.

To minimize infections, the Red Cross staff are requiring all shelter residents and visitors to clean their hands with hand sanitizer at the entrance. Dr. Montgomery says he also is coating the inner rim of his nose with antibiotic ointment, to ward off bacteria that he may contract from patients' coughs. He says he also is concerned about viral gastrointestinal diseases, although there have been very few cases yet, and no cases of dysentery. Flu is another concern for him -- the season will start in a month or two.

Joseph Guarisco, chief of the emergency department at Ochsner Clinic Foundation in New Orleans, said he saw several cases of gastroenteritis with nausea, vomiting and fever on Friday due to contaminated water or food. A spokeswoman later added that the emergency room over the weekend mostly treated broken bones, including in people brought in by search-and-rescue teams, and dehydration and exhaustion of the elderly. The hospital was seeking to restore the full range of services; it performed a heart catheterization Sunday and was planning lung surgery and a heart bypass.

Dr. Joseph Dalovisio, head of the department of infectious diseases at Ochsner, said he is concerned mostly about tetanus infections and gastrointestinal illnesses related to contaminated food and water, rather than exotic illnesses such as cholera. Noting there were dozens of cases of the mosquito-borne West Nile virus before the storm, he says he is "worried about mosquitoes now that people are out of their houses."

Edward Hill, president of the American Medical Association, said scores of Katrina-affected patients are being brought to the Good Samaritan Clinic, an outpatient center where he works in Tupelo, Miss., about 150 miles north of the most severely hit parts of the state.

"The predominant problem is the lack of medication for hypertension, diabetes and people suffering from heart problems," said Dr. Hill. Physicians in Tupelo have donated drugs, including samples provided to them by drug companies. Pharmacists on site are helping to match patients with available drugs.

Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt ventured to several affected areas to meet with local health and political leaders. He also signed an order on Sunday that officially declared a public-health emergency in Texas, which will allow Medicaid recipients arriving from other states to continue to get coverage from the health-insurance program for the poor.

Improvising To Replace Services For Many Thousands (WP)

By Ceci Connolly

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La., Sept. 5 -- Legions of doctors and nurses are frantically patching together a new medical care network to handle the swelling flow of Hurricane Katrina's victims. The extraordinary process includes the task of converting basketball arenas, an abandoned Kmart and even the New Orleans airport into working hospitals and clinics.

The storm -- and more significantly the flooding, lack of food and exposure to the baking sun that doctors say left victims to "rot alive" -- have presented medical workers with an overwhelming challenge. Overnight, New Orleans and surrounding communities lost 6,000 hospital beds.

The health care demands of this disaster far outstrip those of previous ones. In seven endless days and nights, doctors have delivered babies, revived failed hearts, hooked up diabetics to dialysis, bandaged snakebites and distributed thousands of medications, including many antibiotics for cases of gangrene and other infections caused by the lethal pairing of open wounds and putrid water.

"This is the worst disaster I've ever seen in my life," said Robbie Prepas, a midwife from San Diego who arrived a week ago with a federal Disaster Medical Assistance Team, or DMAT. "And I have been to disasters in Afghanistan, Asia, Africa, Guam after the typhoon."

With an influx of patients who are predominantly poor and in poor health, the emergency medical challenges are compounded by longer-term issues of managing chronic conditions such as high blood pressure, heart disease, diabetes and mental illness. At the same time, officials say they remain on the alert for outbreaks associated with flooding, such as typhoid and cholera, as well as increasing numbers of asthma attacks, fevers, rashes and suicide attempts.

Disaster care in New Orleans was far more difficult than in typical hurricane situations because of the flooding that not only forced downtown hospitals to evacuate but made it impossible for the Federal Emergency Management Agency to set up triage units in hospital parking lots, as it has done in the past.

Predictions about infectious disease outbreaks have yet to come true, though the flooding in New Orleans and disintegrating corpses throughout the Gulf Coast continue to make that a possibility. Hospitals here, operating at full capacity, have seen a spike in cases of pneumonia, stroke, lice, diarrhea and premature birth, said Louis Minsky, medical director of the Baton Rouge emergency response unit.

In many cases, people already weakened by underlying afflictions found the trauma of the storm, the days of heat and a hellacious evacuation through water, sewage and rotting garbage almost too much to endure.

"These are mostly elderly people with chronic diseases who were herded into the convention center with no medications, scared out of their minds," said Lt. Col. Constance McNabb, commander of a Texas Air National Guard unit overseeing medical evacuations in New Orleans. "I don't know how they survived."

More than 5,000 medical workers have been dispatched by the Bush administration to supplement hundreds of state, local and private health care workers. Already, the federal government has flown in 100 tons of medical supplies, including 90,000 doses of tetanus vaccine, portable oxygen tanks, gloves, sutures and antibiotics.

"Every DMAT team in this country is deployed," said FEMA spokesman Marty Bahamonde. A dozen of the 35-person teams have been treating victims in tents at Louis Armstrong International Airport, just outside New Orleans. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention dispatched 140 people, while the Department of Health and Human Services has more than 700 people on the ground.

The unprecedented effort to provide care to tens of thousands of people has required millions of dollars, improvised medical techniques and, in at least one case, theft by a physician who persuaded local police to help him snatch medications from a pharmacy. For one full week now, doctors have worked in MASH-style surroundings, leaning over patients on flimsy military cots, flipping through textbooks to make sense of symptoms they have never seen before.

"I'm a pathologist," said Greg Henderson, a physician who moved to the New Orleans area two weeks ago. Roaming the streets of downtown in his surgical scrubs, Henderson was suddenly confronting rashes and illnesses he hadn't seen since medical school. Armed with a Physicians' Desk Reference -- the pharmaceutical bible -- and the stolen medicines, he administered to the sick and dying in a hotel lobby and the corridors of the city's convention center.

Thousands -- including infants, elderly and patients with existing health problems -- literally sat in the sun for days, with no food, water or medicine. "They basically start to rot alive," Henderson said as he led one group of ill people to McNabb's military helicopters.

Many landed on the track field of Louisiana State University here, where they were whisked into the arena named after basketball legend "Pistol Pete" Maravich. In the arena and an adjacent field house, volunteers from Illinois, New Mexico and the federal Public Health Service Commissioned Corps staffed an 800-bed hospital, making the gymnasium the largest acute care facility in the state.

"You have built a city where there was none before," Surgeon General Richard H. Carmona said after touring the improvised hospital Sunday.

With military precision, patients were designated red for most severe, yellow for serious and green for walking wounded. By Monday afternoon, 3,500 patients had passed through the arena and more than 1,400 prescriptions had been filled, said Capt. Charles McGarvey. "One night we had 800 individuals assessed by Public Health Service officers on buses," he said.

"People who were healthy enough to get up and walk out did," said James Gregory, who came to LSU with the Illinois Medical Emergency Response Team. The bulk of his patients have been diabetics, heart patients, the obese, and elderly with a full range of maladies who have no money, no home, no medications, no medical records and no doctor.

As recovery teams shifted Monday from rescuing people to retrieving the dead, health leaders here struggled to conceive of how they will provide care over the long term for hundreds of thousands of new residents.

It appears Baton Rouge has the hospital beds to serve the expected 400,000 people, said Minsky, the emergency medical director. But that amount of population growth will require as many as 2,000 more nurses and about 200 physicians, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0002711

At the one-week mark, the latest challenge is treating some of the most severe cases, Minsky said. The most recent arrivals, he said, "are fatigued, been under extreme duress, prolonged exposure to the elements and inappropriate nutrition."

Rescues Taper Off; Recovery Ahead (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson And Matt Kelley

USA Today, September 6, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — The surge of rescues of hurricane victims slowed to a trickle Monday as emergency workers steeled themselves for the shift from joyful rescues of those who survived to the grim task of recovering the bodies of those who didn't.

One Army medical evacuation unit saw their rescues ebb from 200 Thursday to one Monday: Alfred Davis, 67, plucked from the roof of a grocery store near the Superdome.

"We have gotten thousands of people out of there," said Maj. Patrick Bossetta, who has been directing the rescue effort for the Louisiana National Guard. "But search-and-rescue is coming to an end. What we likely have left are people who have expired. We have a gruesome task ahead. … We could be stacking bodies like wood."

The rescuers who saved thousands in the week after Hurricane Katrina knew they couldn't find and save everyone. In areas where hundreds of people were plucked to safety a few days ago, there is an eerie stillness punctuated by the rhythmic thud from a fleet of rescue helicopters.

The crew of a Navy MH-60 Knighthawk helicopter anticipated this stage last week when the rescuers saved three elderly people trapped in a boarded-up and flooded New Orleans home.

Petty Officer Royce Burroughs said the only reason his crewmates found the flood victims was a tip from neighbors rescued from their nearby roof.

Petty Officer Nicholas Kontodiakos, a rescue swimmer, waded through the fetid floodwaters to the home and ripped off some of the boards to find bars over the windows. Finally, an elderly woman's face appeared at a window, and she let rescuers in.

The woman and her husband were huddled in the flooded one-story home's attic. Another elderly man, too sick to move, was in a back bedroom. Kontodiakos found him lying naked on a bed amid the floodwaters.

Burroughs came down from the helicopter and helped Kontodiakos get the man into a basket that was winched up to their helicopter.

These three people weren't on their roof; they were too scared, too frail, to climb onto their roof to signal for help. Kontodiakos winced when he thought of how many others like them there are in the flooded city.

"I can't fathom how many old people there are just floating around in their homes," he said.

Burroughs and Kontodiakos were among the dozens of rescuers faced with wrenching choices: Whom to take and whom to leave behind?

Their helicopter could hold only about a dozen survivors at a time. "There are so many people, and you can't get them all," said Burroughs, who operated the helicopter's winch to lower rescuers on a cable and pull survivors to safety. "We know there are dead people because you can't get everyone."

Kontodiakos and Burroughs worked out their own priority list.

"The people I want to grab first are the people who would have the least chance of living: the babies and their mothers, the elderly, the handicapped," Kontodiakos said.

The helicopter crew, based in Norfolk, Va., flew search-and-rescue missions starting Wednesday. The team was based on the amphibious assault ship USS Bataan stationed in the Gulf of Mexico, 50-100 miles from New Orleans. The rescuers flew for 12 hours a day or more, calling off efforts in darkness because of the danger of crashing into unlighted buildings.

The crewmembers, flying on one of two Knighthawks from the Bataan, estimated they saved hundreds of people.

"This is why I joined the military. This is what I joined the Navy to do: Save people's lives," Kontodiakos said.

The crew of another helicopter flying from the Bataan, this one a massive MH-53E Super Stallion, had similar priorities.

DOJ_NMG_0002712

Before leaving the ship Saturday morning, pilot Lt. Greg Hill and his crew chief, Petty Officer Cory Appling, agreed to urge authorities on the ground to let them take the sick and elderly first on their helicopter, one of three sent to the Bataan from a unit based in Corpus Christi, Texas.

Their mission: Airlift people from the convention center, where thousands were stranded for days without food, water, electricity or security, to Louis Armstrong New Orleans International Airport for medical treatment or a flight out of their devastated hometown.

Convention center survivor Bobbi Smith called the rescue flights a blessing. “It's been a total disaster,” Smith said as she waited to board a Super Stallion. “No lights, no food, no respect.”

A convention center parking lot had been transformed for the day into a busy heliport. Military troops divided the survivors into two lines. One was for the disabled, ill, elderly and young; the other for the able-bodied. Most of Hill's passengers came from that first line.

Most were elderly, disabled or both, sagging in the unforgiving sun. Relatives or volunteers pushed those who couldn't walk in wheelchairs or nearly anything else with wheels.

The healthier survivors carried all they had, often clutching their belongings to themselves as if their lives, or their sanity, depended on it.

“We're saving the world, one exhausted hurricane survivor at a time,” Hill said during his helicopter crew's brief break for lunch and refueling.

At the airport, medical workers and those they treated faced their own crises.

On Friday, survivors nearly rioted, said Senior Airman Chris Chadwick of the Air Force's 88th Medical Group. One patient stabbed a nurse, and medical workers confiscated knives and other weapons from other patients, he said.

“We were scared for our lives,” Chadwick said Saturday.

“My husband dropped dead, and I had to leave him behind,” said Barbara Pratt, 73, as she waited for a flight out of the New Orleans airport Saturday.

Their home flooded in chest-high water, Pratt and her 75-year-old husband got a boat ride to an elevated section of Interstate 10, where they began walking toward the convention center.

“That's where he died,” Pratt said. She didn't know what killed him.

An Air National Guard crew stopped to help. “I said I wouldn't leave his body,” Pratt said. “They said to leave his ID on him and leave him. They could only save the living.”

Clutching her only possessions — a brown leather purse, two bottles of water and a roll of toilet paper — Pratt asked passersby at the airport how to direct authorities to recover her husband's body.

No one could answer her question.

Troops Back From Iraq Find Another War Zone (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 5 -- Spec. Frank Atkinson, wearing his tan desert fatigues from his recent deployment in Iraq, alternately drove a Humvee through downtown New Orleans streets littered with debris and putrid garbage and held suspected looters at gunpoint with his M-4 rifle.

"It's just so much like Iraq, it's not funny," said Atkinson, of Woodlawn, Ark., "except for all the water, and they speak English."

For a year ending this spring, Atkinson's infantry company of the Arkansas National Guard patrolled Baghdad's deadly Haifa Street, and scores of its members were awarded Purple Heart medals after fighting insurgents. Those war-zone images and instincts came flooding back Friday when Atkinson and 300 other Arkansas guardsmen, wearing helmets and full body armor, rolled into the chaos of central New Orleans.

"It's like Baghdad on a bad day," said Spec. Brian McKay, 19, of Mount Ida, Ark.

The Arkansas contingent is among the estimated 16,000 National Guard troops from 40 states flowing into greater New Orleans to help curb the rash of crime sparked by Hurricane Katrina. An additional 24,000 guardsman and 7,200 active-duty ground troops are committed to relief efforts across the Gulf Coast. Paratroops from the 82nd Airborne Division "locked down" the historic French Quarter on Monday, according to city and military officials.

But the massive military effort remains severely disjointed and hampered by a lack of basic communication between units, Army officers here say. Ground commanders for New Orleans have been functioning without the ability to track the location of some units reporting to them -- something unheard of in Iraq, the officers say.

Much work remains for U.S. soldiers in this gutted no man's land, where looting, drive-by shootings and other crime are rampant. Much as in Iraqi cities, the troops are moving by the hundreds into makeshift bases in schools and other public buildings, setting up checkpoints and 24-hour patrols. The guardsmen have been authorized to seize weapons and detain people.

"We're having some pretty intense gun battles breaking out around the city," said Capt. Jeff Winn of the New Orleans police SWAT team. "Armed gangs of from eight to 15 young men are riding around in pickup trucks, looting and raping," he said. Residents fearful of looters often shout to passing Humvees to alert the soldiers to crimes in progress.

"Hey, stop!" a man wearing a baseball cap yelled to an Arkansas Guard team Sunday afternoon as it drove through the city's Metairie district in Jefferson Parish. "Those people don't live here!" he said, pointing to a white sports car parked outside a large brick home.

Atkinson sped over to the car, hopped out and pointed at it with his M-4 rifle. He and Capt. Derald Neugebauer, 36, of Vilonia, Ark., questioned the two men about looting -- but because they had no radio communication with the New Orleans police, they had to flag down a passing patrol car to hand over the two men.

About an hour later, as dusk fell, Atkinson and Neugebauer were driving down Jefferson Street when the owner of a mini-storage business yelled at them from behind his fence. "Hey, get back here! Those guys just broke into that store!" Across the street, the guardsmen saw two men in their twenties outside a car stereo store with the front window broken in.

Atkinson again swung the Humvee around, and within minutes, the guardsmen had two of the four suspects facedown on the Jefferson Street median. The guardsmen then waved down a passing sheriff's vehicle.

"When I charged a round in the chamber, he got down real fast," Atkinson said later of a suspect.

The guardsmen voiced little hesitation at using deadly force -- a skill honed in Iraq -- on the streets of New Orleans. "If we're out on the streets, we'll fight back and shoot until we kill them. That's too bad but that's what has got to happen," said Spec. Jake Perry, 20, of Camden, Ark. "I didn't spend a year in Iraq to come to Louisiana and get killed."

Indeed, just the smell and feel of a war zone in the city put the soldiers on edge.

"The worst feeling was putting that body armor on," said Spec. Richard Dunlop, 36, also of Camden, who with his comrades has vivid memories of the dozens of Arkansas soldiers who perished in Iraq. "I find myself checking the rooftops. I worry about stepping on something in case it is an IED," he said, referring to an improvised explosive device or roadside bomb.

"I was waiting on a gunfight," he said. "It's weird."

Many of the guardsmen were shocked and angered by the violence and looting. One described 70-year-old women in new Nike high-tops, and stores along the riverfront that looked bombed out.

"The fear in the eyes of the people, the uncertainty . . . people shooting and killing over little bitty things . . . it surprised me. I didn't think it would be that bad in my own country," said McKay, a history student at the University of Arkansas.

But the soldiers said they were gratified to be able to evacuate so many needy -- from elderly residents in wheelchairs, lifted into the backs of U-Haul trucks, to drug addicts jittery from withdrawal.

Meanwhile, conditions for the troops were no better than for New Orleans residents. They slept outdoors on concrete loading docks, living on bottled water and packaged military meals that many flood victims wouldn't eat. They had virtually no power, and initially no portable toilets.

While some Arkansas guardsmen said they had volunteered for hurricane duty, many felt wearied by the back-to-back deployments. "I'm still stressed out. I'm still having nightmares over Iraq -- give me a break!" said guardsman Dominic Nettles.

Sitting in a warm breeze on the riverfront on a recent night, as fish leapt out of the Mississippi and a fire blazed out of the blackness on a distant shore, Nettles and his buddies smoked cigarettes and traded war stories that transported them back to the banks of the Tigris.

DOJ_NMG_0002714

"When I came down here, it was just like I was in Iraq. It was unreal," said Spec. Keithean Heath, 20, of Crossett, Ark., shirtless in the heat. "This doesn't happen in your own back yard."

La. Guard Pilot Has Trouble Taking In Scope Of Destruction (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, September 6, 2005

BATON ROUGE — Maj. Patrick Bossetta has been to Iraq and back, but the helicopter pilot with the Louisiana National Guard still has difficulty believing that the devastation spread below him on countless rescue missions is his beloved New Orleans.

“Sometimes, I feel like an actor in a sci-fi movie,” Bossetta said Monday.

Last week, Bossetta said, a National Guard colleague began hacking into a roof after spotting a white cloth waving from a small attic vent. “When the hole was cut,” Bossetta said, “nine people popped out.”

Days later, Bossetta's voice still reflects disbelief. But the enormous tragedy strikes every time a rope is lowered to another dazed survivor or another body is tagged for pickup.

It was particularly difficult when one of Bossetta's recent rescues took him near the battered St. Christopher Hotel. When he is not directing air missions for the Guard, Bossetta owns and operates the high-rise near the city's French Quarter.

For Bossetta, 45, who returned from Iraq in March, the assignment has become a personal effort to salvage a way of life.

In addition to personal losses, his National Guard unit's problems are substantial. The unit lost its headquarters at Lakefront Airport and millions of dollars in equipment to the storm. Other equipment has not returned from the troops' deployment in Iraq.

For now, Bossetta and his 17 helicopters are operating from Baton Rouge Metropolitan Airport.

“We've lost a lot,” Bossetta said. “Have you seen the Superdome? If I would say there was a hell on Earth, that would be it. That was the same place where I watched Super Bowls and college football championship games. It's stunning.”

With Some Now At The Breaking Point, Officers Tell Of Pain And Pressure (NYT)

By Joseph B. Treaster And John Desantis

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 5 - Sgt. Jeff Sandoz, dressed in black SWAT team fatigues with an assault shotgun nearby, took a break on Monday afternoon for a cheeseburger, his first hot meal in a week, in the breezeway at the shuttered Harrah's casino on the edge of the French Quarter.

Rescuing people from rooftops and attics and chasing looters since Hurricane Katrina flooded the city, the discomforts have piled up, Sergeant Sandoz acknowledged. His shoulder was bruised on Wednesday when his police cruiser was rammed by someone running a stop sign on one of New Orleans's nearly deserted streets. He has been catching about three hours of sleep a night, curled up in the back seat of his patrol car, and showering with a garden hose.

He did not want to talk about the blisters or funguses and rashes that have erupted - after days of wading in polluted water in wet boots and dirty socks - on the feet of most everyone in the eight-man tactical unit he commands.

The last week has been a series of nonstop rescue missions, shootouts in the night and forays into foul-smelling shelters in response to gunshots and reports of rape for Sergeant Sandoz and the others on the New Orleans police force. And like most everyone else in New Orleans, police officers have been traumatized by the loss of homes and family members.

Morale on the police force is in tatters. About 500 officers - a third of the force and far more than previously estimated - have dropped out of the daily lineup. Some of them may still be in houses cut off by the storm or may have simply gone off to help their families and will eventually return. But most of the missing officers have either told their superiors that they were quitting or simply walked off the job. Two officers have shot themselves to death.

Sergeant Sandoz and his urban commandos, one of the city's toughest, most elite units, have absorbed much of the violence in stride. Unlike some other officers who have succumbed to the pressure, the sergeant said he was not going anywhere except into the streets to do his job.

"You just suck it up and drive on," he said. "I'll be here as long as they need me. I'm not running away from anything."

Still, he reserved judgment, as did many others, of the officers who have abandoned the force or collapsed.

DOJ_NMG_0002715

Sergeant Sandoz and his commandos have been tested by the long hours and the nagging inconveniences, like shortages of gasoline for their cars and other supplies. They expressed concerns, like many others, about the security of their jobs in a city that is taking steps to shut down for repairs. They wonder whether they will be paid for the overtime that they are logging under near-battlefield conditions.

Trying to lift spirits, the Police Department is giving every officer a five-day vacation over the next two weeks as the military steps in to replace them. Those who want to go to Las Vegas are being given plane tickets and hotel rooms for them and their families. Their breaks are beginning with physical examinations in Baton Rouge, the state capital, 75 miles north of New Orleans, inoculations against water-borne disease and other necessary medical treatment. After their breaks, the officers will start receiving psychological counseling.

Many officers said Monday that they are grateful for the breather but that they had no interest in going to Las Vegas.

"There's nothing in Las Vegas for me," said Officer Darryl Scheuermann, 41, a SWAT team member. "I'm going to see my family. I miss my wife and my dogs."

In one week, some officers have seen more violence than in a lifetime. Officer Brian French ducked sniper bullets while ferrying 50 women and children to a shelter in a commandeered rental truck.

Lt. Julie Wilson watched a fellow officer and friend being shot by looters attacking a convenience store. Lt. Billy Ceravalo and Lt. Brian Weiss lost their police station in the flooding. The floodwaters also swamped a nearby hospital. Responding to a call for help, the officers raced to the hospital and began helping patients using hand-operated breathing devices. They managed to keep several of the critically ill alive for hours until help arrived.

Some officers stayed in their homes as the hurricane swept over New Orleans and were forced to climb onto roofs with their families as floodwaters rose. Their pleas for help poured in over emergency radios.

"We were hearing officers on the roofs of their houses begging for someone to help them," Lieutenant Wilson said.

One officer, she said, "told me he was trapped in water up to his chest."

"I tried to get somebody out to him," she continued, but "we haven't heard from him since. I don't know if he is alive or dead."

Lieutenant Wilson's 11-year-old son, Daniel, was shipped off to neighbors. But for most of the week she had no idea where he was and worried that he feared for her as well. Now, the promise of a vacation in Las Vegas does not make her feel better.

"It's a really nice gesture," she said. "But I just want to be able to get one night's sleep without hearing helicopters. I don't think I need five days off from this, just a couple of nights."

Officer French, 25, a native of Ohio, joined the New Orleans Police Department because he wanted a chance to do "real police work."

Although he has heard city and state officials criticize the federal government as not coming fast enough, Officer French also questioned why local officers were not mustered sooner for special duty.

"They told us not to come in on Sunday, the day of the storm, to come in the next day to save money on their budget," he said.

But he never made it to work on Monday, at least not to the station house.

Officer French moved his family into a hotel. The hotel flooded, and looters attacked a nearby gasoline station. He went out into the storm, grabbed two of the looters and handcuffed them to a railing at the hotel. But, he eventually let them go.

As the water rose, Officer French and his family escaped to the roof with other guests. They were stuck there for two days, before some boats came along and rescued them.

Afterward, Officer French spent several days rescuing others. On some missions, he worked with Officer Willie Gaunt, who has since resigned.

The city's police superintendent, P. Edwin Compass III, hustled to position boats and cars before the hurricane and afterward directed rescues and charged after looters.

"We had no food," Mr. Compass told reporters on Monday. "We had no water. We ran out of ammunition. We had no vehicles. We were fighting in waist-deep water."

DOJ_NMG_0002716

Mr. Compass has been accused of poorly planning for the hurricane. But he and other city officials said they were simply overwhelmed by a crisis that no municipality could handle. The disaster was compounded, they said, when federal officials in Washington ignored their cries for help for several days.

On Monday afternoon at Harrah's casino, as armored cars, fuel trucks, police cars and ambulances jammed the casino's ramp and spilled into the street, Officer Russell Philibert, 38, turned to Sergeant Sandoz's unit for help. He needed a bulletproof vest. His was lost when he escaped in shorts and sneakers as water gushed into his house.

Shortly before he fled his house, he had received a radio message from another officer who lived nearby and was trapped in his attic by floodwaters in the middle of the storm. With the wind howling, Office Philibert broke a window in that officer's house and dragged him to safety.

Officer Philibert said his unit had now taken shelter in a Wal-Mart. The SWAT team has moved into an elementary school on high ground, where some officers are sleeping on cafeteria tables and kindergarteners' nap pads.

Even the urban commandos acknowledged the strain of what they had seen. "I might have trouble sleeping, thinking about all the horrific stuff," said Officer Robert Haar, 35. "But I'm so exhausted I just pass out."

Halliburton Subsidiary Taps Contract For Repairs (WP/AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor, Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 5, 2005

An Arlington-based Halliburton Co. subsidiary that has been criticized for its reconstruction work in Iraq has begun tapping a $500 million Navy contract to do emergency repairs at Gulf Coast naval and Marine facilities damaged by Hurricane Katrina.

The subsidiary, Kellogg, Brown & Root Services Inc., won the competitive bid contract last July to provide debris removal and other emergency work associated with natural disasters.

Jan Davis, a spokeswoman for the Naval Facilities Engineering Command, said yesterday that KBR would receive $12 million for work at the Naval Air Station at Pascagoula, Miss., the Naval Station at Gulfport, Miss., and Stennis Space Center in Mississippi. KBR will receive $4.6 million for work at two smaller Navy facilities in New Orleans and others in the South.

The company has provided similar work after major disasters in the United States and abroad for more than 15 years, including in Florida after Hurricane Andrew.

KBR has been at the center of scrutiny for receiving a five-year, no-bid contract to restore Iraqi oil fields shortly before the war began in 2003. Halliburton has reported being paid $10.7 billion for Iraq-related government work during 2003 and 2004. The company reported its pretax profits from that work as $163 million. Pentagon auditors have questioned tens of millions of dollars of Halliburton charges for its operations there.

Last month three congressional Democrats asked Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to investigate the demotion of a senior civilian Army official, Bunnatine H. Greenhouse, who publicly criticized the awarding of that contract.

Vice President Cheney headed Halliburton from 1995 to 2000, and Democrats have questioned whether the firm received favorable treatment because of his connection.

Rice Defends Bush Against Racism Charges (AP-Y2)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP2, September 5, 2005

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice defended President Bush on Sunday against charges that the government's sluggish response to Hurricane Katrina showed racial insensitivity.

"Nobody, especially the president, would have left people unattended on the basis of race," the administration's highest-ranking black said as she toured damaged parts of her native Alabama.

Later, during a service at the Pilgrim Rest AME Zion church outside Mobile, Rice nodded in agreement as the Rev. Malone Smith Jr. advised the congregation, "Wait for the Lord."

"There are some things the president can do; there are some things the government can do," Smith told about 300 worshippers during a rollicking two-hour service. "But God can do all things. I want you to know he's never late. He's always on time."

DOJ_NMG_0002717

Rice later echoed the call for patience.

"The Lord is going to come on time — if we just wait," she said.

It was a sort of homecoming for Rice, an Alabama native and granddaughter of a Presbyterian minister.

Her visit came as some black leaders, including the Rev. Jesse Jackson, have complained bitterly about the slow response to the disaster, whose victims have been disproportionately black and poor. They have said racial injustice was a factor in the government's slow relief effort.

"How can that be the case? Americans don't want to see Americans suffer," Rice said. "Nobody, especially the president, would have left people unattended on the basis of race."

Since Katrina struck, an estimated 70 nations, from Azerbaijan to Venezuela, have offered hundreds of millions in cash donations for the federal government to relay to the American Red Cross, Rice said. Many countries have also donated supplies, ranging from helicopters and medical aid to food and blankets.

Among the largest contributions was Kuwait's $400 million worth of petroleum product plus $100 million in cash intended for relief efforts. Among the smallest: $25,000 in cash from Sri Lanka, a poor nation still recovering from last December's tsunami.

After the church service, Rice visited a community center in Bayou La Batre, one of Alabama's hardest hit areas. Flood waters following Katrina reached 11 feet in some places in southern Alabama, while about 718,000 homes and businesses in Mobile were left without power for days, and at least two people died.

Republican Alabama Gov. Bob Riley, escorting Rice through the community, said power had been restored to all but about 50,000 residents and businesses, while up to 2,500 Alabamians were still looking for shelter.

"It was devastating, but in comparison to what they had in southern Mississippi and Louisiana, it kind of pales in comparison," Riley said.

While welcoming Rice, some Alabamians expressed frustration with the administration's response.

"It's so unfortunate that the time it's taken to rescue them is too long," Democratic state Rep. Yvonne Kennedy said at the church service. "Had the response been more timely, I think we could have saved lives. To be so slow in coming, people lose hope."

While touring domestic disasters falls outside her official domain, Rice told Bush that "if there is anything I can do outside of my responsibilities as secretary of state, I'd be happy to do that, too." She was criticized last week for attending a Broadway show and shopping in New York during an abbreviated vacation.

Rice Denies Race Had Role In Response (WT)

The Washington Times, September 5, 2005

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday said the federal response to Hurricane Katrina was not slowed by racial insensitivity.

"Nobody, especially the president, would have left people unattended on the basis of race," the administration's highest-ranking black said as she toured damaged parts of her native Alabama.

Later, during a service at the Pilgrim Rest African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church outside Mobile, Miss Rice nodded in agreement as the Rev. Malone Smith Jr. advised the congregation, "Wait for the Lord."

"There are some things the president can do; there are some things the government can do," Mr. Smith told about 300 worshippers during a rollicking two-hour service. "But God can do all things. I want you to know he's never late. He's always on time."

Miss Rice later echoed the call for patience. "The Lord is going to come on time -- if we just wait," she said.

It was a sort of homecoming for Miss Rice, an Alabama native and granddaughter of a Presbyterian minister.

Her visit came as some black leaders, including the Rev. Jesse Jackson, have complained bitterly about the slow response to the disaster, whose victims have been disproportionately black and poor. They have said racial injustice was a factor in the government's slow relief effort.

"How can that be the case? Americans don't want to see Americans suffer," Miss Rice said. "Nobody, especially the president, would have left people unattended on the basis of race."

Mr. Jackson complained that television and press coverage of the disaster was racist for calling storm survivors "refugees" and showing images of blacks looting in New Orleans.

Using "refugees" to describe the people evacuated from storm-ravaged areas "is insulting, it is racist, it does not describe American citizens," Mr. Jackson said. "If you characterize them as refugees, it is someone other than citizens."

The veteran activist accused the press of a double standard in its coverage of chaos in New Orleans.

"With a black person, it is called looting; with a white person, it is called finding food," he said.

Bruce Gordon, president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, said any recriminations over the storm response can wait.

"Right now, the NAACP is in what I call a life-saving mode. We are not in a finger-pointing mode, and until every life has been stabilized and every life has been saved, we will devote all of our energies for that purpose," Mr. Gordon said.

In Maryland yesterday, Claude Allen, a leading official in hurricane recovery efforts as senior domestic policy adviser to President Bush, decried racial discord and appealed for national unity.

"Pray that God would prevail against efforts to divide this nation," Mr. Allen asked 2,000 fellow members of Covenant Life Church in Gaithersburg. "This is not a situation of black or white, rich or poor. This storm was indiscriminate in who it took, and we as a people must pull together."

Mr. Allen, who is black, accompanied the president on his tour of the stricken region. Pray "most of all for peace, because people are trying to find places to lay the blame, and this is not a time for that," said Mr. Allen, who was invited by senior pastor Joshua Harris to address the church.

Amid Criticism Of Federal Efforts, Charges Of Racism Are Lodged (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, September 5, 2005

HOUSTON, Sept. 5 - The devastation wrought by Hurricane Katrina became a rallying cry for African-American religious and political leaders here in President Bush's former hometown on Sunday, with pleas for charity mixed with a seething anger at the response to the crisis.

Many blacks voiced suspicions that thousands of people were left to suffer and die in the floodwaters because they were, for the most part, poor and black.

"Are you telling me we can coordinate a relief effort on the other side of the world and we can't do it here?" I. V. Hilliard, pastor of the New Light Christian Center Church in northern Houston, thundered from the pulpit of his megachurch on Sunday morning. "I'm not saying they didn't care. I'm saying they didn't care enough!"

"I can't help but think that race has something to do with it," he added to a chorus of amens. Mr. Hilliard's church is the largest predominantly black congregation in Houston, with 20,000 members, four locations and a broadcast ministry.

Mr. Hilliard's comments were echoed throughout the country over the weekend, as the Rev. Jesse Jackson and Representative Maxine Waters of California made a trip to the convention center in New Orleans and the president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People met with the governor of Louisiana and visited the emergency operations center in Baton Rouge.

Interviews with African-American church leaders, local politicians and residents here made clear the damage that the faltering relief effort has had on their perceptions of the Bush administration. Mr. Bush and his chief political advisers have mounted an effort to try to court more conservative black voters, particularly since the 2004 election, by encouraging black Republican candidacies and reaching out to black churches.

But their outreach efforts appear to have been significantly set back. Criticism of the response is coming not only from black members of Congress and national civil rights leaders, but also from prominent local officials and ordinary residents here.

"There is a lot of anger here in Texas," said the Rev. William A. Lawson, retired pastor of the Wheeler Avenue Baptist Church in Houston. "Even a lot of conservative whites are angry. This was not the reaction people expect to a disaster of this magnitude. We wanted to see them get off their butts and get over there."

Rodney Ellis, an African-American Democratic state senator who represents a district in Houston, said he was trying to focus on the needs of the evacuees, thousands of whom are in Houston. Mr. Ellis said that the initial federal response was clearly inadequate and that many in the administration bore responsibility, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who is black and from Alabama.

"This problem is so mammoth it's not going to go away any time soon," Mr. Ellis said. "There will be ample time for Condi Rice and others in the federal government to redeem themselves. And I'm hoping they do that."

Administration officials have tried over the last two days to repair the damage. Michael Chertoff, the homeland security secretary, met with civil rights leaders and members of the Congressional Black Caucus at the White House on Saturday to discuss aid efforts and accusations of racial indifference.

Mr. Bush held a live news conference in Washington on Saturday to announce that he was sending additional troops to the Gulf Coast and to defend the government's response to the storm. The size of the disaster area, he said, "has created tremendous problems that have strained state and local capabilities."

"The result is that many of our citizens simply are not getting the help they need, especially in New Orleans," he said. "And that is unacceptable."

Ms. Rice visited the Gulf Coast on Sunday, flying to Mobile, Ala., to attend a church service and meet with storm victims.

On the plane trip from Washington, Ms. Rice challenged accusations that the government had responded slowly because many of the victims were black.

"How can that be the case?" Ms. Rice said, according to The Associated Press. "Americans don't want to see Americans suffer."

She added, "Nobody, especially the president, would have left people unattended on the basis of race."

Later, at Pilgrim Rest A.M.E. Zion Church in Whistler, Ala., the Rev. Malone Smith Jr. invited Ms. Rice to say a few words.

"The Lord Jesus Christ is going to come on time," she said, "if we just wait."

At the New Orleans airport yesterday, Mr. Jackson and Ms. Waters, a California Democrat, offered bitter criticism of those who, they said, had failed them.

"This looks like the hull of a slave ship," Mr. Jackson said as he reviewed the packed sidewalk where families had gathered, their belongings in torn trash bags.

Ms. Waters said she had traveled throughout Africa and never seen anything quite like that scene. "This looks like an undeveloped country," she said. "No time did I think in America we would see this kind of homelessness, this kind of displacement. This is the worst thing I have ever seen."

In Baton Rouge, Bruce S. Gordon, president of the N.A.A.C.P., said federal aid for victims should be commensurate to what was given to those who lost relatives in the Sept. 11 attacks, adding that "the benchmark for recovery should be 9/11."

"Ask yourself," Mr. Gordon said, "have we put the investments, have we put the assets, have we put the resources that we put into 9/11?"

There was also abundant criticism of the news media over the weekend. The Rev. Al Sharpton, after visiting the encampment of displaced Louisianans in the Houston Astrodome on Saturday, objected to the use of the word "refugees" for the people who fled the hurricane.

"These are not refugees," he said. "They are citizens of Louisiana and Mississippi, tax-paying citizens. They are not refugees wandering somewhere looking for charity. They are victims of neglect and a situation they should have never been put in in the first place."

Many also took the news media to task for seeming to single out black people as looters in lawless New Orleans last week.

Kanye West, the rap star, dropped his prepared script at a televised benefit for storm victims on Friday night to say: "I hate the way they portray us in the media. If you see a black family, it says they're looting. See a white family, it says they're looking for food."

Mr. West also said, "George Bush doesn't care about black people."

Ronald Joubert, 41, a member of the New Light congregation in Houston, was a bit more charitable to the president, though not much.

DOJ_NMG_0002720

"The people are saying that that's why the people in New Orleans didn't get a more direct response, because they're all black," Mr. Joubert said. "Me, I don't blame Bush personally. I blame the whole government. But 10 or 15 or 20 years from now, people are still going to be blaming Bush."

What Happens To A Race Deferred (NYT)

By Jason Deparle

The New York Times, September 5, 2005

WASHINGTON

THE white people got out. Most of them, anyway. If television and newspaper images can be deemed a statistical sample, it was mostly black people who were left behind. Poor black people, growing more hungry, sick and frightened by the hour as faraway officials counseled patience and warned that rescues take time.

What a shocked world saw exposed in New Orleans last week wasn't just a broken levee. It was a cleavage of race and class, at once familiar and startlingly new, laid bare in a setting where they suddenly amounted to matters of life and death. Hydrology joined sociology throughout the story line, from the settling of the flood-prone city, where well-to-do white people lived on the high ground, to its frantic abandonment.

The pictures of the suffering vied with reports of marauding, of gunshots fired at rescue vehicles and armed bands taking over the streets. The city of quaint eccentricity - of King Cakes, Mardi Gras beads and nice neighbors named Tookie - had taken a Conradian turn.

In the middle of the delayed rescue, the New Orleans mayor, C.Ray Nagin, a local boy made good from a poor, black ward, burst into tears of frustration as he denounced slow moving federal officials and called for martial law.

Even people who had spent a lifetime studying race and class found themselves slack-jawed.

"This is a pretty graphic illustration of who gets left behind in this society - in a literal way," said Christopher Jencks, a sociologist glued to the televised images from his office at Harvard. Surprised to have found himself surprised, Mr. Jencks took to thinking out loud. "Maybe it's just an in-the-face version of something I already knew," he said. "All the people who don't get out, or don't have the resources, or don't believe the warning are African-American."

"It's not that it's at odds with the way I see American society," Mr. Jencks said. "But it's at odds with the way I want to see American society."

Last week it was how others saw American society, too, in images beamed across the globe. Were it not for the distinctive outlines of the Superdome, the pictures of hovering rescue helicopters might have carried a Somalian dateline. The Sri Lankan ambassador offered to help raise foreign aid.

Anyone who knew New Orleans knew that danger lurked behind the festive front. Let the good times roll, the tourists on Bourbon Street were told. Yet in every season, someone who rolled a few blocks in the wrong direction wound up in the city morgue.

Unusually poor (27.4 percent below the poverty line in 2000), disproportionately black (over two-thirds), the Big Easy is also disproportionately murderous - with a rate that was for years among the country's highest.

Once one of the most mixed societies, in recent decades, the city has become unusually segregated, and the white middle class is all but gone, moved north across Lake Pontchartrain or west to Jefferson Parish - home of David Duke, the one-time Klansman who ran for governor in 1991 and won more than half of the state's white vote.

Shortly after I arrived in town two decades ago as a fledgling reporter, I was dispatched to cover a cheerleading tryout, and I asked a grinning, half-drunk accountant where he was from, city or suburb. "White people don't live in New Orleans," he answered with a where-have-you-been disdain.

For those who loved it, its glories as well as its flaws, last week brought only heartbreak. So much of New Orleans, from its music and its food to its architecture, had shown a rainbow society at its best, even as everyone knew it was more complicated than that.

"New Orleans, first of all, is both in reality and in rhetoric an extraordinarily successful multicultural society," said Philip Carter, a developer and retired journalist whose roots in the city extend back more at least four generations. "But is also a multicultural society riven by race and class, and all this has been exposed by these stormy days. The people of our community are pitted against each other across the barricades of race and class that six months from now may be last remaining levees in New Orleans."

No one was immune, of course. With 80 percent of the city under water, tragedy swallowed the privilege and poor, and traveled spread across racial lines.

But the divides in the city were evident in things as simple as access to a car. The 35 percent of black households that didn't have one, compared with just 15 percent among whites.

"The evacuation plan was really based on people driving out," said Craig E. Colten, a geologist at Louisiana State University and an expert on the city's vulnerable topography. "They didn't have buses. They didn't have trains."

As if to punctuate the divide, the water especially devastated the Ninth Ward, among city's poorest and lowest lying.

"Out West, there is a saying that water flows to money," Mr. Colten said. "But in New Orleans, water flows away from money. Those with resources who control where the drainage goes have always chosen to live on the high ground. So the people in the low areas were hardest hit."

Outrage grew as the week wore on, among black politicians who saw the tragedy as a reflection of a broader neglect of American cities, and in the blogosphere.

"The real reason no one is helping is because of the color of these people!" wrote "myfan88" on the Flickr blog. "This is Hotel Rwanda all over again."

"Is this what the pioneers of the civil rights movement fought to achieve, a society where many black people are as trapped and isolated by their poverty as they were by legal segregation laws?" wrote Mark Naison, director of the urban studies program at Fordham, on another blog.

One question that could not be answered last week was whether, put to a similar test, other cities would fracture along the same lines.

AT one level, everything about New Orleans appears sui generis, not least its location below sea level. Many New Orleanians don't just accept the jokes about living in a Banana Republic. They spread them.

But in a quieter catastrophe, the 1995 heat wave that killed hundreds of Chicagoans, blacks in comparable age groups as whites died at higher rates - in part because they tended to live in greater social isolation, in depopulated parts of town. As in New Orleans, space intertwined with race.

And the violence? Similarly shocking scenes had erupted in Los Angeles in 1992, after the acquittal of white police officers charged with beating a black man, Rodney King. Newark, Detroit, Washington -all burned in the race riots of the 1960's. It was for residents of any major city, watching the mayhem, to feel certain their community would be immune.

With months still to go just to pump out the water that covers the city, no one can be sure how the social fault lines will rearrange. But with white flight a defining element of New Orleans in the recent past, there was already the fear in the air this week that the breached levee would leave a separated society further apart.

``Maybe we can build the levees back," said Mr. Carter. ``But that sense of extreme division by class and race is going to long survive the physical reconstruction of New Orleans."

In Tale Of Two Families, A Chasm Between Haves And Have-Nots (NYT)

By Jodi Wilgoren

The New York Times, September 5, 2005

KENNER, La., Sept. 4 - It was moving day for the families of Gaynell Porretto and Tracy Jackson, the first page of the next chapter in their Hurricane Katrina horror stories.

Mrs. Porretto's four-car caravan crammed with a lifetime of photo albums, a few changes of clothes and coolers of drinks pulled up to a yellow house with a wide front porch that she had just rented for $600 in the humble hamlet of Arnaudville, La.

It is 125 miles from her storm-sacked home in the New Orleans suburb of Metairie, half the size for twice as many people, but she can see the church steeple from the yard, and her son is signed up for football at the nearby high school.

"I have a ZIP code!" she said, exulting. "It's the happiest I've ever been."

DOJ_NMG_0002722

Outside the New Orleans airport here, Ms. Jackson's four sickly and hungry children, ages 1, 3, 5 and 7, were sprawled on a skycap's cart as she slogged through the sweaty, snail-like line, the baby atop a blue plastic bin filled with what they had scrounged from strangers.

It is all they have, their $2,000 cash savings burned up with their belongings - including birth certificates - in a post-flood fire at their apartment in uptown New Orleans. Even as they waited to board a plane, they did not know where they were taking it.

"I'm just hoping it's a better place," she whispered. "I've never been on an airplane before, I'm afraid of heights."

Two families displaced by the same disaster, both facing uncertain futures as they moved forward on Saturday, but in completely divergent circumstances.

Just as it ripped through levees to send water pouring through New Orleans, the storm cleaved a harsh chasm among the region's refugees, providing a stark portrait of the vast divide between America's haves and have-nots.

The more than 100 members of Mrs. Porretto's extended family have cars that carried them out last Sunday morning, well before the hurricane hit.

Ms. Jackson, who does not know how to drive, escaped on foot only after the floodwaters started filling her apartment on Tuesday, walking first to a bridge, then to the squalid Superdome.

Mrs. Porretto, 51, has an American Express card that covered her $564.26 bill at the Hilton in Lafayette, La., where a cousin who works for AT&T secured a low corporate rate when she booked a block of rooms days before of the storm.

Ms. Jackson, 24, does not have a bank account, and her husband, Jerel Brown, spent their last $25 to buy fish and shrimp from men grilling on the street in the chaos, so now there is nothing in the pockets of his baggy jeans but a crushed pack of Benson & Hedges someone gave him to calm him down.

The Porrettos have cellphones and connections in city government and churches that not only helped them find one of the last available rental properties anywhere around here, but also let them sneak back into their neighborhood early this weekend to grab televisions and furnishings for their new house.

Mr. Brown, in tears, has no recourse but to ask a reporter to look for his missing brother, Wallace, and if he turned up, find out how they could get back in touch.

John Edwards, the former senator whose presidential primary campaign last year was based on the theme that America is a country torn in two by race and class, sent an e-mail to supporters last week, saying that the hurricane's destruction exposed "a harsher example of two Americas."

"Every single resident of New Orleans, regardless of their wealth or status, will have terrible losses and life-altering experiences," Mr. Edwards wrote. But poor people, he added, "suffered the most from Katrina because they always suffer the most."

Mrs. Porretto, a court clerk, and her husband, Joel, a retired police officer, are hardly rich. But as they embark on life in exile, they look like royalty compared with Mr. Brown, Ms. Jackson and their children, wandering to a destination unknown with little more than the clothes they have worn for a week.

"We don't know where we're going, we don't know how we're going to survive when we get there - we're starting all over," Mr. Brown said as he stood in line for three hours in the airport's heat. "I never been out of this city. I'm going to be a stranger."

Nearly one in four of New Orleans' 445,000 residents live in poverty, many of them in neighborhoods like the one where the Jackson-Brown clan huddled in a $350-a-month two-bedroom apartment across from a dilapidated and dangerous housing project; 69 percent of the city is black, and the median household income is $31,369. To the west in Metairie, where Ellen DeGeneres grew up, the median income is $41,265, just below the national average, 87 percent of the 145,000 residents are white, and fewer than 1 in 10 are poor.

But in the hurricane's wake, the poorest have turned desperately destitute, while the well-to-do make do with what they have left.

For the past week, the Porrettos and their many cousins converged at the Hilton, Lafayette's finest hotel, drinking red wine late into the night as they laughed in the lobby. The teenagers put a dollar on a string in front of the elevator, watching guests lunge for it as they yanked it away. The adults stayed up until 2 a.m. daring the dozens of dogs among the evacuated to strut their stuff.

"Every dog that did a trick, we drank a beer," Mrs. Porretto explained.

But some days, she stayed in bed depressed through the afternoon, or burst into tears out of nowhere. Their house has roof damage, and they do not yet know what the water has wrought inside. A Ford Taurus full of prized possessions that her husband parked outside Macy's to ride out the storm has been ravaged. The court where she has worked for 25 years is closed indefinitely. Her sister Kathy Skeins, whose family of four will share the little house along with Mrs. Porretto's 78-year-old mother-in-law, is worried about how her boys, 15 and 11, will fare in public school for the first time, and what will happen to the $3,500 tuition she already paid at the Catholic school back home.

"It hit us Monday that we were homeless," Mrs. Porretto said. "We have meltdowns. You just have nothing to look forward to."

Until they found the shotgun-style house in Arnaudville, a town of 1,400 down a long country road north of Lafayette.

On Saturday, as the two sisters unpacked the storm-survival arsenal they had amassed at the hotel - pounds of ham for sandwiches and a new toaster oven, all manner of snacks and condiments, even a bottle of olives to ease Mrs. Porretto's arthritis - a neighbor stopped by with a box of cleaning supplies.

The landlord, who is lending an air mattress and queen bed, drew a map to the nearby restaurant and movie theater. The women debated whether they need a land line, but agreed cable television was a must, and set out shopping to stock their new shelves.

"We need to make a list, Gay," Mrs. Skeins said. "We need a mop and a broom, so we can keep up the kitchen."

Mrs. Porretto propped a photo collage of her son's first year on a bedroom windowsill, and imagined the morning sun streaming in through the living room. The sisters stocked the refrigerator with bottles of Coors Light they had brought.

"Gotta relax some way," Mrs. Skeins said. "We'll sit on the porch and have a cold beer."

"We've got a porch, Kathy, I can't wait!" Mrs. Porretto said, forgetting the hurricane for a minute. "We grew up with a porch!"

On moving day, Mrs. Porretto wore a clean T-shirt and fresh lipstick. Two hours' drive away at the airport, Ms. Jackson was braless under her soiled shirt and had a blue bandana covering her unwashed hair.

The Skeins' 125-pound Rottweiler, Buster, galloped across the grass in Arnaudville to drink from a spigot, after a week squished in a hotel bathroom; the Jackson children are without their mutt, Max, last seen as their apartment began to burn.

"We heard the dog barking," Ms. Jackson said. "I think he's dead."

Like the Porrettos, Ms. Jackson, Mr. Brown, their children, a nephew and a friend they call Auntie left New Orleans last Sunday morning, to stay with a friend. But they went back on Tuesday, and as the water rose to waist level, they fled with no provisions. After two nights shielding the baby's eyes from dead bodies at the feces-infested Superdome, they set out for the convention center, where rumors of rapes and worse left them taking turns sleeping on the floor in fear for their children's safety.

"Last night I heard a baby screaming, 'Stop, stop, get off me, don't touch me,' " Ms. Jackson recalled.

Their blue plastic bin is filled not with family treasures, but with scraps that other refugees and relief workers have handed out: three rolls of toilet paper, a box of Teddy Grahams, toddlers blue plastic sandals, two apples, a gallon of milk.

Mr. Brown was barefoot until a friend gave him a pair of sneakers that remain unlaced because they are too small; he has no socks. An elderly lady gave Ms. Jackson a quilted handbag to hold diapers and the pink pills the triage nurse gave to 7-year-old Waynenisha, who suffers from febrile seizures.

"It has some perfume and some body spray," she said thankfully. "I'm a lady. I can't walk around smelling like a grown man."

Now, Ms. Jackson is wondering whether she will be able to enroll her children in school without identification - even her own Social Security card is gone. Mr. Brown, who had been making do washing 18-wheelers and running errands for a convenience store, said he will "go there and get a job if they let me," though he is still unsure where there might be.

"We just started life's journey together," he said, gesturing at the little ones on the luggage cart. "As we're building, it just all fell apart at one time."

Standing in the sweltering line, Mr. Brown occasionally lashed out, slapping the leg of a child on the move or barking at others in line for pushing. When an older woman passed out on the curb, he pushed through the crowd to pour water down her head and back. "Where's the help?" he called out. "We need help! Give her some air, please."

A few minutes later, the Rev. Jesse Jackson turned up with three buses. The Jackson-Browns leaped out of line to rush aboard with their blue plastic bin and grabbed the last row in the air-conditioned coach, leaving the skycap's cart behind.

To The Rescue (USNEWS)

By Anna Mulrine

U.S. News and World Report, September 5, 2005

It didn't look like America, the exodus of stunned refugees wading through turbid, waist-high water, carrying only what mattered most: sick relatives, bundled babies, storm-soaked family Bibles. It looked like another country, the kind of place where armed bandits outnumber police and desperate families search garbage dumpsters for food. A place where the poorest of the poor die in the heat, their corpses ignored on the side of the road.

Across the Gulf Coast, lifelong residents who thought they had seen it all were left with nothing in the wake of a storm that has caused what may well be the worst natural disaster ever to hit the United States. Katrina's lethal one-two punch of 145-mile-per-hour winds and a 25-foot storm surge left 90,000 square miles of heartbreak, devastation, and unhinged lives, as rich and poor alike scrounged for food and water, searched for loved ones in rivers of foul, tea-colored water, and wondered, Why on earth was help so slow in coming? "A national disgrace," Terry Ebbert, New Orleans's homeland-security director, said of Washington's emergency-relief efforts.

The challenges of delivering help and restoring order were without precedent. Experts placed the price tag on the havoc caused by Katrina's wrath at $30 billion, but for now, that can be only an educated guess. What can be said for sure is that Katrina uprooted more Americans than the Civil War, the Dust Bowl storms of the 1930s, or the San Francisco earthquake of 1906. Reaching for a more recent comparison, a weary, crestfallen A. J. Holloway, the mayor of Biloxi, Miss., which saw its own share of despair and heartbreak, said: "This is our tsunami."

Early in the week, the nation had breathed a sigh of relief for its beloved Crescent City--Bourbon Street was dry, and Katrina seemed like just another dodge-the-bullet story as revelers roamed the rain-smeared streets, go-cups in hand. By nightfall after landfall, it looked as if the Bananas Foster would be flaming merrily at Commander's Palace once again. But after the levees broke the next day and the bathtub-shaped Big Easy began filling up with the brackish waters of Lake Pontchartrain, a complicated network of pumps failed and 80 percent of the city was soon under water, creating what public health officials warned could soon become a breeding ground for West Nile virus, dysentery, and a host of other potentially lethal diseases.

"Help us." In what officials say is the largest domestic military relief effort in the nation's history, the Pentagon sent aircraft, rescue crews, and teams of Navy SEAL s to help out. Coast Guard divers descended from hovering helicopters, smashing though roofs with axes, sweeping the sick from makeshift rafts, and spiriting away those most in need of aid.

But for far too many, for the first few days, relief remained elusive. Kids climbed on a roof holding a sign that read simply, "Help us." Bands of looters, some deadly, some merely desperate, roamed the streets. At week's end, the floodwaters covered slightly less than half the city, but police and National Guard units were still keeping a wary eye on looters and gun-toting residents while trying to restore order amid reports of beatings, rapes, and shootings. New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin issued a "desperate SOS," pleading for more of everything--food and water, relief help, buses to evacuate the sick and elderly--anything that could help jump-start what inevitably will be a slow and tortuous return to something like normal.

'Understanding Katrina (USNEWS)

By Dan Gilgoff

U.S. News and World Report, September 5, 2005

By noon Monday, it was clear there was trouble. It was at the levee along the industrial canal that separates New Orleans from St. Bernard Parish to the east. The breach was obvious and, for the moment, irreparable. On Tuesday morning, there were two more gaps, both along a floodwall of the city's 17th Street Canal. It was the beginning of the end, just a matter of time. The waters rushed in.

At the worst moment of the worst week in New Orleans's history, the water downtown was 20 feet deep. How could it have happened? The city's levees, many decades old, had been built to withstand only a Category 3 storm. Katrina was a 4. A high 4. The local authorities knew that. But they had no comprehensive plan to evacuate people from even the lowest parts of a city whose virtually every corner lies below sea level. Nor were there plans for an enhanced police presence on the streets after Katrina struck. In Washington, too, there was a curious lassitude, both as the massive storm bore down on the Gulf Coast and in the immediate aftermath of the levees failing. At week's end, an obviously stricken President Bush said: "I don't think anybody anticipated the breach of the levees."

But why not? The potential failure of the city's 350-mile levee system had been studied for years. The extensive network was built to keep floodwaters out, but it can also lock them in when the levees are breached or "overtopped" by surging water on the other side. This is what old New Orleans hands refer to as "flooding the bowl." And it's the very reason the Red Cross listed a direct hurricane hit on New Orleans as the nation's most deadly natural-disaster threat a few years ago. Everyone, it seemed, knew the risks. Scientists at Louisiana State University had warned that even a Category 3 storm could dump up to 27 feet of water in some neighborhoods. "Everybody knew this was coming," says Walter Maestri, director of emergency preparedness for Jefferson Parish (a parish is akin to a county), which borders downtown New Orleans. "But we all hoped it wouldn't be in our lifetime." John Harrald, codirector of the Institute for Crisis, Disaster, and Risk Management at George Washington University in Washington, D.C., agrees. "To paraphrase the 9/11 commission," he said, "we are seeing a failure of imagination."

Shared blame. The failure, however, was not on everyone's part. For years, officials in the New Orleans district office of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, which built and administers the levee network, pushed to raise the protection level from Category 3 to Category 5. "We have the ability to protect this city [from Category 4 and 5 storms] for a 2-to-3-billion-dollar investment," Al Naomi, a senior project manager for the corps, told U.S. News in June. "It's not rocket science; its concrete and steel." Environmental groups, meanwhile, lobbied for more than a decade to restore southeastern Louisiana's vanishing wetlands, which once provided New Orleans with a robust, natural hurricane buffer. They got nowhere.

In The Ruins, Angels Of Mercy (USNEWS)

By Nancy Shute

U.S. News and World Report, September 5, 2005

April Fugere has discovered that it takes only about 36 hours to turn a modern American hospital into something more like a Civil War-era battlefield unit. "The stench is unbelievable," Fugere, an intensive care nurse, said from her post at flood-ravaged Charity Hospital last week, a few days after Hurricane Katrina battered New Orleans.

The hospital had no running water or working toilets. Food and bottled water were in short supply. The pain medication was long gone. When the emergency generators gave out, Fugere and her colleagues kept critically ill patients alive by squeezing their ventilator bags by hand. Rescuers had turned away after being fired upon, but by week's end, most of the patients had been evacuated. It was too late for some. "There are lots of patients who died," Fugere says. "They are laying them out in a hospital stairwell, in body bags."

From the flooded city of New Orleans and eastward along the Gulf Coast, doctors and nurses at dozens of hospitals and nursing homes last week struggled against enormous odds to keep thousands of seriously ill people alive without the most basic tools--food, water, medicine. The situation outside hospital walls was no better. Swarms of displaced residents with chronic health problems tried to make do without life-sustaining treatments like insulin and kidney dialysis. Even those who were healthy when the hurricane hit risked serious injury or death through dehydration, infection, or starvation as the week dragged on with no rescue or basic rations in sight. "We're seeing people who have been holed up in heated attics without food or water for days," says Christopher Guarisco, director of the emergency department at the Oschner Clinic Foundation in Jefferson Parish, La. At the New Orleans Convention Center, corpses lay abandoned amid throngs of people desperate to escape. A lucky few got out: Premature babies and other critically ill patients were airlifted to hospitals as far away as Houston. But most were left to suffer.

The healthcare crisis was exacerbated by the fact that hospitals weren't immune to the violence that erupted. "When the crowds tried to take the ambulances away from us, we just abandoned the ambulances and locked them up," says Richard Zuschlag, chief executive officer of Acadian Ambulance Service in Lafayette, La. In their second attempt to evacuate Charity Hospital, "we got shot at," Zuschlag says. But as National Guard troops began entering the city, the ambulance crews started moving again.

"It's utter chaos here," says Deano Bonano, chief deputy administrator for Jefferson Parish, just outside New Orleans. At midweek, the parish's hospitals were crammed with patients, most of them old or frail and in need of dialysis or oxygen, who were moved into the hospitals before the storm hit and had no place to go. "People are lined up in hallways, everywhere we can plug in a machine," Bonano says. "We're trying to relocate these special-needs patients to hospitals outside the area, but transportation right now is hard or impossible." Early in the week, he had taken to going out with the police or National Guard and raiding local supermarkets. "We are actually breaking into grocery stores," he says. By week's end, however, Bonano said Wal-Mart and Sam's Club had shipped in tractor-trailers with food, water, and ice, and power and water were being restored to the three open hospitals.

Another Flood That Stunned America (USNEWS)

U.S. News and World Report, September 5, 2005

For days, the rain fell. The rivers swelled, the lakes rose. And when the water could no longer find a place to go, it battered the weakest parts of the levees that had protected thousands of people and blew through, sending a surge of white-capped brown water faster than the spill of Niagara Falls.

So began the Great Mississippi Flood of 1927, the most catastrophic deluge ever to hit the South and one of the worst natural disasters in U.S. history.

The seminal event of pre-integration southern politics, the 1927 flood inundated an area about half the size of New England. It killed as many as 1,000 people and displaced about 700,000 more. At a time when the entire federal budget was barely $3 billion, it caused an estimated $1 billion in damage.

Most significant for the course of America, however, the tragedy hastened the mass migration of African-Americans to northern cities and marked the beginning of the end of southern sharecropping. "You'd say, 'I'd like to talk to you about the 1927 flood,' and you didn't need to explain anything else," says Pete Daniel, author of Deep'n As It Come: The 1927 Mississippi River Flood. "It was the most significant event of their lives."

The 1927 flood spared New Orleans, yet parallels to the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina are hard to miss. Authorities were ill-prepared to deal with refugees, and the brunt of the damage was borne by poor blacks unable to get to high ground.

Like Katrina, the tragedy was in many ways born of man's hubris--fitting because New Orleans itself grew out of man's assumption that he could control nature, no matter how stubborn nature was. The city was founded in 1718 by Jean Baptiste Le Moyne de Bienville on a piece of high ground between the Mississippi and Lake Pontchartrain. It was built below grade, against the advice of engineers. Pumps and canals, its founders thought, would handle the water.

Over the centuries, the same attitude would direct development of the rest of the lower Mississippi. Earthen levees rose ever higher to corral the river in its channel. But they have come at a price: The same volume of water just moves faster through a smaller space, scouring the channel and weakening the levees from below.

When the rains broke records in April 1927, the Gulf of Mexico was full and worked as a stopper to the Mississippi. The Mississippi was full, too, pushing its own waters up tributaries, breaking levees and causing flooding as far as Ohio and Texas. All that water had to go somewhere.

It couldn't go to New Orleans, panicky city fathers told the Army Corps of Engineers; it would devastate the regional economy.

To save New Orleans, the leaders proposed a radical plan. South of the city, the population was mostly rural and poor. The leaders appealed to the federal government to essentially sacrifice those parishes by blowing up an earthen levee and diverting the water to marshland. They promised restitution to people who would lose their homes. Government officials, including Commerce Secretary Herbert Hoover, signed off.

On April 29, the levee at Caernarvon, 13 miles south of New Orleans, succumbed to 39 tons of dynamite. The river rushed through at 250,000 cubic feet per second. New Orleans was saved, but the misery of the flooded parishes had only started. The city fathers took years to make good on their promises, and very few residents ever saw any compensation at all.

The water, which had started rising on Good Friday, would not recede until July. Many victims would never return to their homes. Hoover, who won support for leading relief efforts, went on to win the presidential election. And the Corps of Engineers, who had said the levees would hold, was humbled. Says Daniel: "People complained about the corps . . . but they never blamed the river. They understood: 'That's the river. That's nature. That's what it's supposed to be doing.' " -Judd Slivka

The Lost CityWhat Went Wrong: Devastating A Swath Of The South, Katrina Plunged New Orleans Into Agony. (NWSWK)

Newsweek, September 5, 2005

Sept. 12, 2005 issue - It wasn't exactly a surprise. "This ain't gonna last," New Orleans City Council President Oliver Thomas told his security guard as they watched the waters of Lake Pontchartrain rising and racing and eating away at the dirt levee beneath the concrete floodwall built to protect New Orleans from disaster. It was 4 o'clock on Sunday afternoon, Aug. 28. Hurricane Katrina was still 14 hours away, but the sea surge had begun. Thomas returned to the city's hurricane war room and announced, to anyone who was listening, "The water's coming into the city."

Story continues below ? advertisement

Thomas was asleep on his office couch early Tuesday morning when he was awakened by the sound of banging on his door and someone yelling, "The levee broke!" Thomas stood up on his soaked carpet and felt as though he were standing in concrete. He was paralyzed, he later said, by the fear of predictions coming true. Thomas, who had been rescued off the roof of his house in New Orleans during Hurricane Betsy in 1965, had been a city councilman for a dozen years. His specialty is water. He knew all about the studies and reports and dire warnings stacked up on the desks of bureaucrats, he knew about all the relief and reconstruction and restoration projects that had been discussed but never paid for or carried out, and he knew his beloved old city was doomed.

A few rescuers were ready, but precious few. On Monday morning, as the storm slammed into the Gulf Coast, Col. Tim Tarchick of the 920th Rescue Wing, Air Force Reserve Command, got on the phone to call every agency he could think of to ask permission to take his three rescue helicopters into the disaster zone as soon as the storm abated. The response was noncommittal. FEMA, the federal agency that is supposed to handle disasters, told Tarchick that it wasn't authorized to task military units. That had to come from the Defense Department. Tarchick wasn't able to cut through the red tape until 4 p.m. Tuesday—more than 24 hours after the storm had passed. His crews plucked hundreds of people off rooftops, but when they delivered them to an assigned landing zone, there was "total chaos. No food, no water, no bathrooms, no nothing." There was "no structure, no organization, no command center," Tarchick told NEWSWEEK.

Only despair. The news could not have been more dispiriting: The reports of gunfire at medical-relief helicopters. The stories of pirates capturing rescue boats. The reports of police standing and watching looters—or joining them. The TV images of hundreds and thousands of people, mostly black and poor, trapped in the shadow of the Superdome. And most horrific: the photographs of dead people floating facedown in the sewage or sitting in wheelchairs where they died, some from lack of water. For many across the city and the Gulf Coast, prayer seemed one of their few options. On CNN, Mayor C. Ray Nagin asked the country to "pray for us," a plea repeated by survivors who needed that, and much more.

New Orleans has long been an inspiration to soulful writers and artists who sing the blues. But there was nothing romantic about Katrina's wake. Most of the poets had headed for higher ground (although legendary R&B man "Fats" Domino stayed, was reported missing, then found alive). Left behind were the poor who couldn't get out, a few defiant members of the local gentry and gangs of predators.

No one seemed to have any idea how many people died, but it was clearly the worst natural disaster since a hurricane wiped out Galveston, Texas, in 1900, killing 6,000 to 12,000 people. No major American city had been evacuated since Richmond and Atlanta in the Civil War. The economic cost will be enormous, starting with gasoline prices jumping to more than $3 a gallon. The political cost to President Bush could also be stiff. When Air Force One dipped below the clouds on Tuesday so the president could peer out the window down at the disaster, the image was uncomfortably imperial. A folksier Bush toured the wretched region on Friday, hugged some victims and did a rare but necessary thing: he admitted that the results of the relief effort had been "not acceptable."

Day after day of images showed exhausted families and their crying children stepping around corpses while they begged: Where is the water? Where are the buses? They seemed helpless, powerless, at the mercy of forces far beyond their control. The lack of rapid response left people in the United States, and all over the world, wondering how an American city could look like Mogadishu or Port-au-Prince. The refugee crisis—a million people without homes, jobs, schools—hardly fit George W. Bush's vision of the American Colossus.

After Failures, Government Officials Play Blame Game (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, September 5, 2005

This article was reported by Scott Shane, Eric Lipton and Christopher Drew and written by Mr. Shane.

WASHINGTON, Sept. 4 - As the Bush administration tried to show a more forceful effort to help the victims of Hurricane Katrina, government officials on Sunday escalated their criticism and sniping over who was to blame for the problems plaguing the initial response.

While rescuers were still trying to reach people stranded by the floods, perhaps the only consensus among local, state and federal officials was that the system had failed.

Some federal officials said uncertainty over who was in charge had contributed to delays in providing aid and imposing order, and officials in Louisiana complained that Washington disaster officials had blocked some aid efforts.

Local and state resources were so weakened, said Michael Chertoff, the homeland security secretary, that in the future federal authorities need to take "more of an upfront role earlier on, when we have these truly ultracatastrophes."

But furious state and local officials insisted that the real problem was that the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which Mr. Chertoff's department oversees, failed to deliver urgently needed help and, through incomprehensible red tape, even thwarted others' efforts to help.

"We wanted soldiers, helicopters, food and water," said Denise Bottcher, press secretary for Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco of Louisiana. "They wanted to negotiate an organizational chart."

Mayor C. Ray Nagin of New Orleans expressed similar frustrations. "We're still fighting over authority," he told reporters on Saturday. "A bunch of people are the boss. The state and federal government are doing a two-step dance."

In one of several such appeals, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, called on President Bush on Sunday to appoint an independent national commission to examine the relief effort. She also said that she intends to introduce legislation to remove FEMA from the Department of Homeland Security and restore its previous status as an independent agency with cabinet-level status.

Mr. Chertoff tried to deflect the criticism of his department and FEMA by saying there would be time later to decide what went wrong.

"Whatever the criticisms and the after-action report may be about what was right and what was wrong looking back, what would be a horrible tragedy would be to distract ourselves from avoiding further problems because we're spending time talking about problems that have already occurred," he told Tim Russert on "Meet the Press" on NBC.

But local officials, who still feel overwhelmed by the continuing tragedy, demanded accountability and as well as action.

"Why did it happen? Who needs to be fired?" asked Aaron Broussard, president of Jefferson Parish, south of New Orleans.

Far from deferring to state or local officials, FEMA asserted its authority and made things worse, Mr. Broussard complained on "Meet the Press."

When Wal-Mart sent three trailer trucks loaded with water, FEMA officials turned them away, he said. Agency workers prevented the Coast Guard from delivering 1,000 gallons of diesel fuel, and on Saturday they cut the parish's emergency communications line, leading the sheriff to restore it and post armed guards to protect it from FEMA, Mr. Broussard said.

One sign of the continuing battle over who was in charge was Governor Blanco's refusal to sign an agreement proposed by the White House to share control of National Guard forces with the federal authorities.

Under the White House plan, Lt. Gen. Russel L. Honoré would oversee both the National Guard and the active duty federal troops, reporting jointly to the president and Ms. Blanco.

"She would lose control when she had been in control from the very beginning," said Ms. Bottcher, the governor's press secretary.

Ms. Bottcher was one of several officials yesterday who said she believed FEMA had interfered with the delivery of aid, including offers from the mayor of Chicago, Richard M. Daley, and the governor of New Mexico, Bill Richardson.

Adam Sharp, a spokesman for Senator Mary L. Landrieu, Democrat of Louisiana, said the problem was not who was in command. FEMA repeatedly held up assistance that could have been critical, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0002729

"FEMA has just been very slow to make these decisions," Mr. Sharp said.

In a clear slap at Mr. Chertoff and the FEMA director, Michael D. Brown, Governor Blanco announced Saturday that she had hired James Lee Witt, the director of FEMA during the Clinton administration, to advise her on the recovery.

Nearly every emergency worker told agonizing stories of communications failures, some of them most likely fatal to victims. Police officers called Senator Landrieu's Washington office because they could not reach commanders on the ground in New Orleans, Mr. Sharp said.

Dr. Ross Judice, chief medical officer for a large ambulance company, recounted how on Tuesday, unable to find out when helicopters would land to pick up critically ill patients at the Superdome, he walked outside and discovered that two helicopters, donated by an oil services company, had been waiting in the parking lot.

Louisiana and New Orleans have received a total of about $750 million in federal emergency and terrorism preparedness grants in the last four years, Homeland Security Department officials said.

Mr. Chertoff said he recognized that the local government's capacity to respond to the disaster was severely compromised by the hurricane and flood.

"What happened here was that essentially, the demolishment of that state and local infrastructure, and I think that really caused the cascading series of breakdowns," he said.

But Mayor Nagin said the root of the breakdown was the failure of the federal government to deliver relief supplies and personnel quickly.

"They kept promising and saying things would happen," he said. "I was getting excited and telling people that. They kept making promises and promises."

A Delicate Balance Is Undone In A Flash, And A Battered City Waits (NYT)

By Peter Applebome, Christopher Drew, Jere Longman And Andrew Revkin

The New York Times, September 5, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 3 - They waited, and they waited, and then they waited some more in the 90-degree heat, as many as 5,000 people huddled at a highway underpass on Interstate 10, waiting for buses that never arrived to take them away from the storm they could not escape.

Babies cried. The sick huddled in the shade in wheelchairs or rested on cots. Dawn Ray, 40, was in tears, looking after an autistic niece who had soiled herself and her son who is blind and has cerebral palsy. A few others, less patient, simply started walking west with nowhere to go, like a man pushing a bike in one hand and pulling a shopping cart in another. But most just waited with resigned patience - sad, angry, incredulous, scared, exhausted, people who seemed as discarded as the bottles of water and food containers that littered the ground.

"Disease, germs," one woman, Claudette Paul, said, covering her mouth with a cloth, her voice smoldering with anger. "We need help. We don't live like this in America."

New Orleans has always existed in a delicate balance between land and water, chaos and order, black and white, the very rich and the very poor. It has been the lacy ironwork of French Quarter balconies, the magical shops and galleries on Royal Street and the magisterial cuisine not just at Galatoire's or Mr. B's or Commander's Palace but also at humble po-boy joints and neighborhood restaurants in every part of town.

But it has also been a place of crushing poverty, of dreary housing projects and failing schools, where crime and violence have been an incessant shadow in daily life, as much a part of the local sensibility as the smothering blanket of heat and humidity.

This week, bit by bit, that delicate balance came completely undone. Water took over earth when levees broke, putting 80 percent of the city under water. The mix of fatalism and bravado that allowed the city's biggest fear - a killer hurricane - to become the marquee drink of Bourbon Street gave way to terror and despair and horrifying spasms of looting and violence. New Orleans became unrecognizable not just physically, but psychologically as well. Faced with a disaster of biblical proportions, everything fell apart, and government was either overmatched or slow to the task.

The flood-control apparatus, which government officials and scientists had long said was inadequate, gave way, but federal engineers did not even realize that a major breach had occurred until the next morning, when citizens began reporting rising flows on Web logs. The city's evacuation plan worked, except for the thousands who were too poor or disabled to find their own way out of the city before the storm. The radios and cellphones that officials and police officers use to communicate failed, erasing any remaining semblance of authority in a city beset by chaos and crime. And finally, a full federal response came only after the dialogue between local and federal officials devolved into anger.

Just two months ago, further evidence emerged that the city and its levees were sinking, increasing the risk of a catastrophic flood, even as federal money to protect the city was being cut afresh. As flood waters rose on Tuesday, Senator Mary L. Landrieu tried to impress upon colleagues in Washington that this was America's tsunami, but she said that the more she pleaded, the more she felt she was not being heard. Most local officials who were supposed to be running the city eventually left, mainly because they could not communicate with the outside world, whose help they desperately needed. It took four days for National Guard troops to arrive to restore order as looting and lawlessness spiraled out of control.

Mayor C. Ray Nagin said federal aid began flowing after he spoke by telephone to President Bush and told him bluntly: "Man, this is a mess, and I am not getting the resources I need. I need help, and if I don't get the help I need this city is going to blow up and this is going to be a national disgrace."

New Orleans, Flannery O'Connor once wrote, is a place where the devil's existence is freely recognized.

But not this devil. Not the devil of bloated bodies floating in muddy waters washing lazily over submerged pickups and campers, of corpses being eaten by rats as they decomposed on city streets, of people dying in wheelchairs outside the convention center as friends poured water over their heads to try to keep them alive.

Not the devil who left Bill and Gail Orris sitting exhausted, dazed after escaping through the hole they poked through the roof of their home in nearby Chalmette, while their 20-year-old daughter, Lennie, unable to walk and mentally disabled, sucked her thumb and jerked spasmodically back and forth in her wheelchair in the hot sun.

Not the devil who left Catherine Weiss, at 75, apologizing profusely for not having her teeth with her - she had left in a hurry, after all, when the water filled her house like a bathtub - and panicked about what had happened to her nephew, Michael Phillippello, who collapsed as a boat ferried them across the river to safety.

Not the man on talk radio, stranded in his house but begging people not to try to come back to see what they had left behind.

"It's like the five stages of accepting death," he said. "First, I was thinking if I had enough ice to save the good shrimp and tilapia, then it's whether I can save the house, now it's about my life. If I had two AK's I'd feel safe here. As it is, someone could pop me off, and I could end up bloated, no one would check for bullet holes, and I'd just end up in some potter's field. You can feel human life kind of receding like the waters."

The storm that brought those waters began as Tropical Depression 12, yet another swirl of tropical turbulence in the southeastern Bahamas. But at each step of the way Hurricane Katrina seemed to overachieve. It hit Florida with more power than expected, killing nine people and knocking out electricity for a million more. Then it crossed back into the Gulf of Mexico, intensifying into one of the strongest storms on record as, in a horrific bit of timing, it churned directly over the "loop current," a great, deep whorl of tropics-hot seawater that pulses in between the Yucatán and Cuba each year and then stays south of Louisiana into late summer. Often, storms weaken as they suck up cool water that lies stratified beneath the warm surface. But in the loop, even the depths are hot.

"We are facing a storm that most of us have long feared," said Mayor Nagin, who urged people on Saturday to leave town and then gave an evacuation order on Sunday, when it looked as if a Category 5 storm, with winds as high as 175 miles an hour, could be headed for New Orleans. "This is a once-in-a-lifetime event."

Many of the 1.3 million people in the metropolitan area did that. But, as always, many did not. This surprised exactly no one. In a 2003 Louisiana State University poll, 31 percent of New Orleans residents said they would stay in the city even if a Category 4 hurricane struck.

Many stayed because they felt they had no choice.

The survey found that those who said they would stay tended be poor, less educated, disabled, older, childless or isolated, or had lived in the city for a long period. Twenty-eight percent of the population of New Orleans lives below the poverty line, compared with 9 percent nationwide, according to census figures. Twenty-four percent of its adults are disabled, compared with 19 percent nationwide. An estimated 50,000 households in New Orleans do not have cars.

And there was another bit of bad timing: the hurricane came at the end of the month, when those depending on public assistance are waiting for their next checks, typically mailed on the first of every month.

"They wouldn't have had any money to evacuate," said Councilwoman Cynthia Hedge-Morrell.

Experts disagreed on whether there were adequate evacuation plans for those most in need. Brian Wolshon, an L.S.U. civil engineering professor who consulted on the state evacuation plan, said the city relied almost entirely on a "Good Samaritan scenario," in which residents would check on elderly and disabled neighbors and drive them out of the city if necessary.

Planning was stymied by a shortage of buses, he said. As many as 2,000 buses, far more than New Orleans possessed, would be needed to evacuate an estimated 100,000 elderly and disabled people.

But Chester Wilmot, an L.S.U. civil engineering professor who studies evacuation plans, said the city successfully improvised. He said witnesses described seeing city buses shuttle residents to the Superdome before Hurricane Katrina struck.

"What I've heard is that there were buses, but they weren't very well utilized," Professor Wilmot said. "They literally carried very few people."

The two professors agreed that the evacuation of New Orleans residents with cars went well. They said a new "contraflow plan," which used all lanes of I-10 for outbound traffic, avoided the kind of traffic that snarled during a voluntary evacuation of the city during Hurricane Ivan in 2001.

"What you're going to find is that everyone who wanted to get out, got out," said Professor Wolshon. "Except for the people who didn't have access to transportation."

But many other stayed because they wanted to stay. Because their friends were staying. Because they were worried about looters if they left. Because they felt they could protect their property by staying home. They stayed because they had elderly parents who were going to stay, because they thought they knew which parts of the city flooded and which did not. Or because they always had.

"Hard-headed, honey," said Mrs. Weiss, when asked why she rode out the storm in the same brick home where she has stayed for storms for 41 years. "From now on, I'm leaving for a tropical storm."

And then there were the tourists, many of whom came with only the haziest sense of what they were facing and not the slightest idea of what they should do. When Chris and Tammy Distefano, Kris and Mike Miller and Chad and Michelle Toomey arrived from York, Pa., on Saturday morning for their first trip to New Orleans, they asked the limo driver, Joseph, what to expect. Not much, he answered. The storms always went somewhere else. He took them on a tour and dropped them off at their hotel. They dropped off their bags and walked over to Pat O'Brien's for a hurricane, the mix of dark rum, passion fruit and other juices that people drink from plastic cups as they tour the French Quarter. They were scared to death as the storm rattled their hotel, shutting off the power, Sunday night and Monday morning.

But as Monday rolled into afternoon and the storm moved west, people peeked outside to find streets battered, trees down, roots torn up, but the city mostly dry. It looked like the N'awlins luck had held again.

Thriving on Bluff

And why not? For generations - centuries, really - this city had thrived in part on the poker-hand bluff, its sheer allure masking its starker realities.

Eighteenth-century accounts sent back to France as the first settlers carved into the Mississippi silt focused on the fanciful, not the real, said Craig E. Colten, a geographer at L.S.U. and the author of a new book on the city, "An Unnatural Metropolis."

Few entrepreneurs seeking to sell the idea of building a town on this swampy island mention that as they dug into the earth, they came upon recently buried tree trunks - a sign that they were standing on land laid down by epic floods.

And as the city grew, wedged between the Mississippi River and the broad, shallow Lake Pontchartrain, so too did efforts to ring it with earthen levees. But the very expansion of the city contributed to the rising flood risk, Dr. Colten said. As swampier spots were drained, the drying soil compressed, causing reclaimed land to sink ever more.

In the 20th century, more land was drained as the city's legendary system of pump stations and purging canals spread. But that made it sink all that much faster.

Hurricanes feeding on warmth from the gulf rumbled by most summers. Some potent ones smashed other Gulf Coast towns, like Galveston, Tex., in 1900, and storms in 1947 and 1965, struck New Orleans directly, but with survivable intensity. Hurricane Betsy, in September 1965, finally spurred a federal hurricane protection plan for Lake Pontchartrain and vicinity.

But the system that emerged was a compromise from the start, cut back by competing Army Corps of Engineer projects, by pressure from local communities that had to pay part of the tab, and by the tendency to focus more on current costs than on future risks.

Officials settled on a system of levees sufficient to protect against another Hurricane Betsy - roughly akin to what is now called a Category 3 storm, the kind that statistics estimate might strike New Orleans once in 200 years.

A lull in Atlantic hurricane frequency from around 1970 until 1995 probably contributed to complacency, said Bob Sheets, a former director of the National Hurricane Center.

But more recently, a string of studies found that after 1995, a natural Atlantic cycle had switched from the pattern that stifles storms to one that nurtured them. Other studies pointed to an eventual increase in storm intensity from global warming.

Computer simulations showed ever more clearly how New Orleans could swamp like a low boat in high seas under the assault from certain hurricanes.

Still, the compromises over flood protection persisted. After a scare from Hurricane Georges in 1998, Congress authorized the Corps of Engineers to begin studying bolstering the city's defenses against a Category 5 storm. But money for that study, and simply for finishing the last components of the original plan to protect against a Category 3 storm, dribbled in district at a fraction of annual requests.

In 2004, with insufficient money to close contracts with the companies doing the work, Alfred Naomi, a senior district project manager, told the local East Jefferson Levee Authority, according to the New Orleans Times-Picayune: "The system is in great shape, but the levees are sinking. Everything is sinking, and if we don't get the money fast enough to raise them, then we can't stay ahead of the settlement."

This year, the New Orleans district was hit by a $71.2 million cut. Without more federal money, the district reported in May, the raising of various levees and other "pressing needs" would not be met. In June, at a meeting of emergency planners and hurricane experts, Roy Dokka, an L.S.U. engineer who has spent much of his career refining measurements of elevations around the gulf, presented findings that parts of the coast and New Orleans were sinking 2 to 50 times faster than earlier estimates.

Many spots were two to four feet lower than anyone thought, recalled Stephen Baig, a National Hurricane Center meteorologist, a chilling hint that calculations of the flood potential of particular storms, and the vulnerability of levees, might be significantly underestimated.

"For levee heights, and for our models," Dr. Baig recalled, "that could mean the difference between overtopping and not overtopping."

On Monday, there was nothing dramatic when the levee failed, no sound of an explosion or a crash. At midday, as the storm was blowing out of the city, the Web site of The Times-Picayune quoted residents near the 17th Street canal saying that after experiencing only minor flooding from the storm, suddenly the water in their yards was rising from what seemed to be a breach in the canal. One man said later that afternoon that the water was rising one brick on his house every 20 minutes.

By 4:20 p.m. on Monday, the Web site reported that the water had already rolled through the nearby Lakeview neighborhood and on down to the center of the city. By then, the water in Lakeview had reached the second stories of many houses. The berms along Lake Pontchartrain had held. The problem was in canals that had been built to carry water pumped from city drains out to the lake. But on Monday, with the lake rising, the flow in the canals reversed.

A surge, probably 10 feet above normal, flowed in from the lake, rising until it began cascading over the top of the sleek, butter-colored walls that stood between the east side of the 17th Street Canal and the city's Bucktown neighborhood.

Greg Breerwood, a deputy district engineer for the Corps, said it appeared that as the weight of the water pressed on the high part of the wall, the water pouring over the top hit the ground on the other side and ate away at the soil supporting its base.

A section of the wall pushed in and the rush of water turned that breach into a gash as broad as a football field is long. The lake and below-sea-level city were becoming one body of water.

"We heard about the flood wall failing," Mr. Breerwood said. "Then we realized there was an open corridor to the city."

A Reluctance to Leave

Once the levee broke, most long-time New Orleanians knew that the city could unravel quickly, with nothing to stop the lake from pouring into neighborhoods that were still dry and surging across a huge city park and into downtown.

Ms. Landrieu, a Democrat who grew up in New Orleans, whose father, Moon Landrieu, had been mayor, whose brother, Mitch, is currently Louisiana's lieutenant governor, was at the federal and state command center in Baton Rouge when the first warnings about the break flashed on Monday afternoon.

Ms. Landrieu knew how reluctant people could be to leave. This was the first time her own father had ever left during a hurricane. She said in an interview that she knew instantly that thousands who thought they had survived the storm would now be trapped in their houses, racing the rising floodwaters to their second floors, or to their attics or rooftops.

But she and other local officials suddenly faced a new problem: convincing federal officials that just one break in one canal with such a mundane name could bring on a cataclysm.

"I have been with Michael Brown since the minute he landed in this center," Ms. Landrieu said Friday in Baton Rouge, referring to the director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, "and I have been telling him from the moment he arrived about the urgency of the situation."

But, she said, "I just have to tell you that he had a difficult time understanding the enormity of the task before us."

Natalie Rule, a spokeswoman for FEMA, disputed Ms. Landrieu's account. "There was no doubt in our minds that a Category 3, 4 or 5 headed for New Orleans was going to be dangerous," Ms. Rule said. She said agency officials told state and local leaders: "We will be there for you. You just go for it. We've got your back."

But if they did, no one knew it. And as the flood-control system broke down, so soon did everything else.

There was no immediate announcement that the levee had been breeched or what it meant, but different people realized at different times that maybe the bullet had not been dodged, after all. The prestorm evacuation, as chaotic as it seemed to anyone stuck on the road, was still part of a plan. Now , a whole new ad hoc stage began.

The tourists from York ventured out Monday to see gangs of youths, maybe four, then a dozen, then another four, breaking into the Canal Place Mall, home to high-dollar retailers like Saks and Gucci, Brooks Brothers and Ann Taylor. Worried that things were slipping out of control, they managed to make a plane reservation at $637 a ticket to get out of town. A local family staying at the hotel drove them out for $100 a head, the best money they ever spent. There had been no plans for what to do with stranded tourists, and before long, the hotels were closing down.

With the Superdome overloaded and without food or air-conditioning, the hotels guided visitors to the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center, a huge rectangular building that stretches about a mile and is several hundred yards wide. It has been used for conventions with more than 70,000 people. But soon the situation there devolved into anarchy, too, to the point that officials, often circumspect and cagey with the news media, were just the opposite.

"The tourists are walking around there and as soon as these individuals see them, they're being preyed upon," said P. Edwin Compass III, superintendent of police. "They are beating, they are raping them in the streets."

The Flooded Ninth

Before dawn on Tuesday, Ms. Landrieu's brother, the lieutenant governor, and Sgt. Troy McConnell of the state police left Baton Rouge to assist in the rescue of flooded residents of the Ninth Ward in New Orleans. Mr. Landrieu knew the city intimately. But now he was navigating the Lower Ninth Ward not by car, but by boat. The four men on board would cut the engine and float in watery silence, listening for calls for help from inside houses or attics.

People yelled from rooftops or waved shirts or rags, as if they were flags, from vents in the attic. A few wooden houses floated like buoys.

It had become so hot inside the fetid houses that some residents shivered in the cold water as they swam to the rescue boat. One woman was so heavy and immobile that 12 men were needed to lift her off a gurney.

They must have rescued 100 people, but by the end of the day the mood began to change to one of irritated impatience. "By dusk, people were getting agitated and upset," Sergeant McConnell said. "They had been in those houses for two days with nothing to eat or drink."

Soon there was a small army of evacuees, refugees with no place to go who were deposited on the island of dry land at the edge of I-10 in Metairie. During the long, hot afternoon and into the humid night, the crowd swelled to 2,000 hungry, flood-weary people, residents of the northern neighborhoods of New Orleans and of St. Bernard Parish to the northeast who had been plucked from their roofs and attics.

Barefoot women cradling naked, screaming babies limped from a National Guard rescue truck, everything they owned on their backs after 36 hours of watching the floodwaters breach their doors, topple their refrigerators and drive them to the only high ground available - roofs, trees, attics and bridge spans. Behind them, elderly couples in nightgowns and slippers leaned on each other for support as they walked slowly from the helicopter that rescued them. Many clutched garbage bags holding all the possessions they could salvage; many had no more than damp tank tops and shorts clinging to their bodies. Most were hungry, thirsty and alone.

Chermaine Daniels, 49, had left her flooded one-story house in the Ninth Ward on Tuesday morning, gashing her ankle on a fence as she struggled to swim to a neighbor's two-story house. Later that day, Ms. Daniels and several others were rescued by a uniformed officer in a boat and deposited at an I-10 encampment.

"What do we do now?" she asked the boat driver.

"You're on your own," the driver replied.

An Array of Complaints

Increasingly, local officials also felt that they were on their own.

On Tuesday night, Mayor Nagin complained that while federal officials had agreed that morning that stemming the flow from the breach was the highest priority, "it didn't get done."

Ms. Landrieu said she had talked to Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, on Tuesday and told him: " 'You remember when I flew over the tsunami with you? This was worse than anything we saw.' He said, 'No, you've got to be kidding.' I said, 'I know it's hard to grasp.' And he said, 'We're on it.' " Mr. Frist's office did not respond to requests for comment.

By Wednesday, with little visible response from the federal government, Ms. Landrieu said that she talked to FEMA officials. "I started to sense they were thinking I was a little overwrought, that maybe I was exaggerating a little bit," she said. When she pressed Mr. Brown on when he was going to finally get buses to pick up the people who had been trapped at the Superdome, "he just mumbled," she said.

Mayor Nagin said that he could not remember whether he spoke to President Bush on Wednesday or Thursday, but that the president acknowledged the federal government could have done more and promised to fix the situation.

By then, the state leaders also had an array of complaints. People were infuriated about the lack of National Guard troops to keep order and end the looting. How could the Corps of Engineers, which builds and takes care of the levees, have not had a contingency plan for dealing with a levee breach, especially in such a critical spot? And each time another federal agency offered to help, FEMA seemed to delay in providing guarantees that it would reimburse them later.

For instance, a defense agency had packages of communications gear ready to deploy and held them while awaiting FEMA's approval, according to two congressional aides.

Inside New Orleans, city officials were trying to keep some semblance of control over their city, and failing. The most basic reason was a massive breakdown of the communications system. Cellphones failed and satellite phones did not arrive for several days, according to Representative Charlie Melancon, a Democrat who represents suburban New Orleans.

Ms. Landrieu said on Wednesday: "Our communications systems are not functioning adequately; they are compromised. Not Louisiana's communications system. The United States of America. We didn't have the right communications system for 9/11. We don't have the right communications system now. By that I mean the simplest things. A police chief in a city talking to a mayor in a city wasn't happening while this was going on because their cellphones were down and their radios didn't communicate."

Were The Feds Fiddling While New Orleans Flooded? (USNEWS)

U.S. News and World Report, September 5, 2005

Republican strategists were hoping that President Bush's show of leadership and empathy during a tour of Mobile, Biloxi, and New Orleans on Friday would offset his lackluster performance earlier last week--and bring hope not only to the populace of the stricken Gulf Coast but to his political shipmates as well. Anger over what appeared to be a slow federal response to the disaster wreaked by Hurricane Katrina had brought virulent criticism from local officials--and from Democrats everywhere--and Bush's own evaluation at week's end that the federal effort was "not acceptable" didn't help. White House insiders admitted Bush wasn't at the top of his game earlier in the week, but they predicted he would right himself and turn public perceptions around--much as he did after 9/11 when, after a tentative first reaction, he delivered a powerful call to arms at the World Trade Center. One aide suggested that Bush pick one person to update the public on hurricane relief efforts--"There is nobody holding round-the-clock briefings like Rudy Giuliani did during 9/11" --and that the president provide "inspirational and heartfelt" rhetoric.

Meanwhile, several GOP strategists worried that the slow federal response would seriously hurt the party in 2006. "People already weren't happy before this happened," said one. "It looks like we're not doing anything." In Washington, therefore, the blame game began, with some calling for Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to get the ax. Administration officials, however, said that firing Chertoff would not be smart in the midst of the Katrina disaster. At any rate, said Joe Lockhart, a Democratic strategist and former White House press secretary for President Bill Clinton, "the buck eventually stops in the Oval Office."

No Shrinking Violet Here at the U.N.

John Bolton is already making waves as U.S. permanent representative to the United Nations. Appointed just a month ago, Bolton is spearheading an effort to redraft a contentious document on U.N. reform, human rights, genocide, and more into a concise statement of principles in sync with Bush administration thinking. Diplomats complain, however, that he proposed so many changes--from slight wording shifts to big stuff, some 750 in all--that he risks scuttling the process that is supposed to churn out the document for an international conclave September 14-16 with more than 170 world leaders--including George Bush.

Meanwhile, in the Middle East...

The Bush administration has frequently outlined its vision for spreading democracy in the Middle East. But a panel of outside experts convened by the National Intelligence Council has issued a worrisome assessment of the region's potential for democratizing. "The odds are still against such a development," it concludes. Several Arab nations have made tentative steps toward limited elections, but the NIC experts deride the moves as "tactical [and] easily reversible." Panelists found that while many people favor democracy, their opinions are "shallow [and] illiberal." Even if these forces gain strength, it would ironically be from Islamist movements. "Most participants believed that significant secular democratic forces are unlikely to emerge," the report says.

The Aftermath (TIME)

By NANCY GIBBS

Time, September 5, 2005

New Orleans lives by the water and fights it, a sand castle set on a sponge nine feet below sea level, where people made music from heartache, named their drinks for hurricanes and joked that one day you'd be able to tour the city by gondola.

A city built by rumrunners and slave traders and pirates was never going to play by anyone's rules or plan for the future. So as Katrina, wicked and flirtatious, lingered in the Gulf with her eye on the town, many citizens decided they would stay, stubborn or stoic or too poor to have much choice. As for the ones packing up to go, disaster officials told them to take a look around before they left, because it might never look the same again.

But by the time President Bush touched down in the tormented region on Friday, more than just the topography had changed. Shattered too was a hope that four years after the greatest man-made disaster in our history, we had got smarter about catastrophe, more nimble and visionary in our ability to respond. Is it really possible, after so many commissions and commitments, bureaucracies scrambled and rewired, emergency supplies stockpiled and prepositioned, that when a disaster strikes, the whole newfangled system just seizes up and can't move?

It may be weeks before the lights come back on and months before New Orleans is mopped out, a year before the refugees resettle in whatever will come to function as home, even without anything precious from the days before the flood. But it may take even longer than that before the nature of this American tragedy is clear: whether the storm of '05 is remembered mainly as the worst natural disaster in our history or the worst response to a disaster in our history. Or both.

Watching helpless New Orleans suffering day by day left people everywhere stunned and angry and in ever greater pain. These things happened in Haiti, they said, but not here. "Baghdad under water" is how former Louisiana Senator John Breaux described his beloved city, as state officials told him they feared the death toll could reach as high as 10,000, spread across Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama. No matter what the final tally, the treatment of the living, black and poor and old and sick, was a disgrace. The problem with putting it all into numbers is that they stop speaking clearly once they get too big: an estimated half a million refugees, a million people without power, 30,000 soldiers, up to $100 billion in damage. "This is our tsunami," said Biloxi, Miss., Mayor A.J. Holloway. The overstatement is forgivable, for at some point suffering becomes immeasurable, reduced to a hopeless search for a place to sleep, or a bottle of water or a body to bury.

Mother Nature behaved as everyone warned one day she would, but human nature never fails to surprise. Stripped of safety and comfort, survivors made their choices: greed, mercy, mischief, gallantry, depravity or a surrender to despair. So nurses hand-pumped the ventilators of dying patients after the generators and then the batteries failed, while outside the hospitals, snipers fired at ambulances, and invading looters with guns demanded that doctors turn over whatever drugs they had. Hijackers shot the tires of fleeing vehicles, slapped the spares on after the owners escaped and drove the cars away themselves. Some police officers battled the looters; others joined them. As the floodwaters rose, EMS technicians told TIME they were left stranded at the downtown Hampton Inn by panicking cops who jumped into their private cars to flee the city. In the wretched Superdome, where several people died before they could get out, a young violinist took out his instrument and played a Bach adagio. "These people have nothing," he told a Los Angeles Times reporter. "I have a violin. And I should play for them."

Around the country, people watched the scene in growing horror, as babies and old people and diabetics and those worn out surviving the storm died on live television for all to see. Churches started assembling comfort kits; 500,000 hot meals a day are being prepared by Red Cross disaster volunteers. "I just had a gentleman walk in off the street and write a $10,000 check," said a Red Cross director in Massachusetts. She'd never seen him before; he had no family down there. He just said it seemed the right thing to do.

The private response was all the more urgent because the public one seemed so inept. Somehow Harry Connick Jr. could get to the New Orleans Convention Center and offer help, but not the National Guard. Bush praised the "good work" on Thursday, then called the results "not acceptable" on Friday. By then, 55 nations had offered to pitch in--including Sri Lanka, whose disaster scars are still fresh. "Get off your asses, and let's do something," New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin raged in a radio interview that he ended in tears. But he of all people was in a position to understand the odds. A city known both for its charm and its rot, not just from the termites consuming whole neighborhoods but from a corrupt police force, dissolving tax base, neglected infrastructure, rising poverty and a murder rate that inspired old-timers to pack a gun beneath their tuxes on their way to the Mardi Gras parade, could hardly have been less equipped to cope with a catastrophe that everyone knew was coming. "Half of Louisiana is under water," former lawmaker Billy Tauzin used to say, "and the other half is under indictment." Three of the top state emergency officials were recently indicted for mishandling disaster funds.

Louisiana staggered under the blow, but others all along the Gulf Coast were ravaged as Katrina, still spitting tornadoes and spraying wood and shingles and glass, made her way slowly up to Canada to die at last. A sudden twirl coming ashore meant that the Mississippi coast got smacked the hardest. In many towns, what the winds spared the floods claimed, as the gusts flung water into the streets in storm surges as high as 25 ft. "It was like the houses were playing bumper cars around here," said Biloxi fisherman Alan Layne. There were cemetery coffins tossed around the beach, and disemboweled slot machines, and boats perched up in trees like ridiculous overweight birds. In Gulfport, Miss., the sea-salty air smelled of corpses. At one Catholic church, only the foundation remained--and a sign that read MASS AT 9 A.M. BRING A CHAIR.

John Padgett, a boat captain in Pass Christian, Miss., who runs supplies to the off-coast oil rigs, saw his cottage disappear. But he was able to throw his dogs, a tent, a sleeping bag and a Coleman stove and lantern into his pickup before the storm arrived. He's living in the woods just north of Gulfport off Highway 49. "Everything I own now is in that truck," he told TIME, "but the shelters are too overcrowded and uncomfortable. I was born and raised on this coast, so I'm a good little redneck. I got a bow and arrow to kill food, and that's what I'm going to be eating." Where will he go from here? "I don't know," he said. "But at least in the woods I don't have to smell the dead bodies."

But it was in New Orleans where the cameras converged, a city that had braced for the worst, then briefly exhaled when it looked as if the threat had passed. Several hours after the storm moved through on Monday, some streets were essentially dry. Then shortly after midnight, a section almost as long as a football field in a main levee near the 17th Street Canal ruptured, letting Lake Pontchartrain pour in. The city itself turned into a superbowl, roadways crumbled like soup crackers as the levees designed to protect them were now holding the water in. Engineers tried dropping 3,000-lb. sandbags, but the water just swallowed them. As the days passed, the Army Corps of Engineers, which oversees the levees, admitted they weren't able to assess what might work. Part of the problem was a lack of heavy helicopters; the choppers were all busy doing search and rescue.

The levee breach left 80% of the city immediately submerged and 100,000 people stranded. Canal Street lived up to its name. As the temperature rose, the whole city was poached in a vile stew of melted landfill, chemicals, corpses, gasoline, snakes, canal rats; many could not escape their flooded homes without help. Among those who could, only a final act of desperation would drive them into the streets, where the caramel waters stank of sewage and glittered with the gaudy swirls of oil spills. A New Orleans TV station reported that a woman waded down to Charity Hospital, floating her husband's body along on a door.

For the first time ever, a major U.S. city was simply taken offline, closed down. Food and water and power and phones were gone; authority was all but absent. Most of the people left to cope were least equipped: the ones whose Social Security checks were just about due, or those who made for the Greyhound station only to find it already closed, or those confined to bed or who used a wheelchair. "We're seeing people that we didn't know exist," declared Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) director Michael Brown in a moment of hideous accidental honesty. Rescue workers could hear people pounding on roofs from the inside, trapped in attics as the waters rose. The lucky ones were able to cut holes with knives and axes to reach the open air. Emergency workers hovered from house to house, plucking out the living, leaving bodies behind. The potential for a disaster in the air was such that pilots told TIME reporter Adam Pitluk, who was embedded with them, to help scan the skies for stray news helicopters and sightseers in Cessnas among the flocks of military craft. "It was like a pickup game," said Lieut. Commander Bill Howey, a Navy helicopter pilot. "You got three or four different types of Army helicopters, same for the Navy. Then there's Customs, Coast Guard, Marines, and then there are the news helicopters." While rescuing a group of blind people trapped for five days, a Marine helicopter pilot told TIME's Tim Padgett, "It's like flying into a hornets' nest."

When Dr. Greg Henderson, a pathologist turned field medic, arrived at the Convention Center on Friday, he was the only doctor for 10,000 people. "They're stacking the dead on the second floor," he told TIME by phone. "People are having seizures in the hallway. People with open running sores, every imaginable disease and disorder, all kinds of psychiatric problems. We have people who haven't had dialysis in several days. They'll be going into kidney failure. I just closed the door on a man who ran out of medicine for his kidney transplant. Very soon his body is going to go into rejection." Henderson went in with New Orleans police, and when people saw him in scrubs, they surged at him from every side. He tried to tend the sickest and the babies first. "The crowds here have gotten a bad rap. There are not many human beings you could cram into a building with 10,000 others, in 105Â° heat, that wouldn't get just a little pissed off." He tried to get them settled and asked them to show him the sickest. "And they lead me. It's not a subtle thing. It's generally the ones who are seizing on the floor."

Helicopters airlifted the sick from around the city to the airport, converted into a field hospital where patients were being pushed around on luggage carts and triaged for evacuation. At Lakefront Airport on the edge of the city, fights broke out for seats on the departing choppers. "The gang bangers," said Jimmy Dennis, 34, a Lakefront Airport fire fighter who had been up for two nights trying to keep order, "couldn't understand that we had to get the sick people out first." Frightened, the small band of fire fighters called in 10 New Orleans police with semiautomatic weapons to settle the crowd.

In the few hospitals left operating, the staff fought to keep people alive until rescue came, only to have days pass with no relief. At Charity Hospital, in the dark but for a lone generator and dying flashlights, nurses who hadn't bathed in days tried to sterilize themselves with hand sanitizer. Two patients on the parking deck died waiting to be evacuated. Caregivers wept as they begged for help that did not come. "They'd been keeping these patients alive for a week with very little in terms of resources," says TIME contributor and CNN correspondent Dr. Sanjay Gupta, "and to see them die on the deck--it really was very difficult."

After Gupta arrived by helicopter on Wednesday, hours passed before it was safe to ferry him past the snipers and across a putrid moat into the hospital building. With a full evacuation still several days away, "people came to me and said, 'Why haven't they taken care of us? Why did they forget us?'" The food supply was down to beans and a few raw vegetables; candy vending machines had long since been emptied. "One of the guys here has been trying to call FEMA, and all he gets is a busy signal or voice mail," Gupta said. The stress was so overwhelming that perhaps half a dozen hospital staff members had to be treated in the psychiatric ward. The basement morgue was flooded, so the growing numbers of bodies were stacked in body bags in the stairwells.

The seething center of the angry Crescent City was the Superdome, refuge of utterly last resort for 25,000 people who had waited out the worst of the storm while the sheet-metal roof peeled like fruit, letting the rains pour in. Soon there was no light, no air, no working toilets. Reports came that four of the weakest died that first night. An elderly man, playing cards and seemingly fine, threw himself over a railing inside the stadium and committed suicide, witnesses told TV reporters. Members of the city's EMS team made their way there only to find anarchy. "We tried to start triaging and getting the special needs in one section," a technician recalls, but his team was overwhelmed by the hungry crowd and retreated with armed guards to Army trucks outside. When a 4th Infantry Division helicopter arrived, all but three of the evacuees had to be wheeled onto the Chinook, the elderly panting like animals suffering heatstroke, their mouths sagging and their tongues heavy and swollen. One paraplegic woman looked as if she had been broiled, her motionless legs beet red on the front and ghostly white on her calves. The evacuees were frightened, of both their plight and the booming helicopter that was there to save them. As the chopper pulled away, mothers down below screamed after it for rescue, holding their children high and sobbing.

Opportunity and desperation make a flammable mix. All along the coast, people broke into parked cars to siphon gas. Police reported that a man in Hattiesburg, Miss., shot his sister in the head in a fight over a bag of ice. A rescue team from Texas that had ferried hundreds of people to safety in their flat-bottom boats were told by a New Orleans sheriff that unless they were armed, they should get out of the city. At one point, rescuer Randy White says, "Someone yelled out to me, 'If you don't get us out by 12 o'clock, we're going to start shooting all the rescuers.'" One man was standing on Canal Boulevard with water up to his chest wearing a mink coat that he had liberated from a store. "This natural disaster is beginning to look like a Watts riot," said a worried congressional aide in Washington as he watched the chaos. "There's something really ugly going on here, something wrong at a deeper level."

One thing that was wrong may have been that right and wrong had jumped their tracks. For all the scorching images of armed thugs making off with sneakers and wide-screen TVs, the larger reality wasn't as simple as the President's call for "zero tolerance"of looting. Was it wrong to take a bottle of milk from a store when your baby was sobbing and there was no way to pay for it if you tried? When cans of food are scattered in the debris, does taking them amount to theft, or salvage? At one point, police with guns drawn escorted Dr. Henderson through a Walgreens as he emptied the pharmacy of drugs to use in a French Quarter bar turned makeshift clinic. Dudley Fuqua, tall and lean in baggy blue shorts, broke into neighborhood shops and took canned goods, frozen chicken and ribs and cigarettes to his neighbors, who called him a hero. "I was in a building with no food, no water for five nights," Fuqua's neighbor Mohammed Ally, 70, told TIME's Brian Bennett. "They were taking care of the elderly people." Fuqua saw a neighbor using his empty refrigerator as a rowboat to paddle through the water to get help for his pregnant wife. When the buoyant refrigerator tipped, Fuqua dove off a second-story balcony to help and sliced his feet on a rain gutter. "I was going to make sure everyone was O.K."

Only by Friday did some palpable help arrive, in the form of thousands of National Guard troops and lumbering convoys of supplies. Virtually alone, Lieut. General Russel Honore, commanding Joint Task Force Katrina, whom Mayor Nagin referred to as the John Wayne dude, seemed to be moving pieces into place. He was out in the streets with his troops, directing convoys and telling anxious Guardsmen to keep their weapons pointed down. He "came off the doggone chopper," Nagin said, "and he started cussing, and people started moving. And he's getting some stuff done. They ought to give that guy full authority to get the job done, and we can save some people."

Americans sometimes ask what the governmentÂ does and where their tax money goes. Among other things, it pays for all kinds of invisible but essential safety nets and life belts and guardrails that are useless right up until the day they are priceless. Furious critics charged last week that the government had not heard the warnings. Instead it cut the funds for flood control and storm preparations, mangled the chain of command, missed every opportunity. And an angry debate opened about how much the demands of the Iraq war, on both the budget and the National Guard, were eating into the country's ability to protect itself at home. Louisiana Republican Congressman Jim McCrery--working the phones with FEMA, the Army, the White House, state officials--argues that Katrina revealed how much doesn't work. "Clearly, with all the money we've spent, all the focus we have put on homeland security, we are not prepared for a disaster of this proportion whether it's induced by nature or man."

And this time a crucial consolation was missing. After 9/11, whatever the evidence of intelligence failures, many people still saw that attack as almost unimaginable, so brutal and brazen an assault. But Katrina was in the cards, forewarned, foreseen and yet still dismissed until it was too late. That so many officials were caught so unprepared was a failure less of imagination than will, a realization all the more frightening in light of what lies ahead. For if we couldn't help our citizens in an hour of desperate need, how well will we do in six months or a year, when many are still jobless and homeless, but no longer center stage? The (Big) Ripple Effect (USNEWS)

By Marianne Lavelle

U.S. News and World Report, September 5, 2005

Most Americans watched the ravages of Katrina's Category 4 winds and floodwaters from a safe distance, but they won't be able to escape the storm's economic aftershocks. From California to Maine, the commute to work will cost more. The price of a morning cup of joe is soon to rise. Anyone visiting a hardware store for building supplies should expect sticker shock. And it might be a good idea to stow away some extra cash to pay this winter's home heating bills.

One of the worst storms to hit the United States in modern times chose as its landfall one of the nation's most vital industrial hubs--a key shipping center and a crossroads of the energy business. As a result, Katrina is not expected to have the silver lining that has been typical of hurricanes and other natural disasters: job creation and the economic stimulus of rebuilding. This hurricane's long-term impact is murky, primarily because it has crippled a quarter of the country's oil and natural gas infrastructure when supplies already had been tight and prices painfully high. "Katrina is something new," says Joel Naroff, president of Naroff Economic Advisors. "Until the levee broke, most economists had a reasonable way of evaluating a natural disaster like this. This time we have the effects on the energy sector and a city under water, which is something we have no idea how to evaluate."

Stormy weather. The economic outlook for the rest of 2005 dimmed as the extent of the hurricane's damage became clear. Ian Shepherdson of High Frequency Economics in Valhalla, N.Y., adjusted his third-quarter-growth forecast down a whole percentage point, from 3 to 4 percent growth in gross domestic product, to 2 to 3 percent. He also predicted the economy will lose 500,000 jobs in September as a result of the storm. Wal-Mart, the nation's biggest retailer, warned Wall Street that Katrina might crimp its sales (the discounter had to close 126 stores in the South because of the storm). Yields on 10-year treasury notes fell sharply, a sign that Wall Street expects a slowing economy.

But few economists were talking recession. The fact that the economy was growing above 3 percent before the storm struck will prevent a downturn, says Anthony Chan, senior economist at JPMorgan Fleming Asset Management. In contrast, the 9/11 terrorist attacks happened as the economy was already in recession (though that was not known until later) following the bursting of the Internet stock bubble. Indeed, the unemployment rate for August of 4.9 percent announced last week was the lowest in four years. Post-storm cleanup and rebuilding may create jobs and spur retail spending. The past 10 major hurricanes added 500,000 jobs, on average, to nonfarm payrolls, says Chan, who believes Katrina will cut third- and fourth-quarter growth by about 0.5 percent but will end up boosting the economy over the next 12 months.

Clearly, the energy industry bore the immediate economic impact of the storm. Photos captured the industry's dislocation, such as the oil rigs loosed from their moorings in the Gulf of Mexico that landed on Alabama beaches. But industry officials were hampered in assessing the damage, especially to the eight refineries knocked out of commission. Without electricity, it was impossible to test systems immediately. Power problems also meant a slow restart and reduced operations at the two major pipelines that deliver fuel from the region to the mid-Atlantic and Northeast.

Bigger, Badder Tropical Blows (USNEWS)

By Thomas Hayden and Megan Barnett

U.S. News and World Report, September 6, 2005

Katrina's fury had not yet subsided last week when Germany's environment minister sparked a minitempest of his own. Writing in the Frankfurter Rundschau newspaper, Jurgen Trittin suggested that the hurricane's severity was at least partly a result of global warming and charged that "the American president is closing his eyes to the economic and human costs" of refusing to sign the Kyoto Protocol, which seeks to limit production of climate-warming greenhouse gases.

Trittin's message of "you asked for it" certainly won't be winning him any awards for tact. But with this year threatening to overtake last as the most expensive American hurricane season ever, it's hard not to wonder if maybe he has a point. Are hurricanes getting worse? And if so, is global warming to blame?

Simple enough questions, but the answers are less so. There certainly have been more Atlantic hurricanes recently. According to the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, the Atlantic has kicked up an average of 7.8 hurricanes and 3.8 major hurricanes per year since 1995, compared with an annual average of just five hurricanes and 1.5 major hurricanes over the preceding 25 years. But most scientists agree that the increased frequency is caused by a natural cycle, not global warming. And over the past 50 years at least, increased numbers of hurricanes in the Atlantic are generally offset by fewer tropical cyclones in the Pacific and Indian oceans; the global average is holding steady at about 90 per year.

Still, there is growing evidence that global warming is making the storms stronger and wetter. For all the unstoppability of a fully formed hurricane, a nascent tropical cyclone is a fairly fussy thing, says climate researcher Tom Murphree of the Naval Postgraduate School in Monterey, Calif., requiring just the right conditions in the sea and the air to develop into a destructive powerhouse like Katrina. In a June article in Science, head climate analyst Kevin Trenberth of the National Center for Atmospheric Research in Boulder, Colo., warned that global warming may already be nudging some of those conditions--like warm surface waters and increased moisture in the air--in directions that intensify storms.

Kerry Emanuel, a professor of atmospheric science at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, thinks he has found evidence of that trend. In a study published last month in Nature, Emanuel calculated the intensity and duration of tropical cyclones for the past 75 years, estimating each storm's destructive power. "When you look at the numbers globally," he says, "you see a 70 to 80 percent increase in the potential destructiveness of tropical cyclones over the last 30 years. That's much more than anyone expected." And that surprising jump, he says "is strongly in concert with increases in the tropical sea surface temperature over the same time period." Many oceanographers are convinced that those warmer seas are the direct result of human-caused global warming.

Building boom. Even though hurricane activity along the Gulf Coast and up the Atlantic is expected to stay high for years, and maybe even intensify, official warnings and expert opinion apparently do nothing to dampen people's desire for living on or near the water. "People think a hurricane might not hit, or it might not flood, for 20 years," says Chip Law, an insurance industry analyst with SNL Financial, a research firm. Coastal development in the hurricane zone has been booming for years, he says, and even after Katrina, "it's not going to slow down."

Understanding hurricanes better may help scientists predict their severity. But thanks to the building boom--aided, in some cases, by taxpayer-backed federal flood insurance--limiting storm damage in the future won't depend on brilliant atmospheric science nearly so much as it will on common-sense planning and regulation.

SEC Relaxes Rules In Storm Zone (WSJ)

The Securities and Exchange Commission will extend filing deadlines and suspend requirements to deliver documents to areas affected by Hurricane Katrina.

"We've got to do everything humanly possible to help our fellow citizens," SEC Chairman Chris Cox said. "No one in the region should have to worry about attempting to file government documents in near-impossible circumstances."

At the same time, the agency warned that it is "on the lookout for Katrina-related securities scams" and vowed to vigorously prosecute those who try to defraud hurricane victims.

The SEC plans to help broker-dealers provide access to accounts held at offices that no longer are operable. Mutual-fund companies and other securities firms won't be required to deliver prospectuses and other documents in the affected area.

"We are also working to ensure that individuals and families who suddenly find themselves in desperate financial circumstances have access to representatives of securities firms that hold their assets," Mr. Cox said.

The SEC established hot lines to answer questions and to identify the needs of those in the securities industry affected by the hurricane. The SEC can be reached at 202-551-3300 or by email at cfhotline@sec.gov.

The National Association of Securities Dealers published a notice outlining procedures for allowing customers continued access to their accounts. The NASD also said its New Orleans District Office, whose operations cover Louisiana, Mississippi, Kentucky, Arkansas, Oklahoma and Tennessee, would be closed indefinitely. The office's enforcement caseload is being transferred to the Chicago district office.

In Louisiana, state regulators asked displaced brokers and money managers to contact the Louisiana Securities Commission to provide updated information that could be passed along to inquiring investors. The phone number to contact is 225-925-4660.

In Mississippi, the business-regulation division plans to reopen today after being closed because of power outages. Mississippi residents with securities-related questions can call 1-888-236-6167.

Foreign Aid Flows In For Storm Victims; 131 Britons Missing (USAT)

By César G. Soriano

USA Today, September 6, 2005

LONDON — British Prime Minister Tony Blair, assailed for doing too little to help Britons caught in Hurricane Katrina, apologized Monday and sent foreign service officers to aid survivors.

"I'm really sorry if there have been difficulties. … But I can assure you some of these staff have been working round the clock," said Blair, who was in Beijing, for trade talks with China. As of Monday, 131 British citizens were listed as missing in the hurricane.

News of the disaster has dominated British and continental European media since Katrina struck last week. Foreign criticism of slow U.S. relief efforts has combined with official statements of sympathy and aid offers from at least 70 nations, including countries usually on the receiving end of U.S. and other foreign help. Among them was Bangladesh, which Monday pledged $1 million.

British survivors who returned over the weekend told local newspapers they had been stuck in New Orleans' Superdome without help. Some said they were referred to a non-existent British consulate in New Orleans. Others said they felt intimidated as white people in the mostly African-American crowd of displaced persons.

"The army told us to stick in a group and for the women to sit in the middle with the men around the outside and be ready to defend ourselves," Will Nelson, 21, told The Times of London.

Monday, Britain began airlifting a half-million food ration packs to the USA. The British Embassy in Washington said Britain, which holds the rotating presidency of the 25-member European Union, was coordinating the response of other member states. The European Parliament opened its plenary session Monday with a minute of silence to honor the hurricane victims. "The United States is dealing with a tragedy of incomparable dimensions. Victims will be numerous," Parliament President Josip Borrell said.

Germany sent 25 tons of food. Italy shipped meals ready to eat (MREs). France flew in tents and blankets from Martinique, a French possession in the Caribbean. The United States accepted a Greek offer of two cruise ships to house evacuees, Greek spokesman Theodoros Rousopoulos said.

U.S. embassies provided lists of supplies needed including forklifts, generators, veterinarian supplies and baby formula and diapers.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who traveled Sunday to her home state of Alabama, said U.S. authorities already have used helicopters from Canada and Singapore and Air Canada aircraft to evacuate survivors.

Cuban President Fidel Castro on Sunday repeated an offer of 1,586 Cuban doctors equipped with medical supplies, but he said U.S. authorities had not responded.

Rice expressed appreciation for the foreign offers. “People have said that America has been so generous … in other places, and now it is time to be generous to America.”

But media reaction suggested that the U.S. image, already battered by Iraq, had taken another blow. “Hurricane Katrina has revealed that the U.S. is also fragile at home,” wrote the al-Khaleej newspaper in the United Arab Emirates on Monday.

Hurricane Aid Pours In (CSM)

By Peter Ford

The Christian Science Monitor, September 6, 2005

PARIS - Governments around the world rushed aid and relief teams to America's stricken southern states on Monday - some repaying past favors the United States has offered them to recover from natural disasters - while their citizens continued to express amazement and dismay at the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

In a dramatic reversal of usual roles, small nations such as Sri Lanka - badly hit by last December's tsunami - have extended their hands to the most powerful country on earth. And after initial ambivalence, American officials were accepting offers of help from over 50 countries with thanks.

"My country needs a lot of help because it has suffered a catastrophe that has no historical parallel," US ambassador to Spain, Eduardo Aguirre, said in Madrid on Monday, after asking the Spanish government for generators, medical equipment, pumps, and oil. "The most important thing right now is to know that we have friends."

Even America's foreign friends, however, have been free with their criticism of the way the US authorities handled rescue and relief operations in New Orleans last week. Repeated TV images of bodies floating in the floodwaters, crowds of homeless people abandoned to their fate for days, and looters emptying shops have raised harsh questions in Europe about the nature of American society.

"America's dark underbelly has been laid bare," charged London's Daily Mail in a headline Saturday, above a commentary drawing attention to the way in which the large majority of flood victims are poor and black.

As the scale of the disaster that hit Louisiana, Alabama, and Mississippi became clear, and Washington reversed its earlier decision that it did not need foreign aid, its allies readied thousands of tons of emergency supplies and hundreds of millions of dollars to feed, shelter, and care for displaced Americans forced from their homes.

As part of a NATO plan, the British government has flown 500,000 military ration packs to the afflicted zone, while the German government has sent food and is readying a hospital ship in case it is needed.

The French Red Cross has dispatched 17 logistics experts, trained in food distribution, shelter management, and other emergency skills, along with thousands of "family kits" containing food, medical, and hygiene items that had been stocked in Guadeloupe, ready for a disaster in the Caribbean.

The French and Italian governments put their military transport planes to work Sunday, carrying blankets, cots, tents, and inflatable dinghies, but there were signs that the sudden flood of relief supplies was overwhelming US authorities.

The Swedish Rescue Services Agency said Sunday it had postponed sending two portable water purification stations to New Orleans until the authorities were able to install them at Louis Armstrong International Airport.

DOJ_NMG_0002743

Asian countries were kicking in too, led by South Korea, which has pledged $30 million and 40 rescue workers. A fleet of Singaporean Chinook helicopters is already lifting survivors from roofs in New Orleans, and the Thai prime minister said Monday that his offer of 100 doctors and nurses had been accepted.

Even tiny Sri Lanka, which is still struggling to rebuild after last December's tsunami, has promised $25,000 to the American Red Cross.

In the Middle East, wealthy Gulf countries have promised funds to pay for the posthurricane clean-up: Kuwait - freed from Iraqi occupation 14 years ago by US-led troops - has pledged $500 million, the largest single donation so far. Even countries unfriendly to the US, such as Iran and Syria, have offered help. Cuba, too, has offered to send 1,100 doctors to Houston, if Washington wants them.

From Iraq, however, came a jarring note: Al Qaeda in Iraq, led by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, issued a statement on the Internet calling Katrina divine retribution. "God's great wrath has hit the head of the oppressors," the statement read.

Less vicious criticism of the US has been widely voiced in Europe and elsewhere, however, as foreigners expressed their bewilderment at the apparent inability of the government to care for its most desperate citizens in a crisis.

Commentators have returned time and again to the fact that the vast majority of flood victims, left to fend for themselves, are poor African-Americans. "America has been forced to wake up to the racial injustice that has been its historic curse," Jonathan Freedland wrote in Monday's edition of the left-leaning London daily The Guardian.

Others, including a BBC reporter in New Orleans, have been dismayed by the speed at which social ties broke down under pressure: There were no reports of tourists in Sri Lanka or Thailand being mugged after the tsunami, they point out, nor of looters shooting at policemen.

That might, perhaps, help explain one striking aspect of the international reaction to the tragedy in New Orleans and surrounding areas: It does not appear to have sparked the spontaneous outpouring of charitable solidarity in Europe or elsewhere that last December's tidal wave provoked in millions of people worldwide who sent donations.

As fleets of transport aircraft ferried emergency aid to America from around the world, pointed out Andre Kaspi, a history professor at the Sorbonne University in Paris, "this is intergovernmental solidarity. It is not the popular solidarity that was shown after the tsunami," he told French radio.

US Thanks NATO For Help With Katrina Disaster (REU)

Reuters, September 6, 2005

The top U.S. envoy to NATO thanked European allies on Monday for generous pledges of support in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, which has devastated New Orleans and U.S. Gulf Coast states.

NATO said on Sunday it was coordinating offers of help from its 26 members after Washington asked it and the European Union for help in dealing with the crisis, which has left hundreds and possibly thousands dead.

"The United States has been enormously grateful for the outpouring of support, both emotional and concrete, from allies over the past week," Victoria Nuland, the U.S. ambassador to NATO, said in a statement issued in Brussels.

"We have had specific offers from almost every ally... This once again proves the effectiveness and resilience of this alliance and its value for the American people and all allies."

NATO has activated its internal disaster response center to coordinate offers of help, as it did during a bout of flooding in Romania and Bulgaria earlier this summer. It has also sent an officer to work at the U.S. Federal Emergency Management Agency.

The United States has issued a list of things it needs most to tackle the disaster, ranging from financial aid to bedding, ready-to-eat meals, medical supplies and other humanitarian aid. It is not seeking military equipment such as helicopters.

France has said it is readying 300 tents, 980 field beds and other material for the United States, while over the weekend Germany sent two German army Airbus planes loaded with a combined 25 tonnes of food rations.

Dad's wisdom

During an appearance to appeal for Katrina relief funds in Houston yesterday, former President George Bush was asked how he felt about the unending criticism over the White House response to the hurricane, which has raged in much of the press this week.

Mr. Bush said as a father he does not like the criticism leveled at his son, President Bush, but added, "As a president, it goes with the territory," according to the Associated Press.

Clinton tag team

Hmmm. Could this portend political maneuvers to come? At that very same fundraising appeal yesterday, former President Bill Clinton was also asked about the government's response to Katrina.

"I think there should be an analysis of what happened." Mr. Clinton said, benevolently adding, "The time to do that is after some time passes."

His wife, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, was in the aggressor's role, however, calling the hurricane "a wake-up call." The New York Democrat is already urging the White House to set up a "Katrina Commission" in a letter sent to Mr. Bush.

"It has become increasingly evident that our nation was not prepared," Mrs. Clinton wrote, according to Agence France-Presse yesterday.

Mrs. Clinton also claimed that the pace of relief efforts "seems to confirm that our ability to respond to cataclysmic disasters has not been adequately addressed."

She plans to propose legislation to separate the Federal Emergency Management Agency from the Department of Homeland Security and make it into another Cabinet-level agency.

A cultural moment

Impoverished Afghanistan will give $100,000 for Katrina relief efforts, the U.S. Embassy has announced.

U.S. Ambassador Ronald Neumann thanked the Afghan people Sunday during a ceremony at which the aid was pledged by the government on behalf of the people of Afghanistan.

"Their compassion and generosity bears testimony to the strength of the ties between our two peoples," Mr. Neumann said, according to Reuters news agency.

Greatest show on Earth

Is the U.S. Senate getting ready to be the "world's greatest deliberative body" or a political circus during upcoming confirmation hearings for U.S. Supreme Court nominee Judge John G. Roberts Jr.?

Newsday's Raymond Keating wants to know, advising viewers and voters to "keep an eye on how their own senators behave," particularly Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat.

"Schumer's problem is he seems to forget he is not president and does not get to pick who sits on the federal bench. He also twists the Senate's 'advice and consent' role on court selections, promising to further undermine confidence in the process and the courts.

"New York's senior senator portrays himself as moderation's great defender. ... Schumer summed up the activist view: 'The Supreme Court makes law.' " Mr. Keating writes. "That's a gross misunderstanding, or misrepresentation, of our system of government. The Supreme Court is not supposed to make law, but to apply the law and the Constitution."

"It's also clear that Schumer evaluates judicial nominees based on a set of ideological issues. That's reflected in the long list of questions Schumer handed Roberts, seeking the judge's views on topics like campaign finance, abortion, the death penalty and environmental policy. If such questions become the norm, then nomination hearings will continue to degrade into vicious political games," Mr. Keating concluded.

Questions of the day

The National Pro-Life Action Center has five questions for Judge John G. Roberts Jr. that could provide the nation with a "foundational understanding of Judge Roberts' judicial temperament without asking him to 'forecast' or 'prejudge' any cases that may come before the high court," says director Paul Chaim Schenck.

The group wants to know:

•Do basic human rights come only from government or are they rooted in something that transcends government?

DOJ_NMG_0002745

•Is man's inherent human nature fixed, or does raw political power determine who is and is not a member of the human family?

•Is law merely the construct of jurists and lawmakers, or is it based first on principles of morals and justice?

•Is the proper role of the judiciary to restrain/limit itself to interpreting law or does it possess de facto legislative powers?

•Should the judiciary share power equally with the other two branches of government (the legislative and executive) or should its powers transcend them?

End of finger-pointing

It's time to neutralize the caustic Katrina blame game, according to the Chicago Tribune's Dennis Byrne yesterday.

"The ease and earnestness with which people express the knee-jerk belief that one of the most destructive and powerful forces in nature could have been defeated 'if only ...' belies a troubling level of ignorance or naivete," he writes.

"To suggest that all 'they' have to do to beat such a force is to build a sea wall 10 feet higher is screwy. So is the idea that all the food, water and shelter that a million refugees need can be positioned, as if overnight, within a day's ride of the destruction."

"The bigger story is the determination and compassion of the rescuers. So is the patience and courage of all those stranded, struggling, homeless people who have nothing left. How many of us would have so patiently tolerated such conditions? When patience overcomes desperation, it is a huge, moving story," Mr. Byrne wrote.

"This is no apologia ... Rather it is a disagreement with the simplistic view that 'they' can prevent or ameliorate every imaginable calamity. And if 'they' don't, it's proof of someone's incompetence, greed or callousness."

Roll Call, September 6, 2005

Rich is one word that comes to mind when we think of Rep. Darrell Issa (R-Calif.). Skimpy may now be another.

We hear Issa, the second richest Member of Congress, shocked his staff when he showed up at an office whitewater tubing outing wearing bikini briefs. Yes, a Speedo, a banana hammock, a ... well, you get the drift. A Congressional aide who relayed the story to HOH said Issa was "out there" for all to see, including the gals, who were sporting their own itsy-bitsy teeny-weeny bikinis.

One person who attended the outing laughed uncontrollably when HOH asked if Issa wore "a Speedo" but managed, between guffawing, to say that the Congressman didn't wear his revealing suit the entire time. He wore swim trunks over his bikini for much of the tubing and then took them off while he was drying off and hanging out with the gang, the source said.

Issa's office declined to comment to HOH about the Congressman's choice in bathing attire.

Congressman Elmo? It must have been a little confusing for the residents of tiny Silverton, Colo., when they tuned into a local radio interview of a guest they thought was Rep. John Salazar (D-Colo.), their Congressman, but who answered a question with, "Tee hee hee hee. Baby Elmo's happy!" There's more to the answer than meets the ear.

It was, indeed, Baby Elmo, not Congressman Salazar, who was giggling and asking for his "ba-ba" on the low-power station, independent KSJC. After Salazar blew off the host of one of the station's rock 'n' chat shows, the free-spirited libertarian host, Nick Sustana, decided to interview his child's Baby Elmo doll instead, pretending that the "Sesame Street" character was Salazar.

"You have to appease your base at some point," Sustana said in one of his first questions, "but you face a unique challenge: 98 percent of your base are less than 2 years old and won't be eligible to vote until the year 2021. How do you plan to win re-election given this seemingly insurmountable challenge?"

The host also attacked "Salazar" for pretending to have rural values when he grew up on a famous street in an urban area with a bunch of misfits. "One of your best friends lived in a trashcan. Another was some goth who thought he was Count Dracula and one youngster there was usually so stoned all he could think about was eating cookies 24 hours a day. Tell me, Congressman, what rural values did they teach you?"

The outrageous interview went on and on, with the host accusing his guest of soiling himself and crying all the time and Congressman Baby Elmo responding with "goo goo ga ga" and "tee hee hee." At one point, Sustana declared mockingly to the people of Silverton — population 531 — that by standing him up, "Congressman Salazar just urinated in all of Silverton's corn flakes."

Well, if he did, he tinkled in his family's corn flakes, too! Salazar has two elderly cousins who live in Silverton who likely would not be pleased to have their public servant cousin likened to Baby Elmo. Sustana told HOH that his station manager called in the middle of his tirade to say "tone it down" on account of Salazar kin living in the area.

Salazar was unaware that Baby Elmo was taking questions on his behalf, but his spokeswoman took the joke — and the obnoxious host's corn flakes jab — with good humor. "Congressman Salazar represents a large district and even though he begins each morning with the 'breakfast of champions' he can't be in two places at once," Nayerra Haq told HOH. "Despite being upstaged by Elmo, John would be 'tickled' to be on the show next time he is in Silverton."

A Hurricane of Support. While devastated residents of New Orleans could not get relief soon enough, plenty of Washingtonians were eager to help inside the Beltway. Bipartisan fundraisers galore have been planned all over town, mostly to benefit the Red Cross and all, of course, promising libations and entertainment for the recess weary.

The biggie of the Big Easy parties is Wednesday night at the lobbying firm Jones Day, a joint fundraiser by the Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi and Florida state societies. The folk-funky group Down Dexter is opening for the popular Wil Gravatt Band. Organizers were hoping to convince former Louisiana Sen. John Breaux (D) to serve as VIP emcee for the event. Reps. Alcee Hastings (D-Fla.), Mark Foley (R-Fla.) and Charlie Melancon (D-La.) were among those who had RSVP'd as of Friday afternoon.

Admission prices come in three ranges: $20, $1,000 and $2,000 per person. The party's fundraising goal is $50,000, all of which will go to the American Red Cross Disaster Relief Fund for victims of Hurricane Katrina.

Run, Don't Drink. For the non-lushes who want to help disaster victims — or for those who can at least burn the candle at both ends — there will be a Gulf Coast Relief Run on Sept. 17 in Old Town Alexandria. The 5K race is being sponsored by Roll Call, the Great Harvest Bread Company and Mizuno USA.

VIP runners include none other than Ragin' Cajun James Carville, his wife, Mary Matalin, and sports commentator Tony Kornheiser. The cost to enter the race is $25, which includes a T-shirt. Again, all proceeds will go toward the Red Cross relief fund.

Double Trap For Foreign Workers (NYT)

By Ian Urbina

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

BILOXI, Miss., Sept. 5 - Like so many other people here, Pedro, a landscaper from Chiapas, Mexico, is desperately trying to get out of Biloxi. He wants to take his wife, Anna, who is eight months pregnant, someplace cleaner and safer, wherever that might be.

But aside from being low on gas like everyone else, Pedro, who would not give his last name because he is undocumented, is nervous about traveling in a city swarming with police officers and National Guard troops.

Bran Dize, a prep cook from Spanish Town, Jamaica, near Kingston, worries that Hurricane Katrina may suddenly have made him an illegal immigrant because, he said, his guest worker visa requires him to work at a casino - the Beau Rivage - that, for all practical purposes, no longer exists.

Hurricane Katrina has left its victims feeling vulnerable and uncertain, but for many noncitizens trapped here, the anxiety is especially acute because they worry that they will jeopardize their legal status if they try to leave.

There are worries, too, about those who may not have survived the storm. The Mexican government has opened two mobile consulates in the affected areas, one in Mobile, Ala., and the other in Baton Rouge, La., to begin looking for tens of thousands of their citizens reported missing. The authorities in Mexico estimated that 145,000 Mexicans live in the area. At a tense meeting on Friday with immigration officials from the Jamaican government, a group of about 40 Jamaican guest workers from the Grand Casino, the Beau Rivage and the Casino Magic fired a battery of tough questions.

"Will we get paid for the remaining three months left in our contracts?" one woman asked from the back of the crowd gathered at the Fairview apartments here. "We don't have plane tickets back to Jamaica," another said. "Who will pay for these?"

Solid answers were in short supply. "I'm looking into this right now, but you have to be patient," said Barbara Dacosia, who oversees the 950 or so Jamaicans who work in casinos along the Gulf Coast in a nine-month guest worker program. "We're going to do some practical things, and we're going to do some tropical things, and that means we're going to pray."

Much like these immigrants, the city of Biloxi, defined over the past century by its transient culture of summer vacationers, sailors and gamblers, is at a standstill. Boats have been washed ashore. The number of visitors has dropped to zero from 10 million a year. The floating casinos have sunk. And movement is difficult.

"We tried to get gas, but when we got to the counter with our container, the man waved his hand and said no," Pedro, the Mexican landscaper, said in Spanish. "We couldn't say anything because we thought he might get mad and call the police."

José, also a Chiapas native who did not want to give his last name because he is undocumented, said that the only people he knew outside of Biloxi lived in Denver. But aside from having less than $20 left, he said he was also unsure whether he could make it that far without getting caught by the immigration authorities.

Like the many immigrants who came to the area as cheap labor to help rebuild Biloxi after Hurricane Ivan, José arrived in the area in September 2004 looking for contract work. "If I get a chance to get out of here, I'm going," he said. "This is all I know."

Ian Nelson, a Jamaican guest worker who for the last six months had been a housekeeper for the Grand Casino, said he would also rather not stay in the country. But as the only source of income for his parents in Jamaica, Mr. Nelson said he hoped the casino would find work for him in another state.

"I doubt they are going to help us," he said, "because no one from the company has even checked to see if their workers who are stranded here are O.K." About 344 Jamaican guest workers were in Biloxi, based at the three casinos in the city, said Ms. Dacosia, the chief liaison for the Jamaican Central Labor Organization. It is not clear whether they will be returned home without pay or placed in other jobs, she said.

Mr. Nelson said he had never felt more trapped in his life.

"I have come and gone under the work program for the past four years and never had troubles with the program," he said. "But I paid for my own plane ticket and now I am here and I don't know if I will get the work and money that I was promised."

After Katrina, Insurance Costs To Rise (WSJ)

By Theo Francis

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

Home and car owners in the Gulf Coast states can expect to see substantial increases in their insurance premiums in coming months, while rate rises could spread more broadly if insurance-company losses from Hurricane Katrina continue to climb.

Early estimates of damage to insured property from the massive hurricane range from $14 billion to $35 billion, with some catastrophe-modeling companies sharply raising their latest forecasts late last week as they gained details about the extent of the devastation from aerial surveys and learned more about damage to offshore oil production. That could make Katrina the costliest U.S. storm on record. Total economic losses -- including damage to uninsured property and flood damage -- is expected to exceed $100 billion.

"No matter where it falls in that range, it puts additional rate pressure on commercial-property and home owners in that region," says Robert Hartwig, chief economist for the Insurance Information Institute, a trade group in New York.

Past calamities suggest that broad increases are possible when the industry receives an unprecedented shock. After 1992's Hurricane Andrew -- currently No. 1 among natural disasters, at $21.6 billion of insured losses in today's dollars -- homeowners' rates spiked in states beyond the storm-hit region and insurers began offering less-generous policy provisions. After the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, which triggered $35.9 billion of insurance claims in today's dollars, commercial-insurance rates soared across the country.

So far, many analysts have been wary of predicting steep rate increases outside the hardest-hit areas, anticipating that insurance regulators elsewhere would be reluctant to approve rate increases for car and home owners in their states if Katrina, as devastating a human tragedy as it has been, eats up only a tiny fraction of the property-casualty sector's overall $400 billion in capital. The more depleted insurers' capital, the assets insurers can draw on to pay claims, the more pressure they would feel to seek rate increases.

"Obviously, the risks to a place like New Orleans were underestimated, and the cost of insurance in those exposed areas will go up," Allstate Corp. Chairman and Chief Executive Edward M. Liddy said in an interview Friday.

Beyond premium increases, homeowners in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama could see stark changes in the insurance landscape. Thanks to Hurricane Andrew, Florida homeowners now pay steep deductibles for hurricanes -- often 3% or more of a home's insured value. Many can find coverage only from a state-run insurer of last resort. After the four hurricanes that struck Florida last year, several insurers, including Allstate, stopped writing new policies in the state; many are seeking stiff rate increases from state regulators. Most insurance policies pay damages for wind, including wind-driven rain, but don't cover damage from flooding. The federal government offers residential flood insurance.

The estimates for Katrina-related losses are based on unusually imperfect data. As of Friday, neither the firms that specialize in estimates nor insurers had gotten close enough to flooded New Orleans or Mississippi coast cities to actually survey the damage. Moreover, catastrophe-modeling firms say some wind-speed sensors failed in the storm. At least one firm is taking aerial photos to try to make up for the lack of data.

For insurers, raising rates locally or nationally won't change what is likely to be a significant third-quarter hit to profits, albeit after enjoying strong results in recent years. In the longer term, raising rates could help profitability -- and leave the industry still better-prepared to face similar disasters -- at least until the next time the industry vies for market share, triggering one of its recurring price wars.

Late last week, as TV footage showed looting and fires in New Orleans, a report by Moody's Investors Service cited "unusual characteristics" of Katrina that could make it "relatively more costly for insurers than their recent experiences with Florida hurricanes might suggest, and may cause the industry's insured losses to exceed the midpoint of preliminary estimates, possibly by a large amount."

Moody's noted that automobile claims will be higher than in other storms due to the extensive flooding; although flooding isn't covered under most homeowners' policies, submerged cars could prove costly to auto insurers. The flooding in New Orleans also could lead to "a meaningful amount of disputes between insureds and insurance companies," said Jeffrey Berg, a Moody's senior analyst, as policyholders seek proceeds despite the flooding exclusion.

Also pointing toward higher costs: "the extensive infrastructure damage which will complicate the task of remediating losses, and expected demand surge in labor and material costs," said Moody's Group Managing Director Ted Collins, a co-author of the report.

And the longer New Orleans or other locations are sealed off by authorities, the more insurers will have to pay in business-interruption claims, which compensate commercial policyholders for revenue lost from covered perils.

"Response time is the enemy in all natural disasters and impacts everyone including the insurance industry," says Richard Clinton, president of EQECAT, a catastrophe-modeling company that on Friday raised its estimate of insurance losses to between $14 billion and $22 billion, from an earlier estimate of $9 billion to $16 billion.

Any effort by insurers to seek increases may be fought by consumer groups. Insurers have little excuse for seeking rate increases nationally, or even within the hardest-hit states, maintains Robert Hunter, a former Texas insurance commissioner and director of insurance for the Consumer Federation of America. Despite the four Florida hurricanes last year with a combined $23.7 billion in claims in today's dollars, he says that rates dropped for homeowners' policies last year outside Florida and "the profits continued to roll in," setting industry records in this year's first and second quarters. Moreover, he argues that current rates incorporate the likelihood of severe storms. Given insurers' extensive computer modeling, "the fact that one of the [storm] events happens shouldn't be a surprise," he says.

Bush Nominates Roberts As Chief Justice (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0002749

President Bush nominated John G. Roberts Jr. yesterday as the 17th chief justice of the United States, promoting his nominee for associate justice to lead the Supreme Court and the rest of the federal judiciary even before Roberts was confirmed for the first assignment.

Moving swiftly as he copes with the devastation of Hurricane Katrina, Bush announced his decision just two days after the death of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and 48 days after picking Roberts to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. In elevating Roberts, Bush chose the candidate most likely to be confirmed in short order by the Senate, which was poised to ratify the appeals court judge for O'Connor's seat.

The move could ensure Bush's influence on the judiciary long after his presidency ends. In the past half-century, only two other presidents have had the opportunity to name a chief justice to a lifetime appointment. A former Rehnquist clerk, Roberts shares a philosophical outlook with the man he would succeed and, at age 50, would be the youngest chief justice since John Marshall was appointed in 1801, potentially giving him decades to shape the court's direction.

Since O'Connor agreed to remain until her successor is confirmed, the move means that the court could open its next term on Oct. 3 with nine justices sitting. But in shifting Roberts to the center chair, Bush now must find someone else to replace O'Connor, in some ways an even more consequential choice because she cast the swing vote on issues such as affirmative action, abortion and the death penalty for many years.

"It is in the interest of the court and the country to have a chief justice on the bench on the first full day of the fall term," Bush said in the Oval Office before flying to the Gulf Coast for a second time to inspect relief efforts. "The Senate is well along in the process of considering Judge Roberts's qualifications. They know his record and his fidelity to the law. I'm confident that the Senate can complete hearings and confirm him as chief justice within a month."

Roberts, who appeared alone at Bush's side, seemed mindful that he would replace his mentor rather than join him on the court. "I am honored and humbled by the confidence that the president has shown in me," he said. "And I'm very much aware that if I am confirmed, I would succeed a man I deeply respect and admire, a man who has been very kind to me for 25 years."

The Senate Judiciary Committee, which had been scheduled to open hearings on Roberts's confirmation to O'Connor's seat today, decided yesterday to postpone the process probably until Monday in deference to Rehnquist, who will be buried at Arlington National Cemetery tomorrow.

The same liberal groups that opposed Roberts for associate justice declared him even more unfit for chief. "His views are very much out of sync with civil rights, women's rights, privacy," said Nan Aron, president of the Alliance for Justice. "Certainly reviewing so many of those memos and briefs and papers he authored makes one wonder whether he understands how the law affects ordinary people."

Several Senate Democrats argued that Roberts should receive greater scrutiny for chief justice. "The stakes are higher and the Senate's advice and consent responsibility is even more important," said Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), adding that "the Senate must be vigilant in considering this nomination."

But there was no indication that his nomination faces any significant threat. "He will be an excellent chief," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). "I still expect Judge Roberts to be confirmed before the Supreme Court starts its new term on October 3."

Bush always had Roberts in mind for the next chief justice, aides said yesterday. Roberts was first secretly interviewed for a Supreme Court slot in April in anticipation that the cancer-stricken Rehnquist would retire or die. When O'Connor surprised the White House by announcing her retirement in July and Rehnquist declared that he was not stepping down, Bush decided to appoint Roberts to O'Connor's seat.

Even then, aides said yesterday that the president intended to elevate Roberts to chief justice whenever the job came open. "This had been something in the back of the president's mind in case such a scenario came into being, if the chief justice had retired," said White House press secretary Scott McClellan. "The president, when he met with [Roberts], knew he was a natural-born leader."

Bush summoned Roberts to the White House on Sunday, and the two met in the residential quarters at 5:30 p.m. for 30 to 45 minutes, McClellan said. White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. sat in at first and then left the two alone. Bush called Roberts back to the White House at 7:15 a.m. yesterday and offered him the job. Bush made the announcement 45 minutes later.

Card discussed the decision with Frist, Reid, Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and the committee's ranking Democrat, Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.), while the White House counsel's office called Justice John Paul Stevens, the court's senior member and acting chief, to inform him of the decision. Bush did not call O'Connor to tell her that her retirement may be postponed until after he was on Air Force One flying to Louisiana.

Although the chief justice has no more votes than his eight brethren, he presides over their conferences, sets the initial agenda for considering cases and, when in the majority, assigns which justice will write a ruling, defining the extent of its reach. He also wields a variety of administrative and policy powers not only over the high court but the broader federal judiciary and has a number of unique responsibilities, such as presiding over presidential impeachment trials and appointing the court that reviews secret wiretaps by U.S. intelligence agencies.

Most chief justices have been appointed from outside the Supreme Court, but in the past century they typically had long tenures on lower courts or had served as governors, Cabinet secretaries or, in one case, president. With just two years on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, Roberts boasts no such credential and would be much younger than the colleagues he would lead. Three and a half decades his senior, Stevens, 85, was already a justice when Roberts was an undergraduate at Harvard University.

But Roberts has the advantage of being well known to the justices, having argued 39 cases before the Supreme Court. "He can pull it off because they really respect him," said Leonard A. Leo, executive vice president of the Federalist Society, a conservative legal group. "What other justices look for in a chief justice is honesty, straight-shooting and smarts. That's what they want, and that's what they'll get."

Roberts grew up in Indiana, graduated magna cum laude from Harvard Law School, clerked for Rehnquist, worked as a lawyer in Ronald Reagan's Justice Department and White House, and served as principal deputy solicitor general under Kenneth W. Starr in the George H.W. Bush administration. A decade of private practice earned him the status of one of Washington's most accomplished appellate lawyers before the president put him on the appeals court in 2003.

Documents released from his government service in the past few weeks revealed Roberts to be a strong conservative with a sharp pen opposed to many affirmative action programs, open to more religion in public arenas and deeply skeptical of what he called the "so-called right to privacy" that undergirds abortion and other rights established by the Supreme Court.

As the Senate digests that record in coming weeks, Bush will turn his attention to his second nomination, although advisers believe he is likely to wait to make an announcement until after the final Roberts confirmation vote to avoid complicating that process and to allow him to publicly focus on disaster relief in the Gulf Coast.

Conservative allies will press the White House to pick another Roberts. "He's a perfect fulfillment of the president's promise," said Wendy E. Long, chief counsel to the Judicial Confirmation Network, a group dedicated to promoting judges who will strictly interpret the Constitution. "There's great happiness with him. If there were another Judge Roberts out there, or the closest thing, I think that would be perfect."

In this view, appeals judges such as J. Michael Luttig, Edith Hollan Jones, Priscilla R. Owen and Emilio M. Garza would be leading contenders. Appellate judge Edith Brown Clement, who fled her home in New Orleans because of Katrina, was a finalist when Roberts was chosen and, although not considered for chief justice, she could again be on the list for associate justice. So, too, could Judge J. Harvie Wilkinson III, who was interviewed by Bush in July, although at 60 he may be older than the president would like to ensure a long tenure.

The most prominent candidate on Bush's list is Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, his Texas friend who would be the first nation's Hispanic justice, but conservatives vocally oppose him out of fear that he is a closet moderate.

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.), a Bush ally, said yesterday that the president will probably name a woman or a minority to replace the nation's first female justice and offered a vigorous defense of Gonzales. "He would be a very good nominee and one that I would be happy to support," Cornyn said. "I've read about these concerns from some conservatives, and I really wonder where they are getting some of these strange ideas."

Democrats Seek Increased Scrutiny Of Roberts (REU-Y2)

By Thomas Ferraro

DOJ_NMG_0002751

Reuters, September 6, 2005

Key Democrats called for greater scrutiny of John Roberts on Monday after President George W. Bush nominated him to head the U.S. Supreme Court rather than be an associate justice.

Their call was seconded by liberal groups, which have voiced concerns about Roberts' record on civil and women's rights in an uphill bid to deny the 50-year-old conservative a seat on the high court.

But Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, a Tennessee Republican, hailed Bush's decision and predicted Roberts would win Senate confirmation as chief justice of the Supreme Court before the court begins its new term on October 3.

"This nomination certainly raises the stakes," said Sen. Charles Schumer (news, bio, voting record), a New York Democrat and a member of the Judiciary Committee that will hold confirmation hearings.

Sen. Edward Kennedy (news, bio, voting record), a Massachusetts Democrat, said, "Before the Senate acts on John Roberts' new nomination, we should know even more about his record, and we should know whom the president intends to propose to nominate as a replacement for Sandra Day O'Connor."

Bush nominated Roberts, a federal appeals court judge the past two years, to replace Chief Justice William Rehnquist, who died on Saturday after a long bout with cancer.

In doing so, Bush recast the nomination he made of Roberts in July to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

O'Connor, a moderate conservative, often cast the decisive vote on the nine-member court. Rehnquist was one of the most powerful and conservative jurists in U.S. history.

Roberts' confirmation hearing was to begin on Tuesday. But in wake of Rehnquist's death, Bush's new nomination of Roberts as chief justice and Hurricane Katrina, Senate leaders agreed to postpone the proceeding briefly.

Senate leaders arranged to announce on Tuesday a new date.

A congressional aide said the hearing would start next Monday.

Preparing for the hearing, Schumer said, "We hope the White House will reconsider its refusal to release relevant and important documents that will shed light on what kind of Chief Justice Judge Roberts would become."

DOCUMENTS DEBATE

Thousands of pages of documents have been released in recent weeks stemming from Roberts' work as an attorney in the Reagan administration two decades ago.

But the White House has refused to make public records related to his work as deputy solicitor general in the administration of the first President George Bush.

Roberts, who has received the American Bar Association's highest rating, appears to enjoy broad support in the Senate, which Republicans control, holding 55 of 100 seats.

No Senate Democrat has come out against him, while others have spoken glowingly of the nominee. Some say they want to see him closely questioned before making a decision.

Debra Ness of the National Partnership for Women & Families, which opposed the nomination of Roberts as an associate justice, denounced the bid to make him chief justice.

"Judge Roberts stood out, even in the Reagan administration, for his ultra-conservative views and his disdain for measures that would protect rights of critical importance to women and people of color," Ness said.

Senators Differ On Pace Of Hearing (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON — Senate Republicans and at least one key Democrat said Monday that John Roberts appears headed for confirmation this month as the youngest chief justice in more than two centuries.

But some liberal Democrats are arguing for a delay to let senators and the public better assess the impact that filling two vacancies will have on the nation's highest court. Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said the Senate should postpone a decision on whether Roberts replaces the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist until President Bush announces how he plans to fill the other court vacancy.

DOJ_NMG_0002752

"We should know whom the president intends to propose to nominate as a replacement for Sandra Day O'Connor," Kennedy said, referring to the retiring Supreme Court justice Roberts originally was tapped to succeed.

Rehnquist's death on Saturday — and Bush's decision Monday to make Roberts, 50, his replacement — set off a tug of war over the timing of confirmation hearings, demonstrating that tensions over the court's makeup are close to the surface in the Senate and could erupt into a political firefight.

Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the Judiciary Committee's top Democrat, told MSNBC the hearings would begin Monday. However, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., who sets the Senate's schedule, would only say that they would begin within a week.

Liberal Democrats argued for more time, but some conservative Republicans are pushing for an early start. "It is now more critical than ever for the Senate to move quickly," Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., said.

Frist plans a full Senate vote on Roberts during the last week of the month so the jurist would be in place when the court begins its 2005-2006 term Oct. 3. Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada agreed. "We should move forward," he said, but he'd wait to talk to fellow Democrats about timing.

Even before Rehnquist's death, Roberts was getting favorable reviews from senators, including centrist Democrats such as Joe Lieberman of Connecticut and Ben Nelson of Nebraska.

On Monday, Nelson said Bush "has taken the path of least resistance" in nominating Roberts to replace Rehnquist. Nelson said he doesn't want to commit his vote but said, "I can't imagine there will be anything that comes out that causes me not to vote for him."

Nelson and Lieberman are members of the "Gang of 14," a bipartisan group of senators that stopped a near-political meltdown in the Senate over judges earlier this year. The group brokered a deal that could have a major impact on Bush's pick for the second Supreme Court vacancy.

Frist and other conservatives wanted to eliminate Democrats' ability to filibuster, or block, a nominee by refusing to end debate. Some veteran Senate Republicans such as John Warner of Virginia opposed that, arguing that it would give up an important check on White House power.

The "gang" agreed to preserve the minority's right to filibuster, so long as it is used only in "extraordinary circumstances."

Senators now believe a battle could be joined over O'Connor's replacement. Unlike Rehnquist, a reliable conservative, "she's a swing vote," Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas., said. Cornyn, who is close to the White House, believes the president's choice will be dictated less by ideology than other political considerations.

"I would expect to see either a woman or a minority nominated," he said.

Hill Calls On Heavyweight Advisers In Supreme Court Battle (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 6, 2005

When Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, one of the key Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee, faced a re-election fight against an unknown businessman in 1994, he turned to a highly trusted private lawyer to dig up dirt on his opponent.

Now, James Flug has rejoined Mr. Kennedy's staff and will advise him during the Supreme Court confirmation hearings for Judge John G. Roberts Jr.

"Jim Flug is the 8,000-pound gorilla who will be driving this thing," said Makan Delrahim, former Judiciary Committee staff director for Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, Utah Republican.

He is "very personable, experienced and weathered in nominations fights," added Mr. Delrahim. "He knows how to build coalitions, how to ask the probing questions and he knows how to staff somebody like Ted Kennedy."

Conservatives have noted Mr. Flug's role.

"It is hard to fathom Mr. Flug coming back to Capitol Hill after 30 years of private practice for anything other than a bitterly tough confirmation fight," Ed Meese of the Heritage Foundation, Leonard Leo of the Federalist Society and Jay Sekulow of the American Center for Law and Justice warned in a joint statement.

DOJ_NMG_0002753

Mr. Flug, who did not respond to e-mail, worked for Mr. Kennedy during the defeat of Nixon Supreme Court nominees Clement Haynesworth and G. Harold Carswell. After leaving Mr. Kennedy's staff for private practice, Mr. Flug rejoined the Kennedy staff two years ago.

But his involvement in Mr. Kennedy's 1994 campaign against Mitt Romney, who is now state governor, caused a stir when the Boston Globe revealed that the campaign had paid Mr. Flug to hire the Investigative Group Inc., the firm run by former Watergate investigator Terry Lenzner, to dig through Mr. Romney's background.

Mr. Flug isn't the only operative brought back for Supreme Court vacancy fights. Michael O'Neill, former nominations counsel to Mr. Hatch, was hired earlier this year to be chief counsel to Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania.

A professor at George Mason University, Mr. O'Neill clerked for Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas and served on the U.S. Sentencing Commission from 1999 to 2005. Many Republican judiciary staffers believe Mr. Specter hired Mr. O'Neill to help assuage conservatives that he was committed to ensuring confirmation of President Bush's judicial nominees.

Mr. O'Neill's Democrat counterpart on the committee is Bruce Cohen, chief counsel for Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat and ranking minority member of the committee. Mr. Cohen, who joined Mr. Leahy's staff in 1993, was hired by Mr. Specter to be his counsel on the Judiciary Committee in 1981.

One of the most energetic staffers behind the scenes of the confirmation fight will be Don Stewart, the relentless spokesman for Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican. Mr. Stewart, a former intelligence analyst in the Army, joined Mr. Cornyn after he was first elected in 2002.

Last week, the Hill publication National Journal predicted that Mr. Cornyn would be one of Judge Roberts' "most staunch and resolute" defenders.

"Cornyn, a savvy freshman who is closely allied with the White House, will vie for the mantle of the quickest, most relentless defender of the nominee," Kirk Victor wrote. "Cornyn's aggressive press shop has established a rapid-response role in which it immediately challenges every charge leveled by Democratic critics against the nominee."

As Mr. Cornyn likes to say: "A charge unrebutted is too often a charge believed."

New Kid On Top (WP)

By Mark Leibovich

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

Nice summer for John Roberts's career.

He goes from being a relative unknown to being The Man to being, as of yesterday morning, THE MAN -- all in a few weeks.

If Roberts, 50, is confirmed before the next session, he would be the youngest chief justice since John Marshall, who was 45 when he was sworn in 204 years ago. Fifty is Young Turk territory among Supreme Court justices, if not for the rest of us. Among chief justices, 50 is a Turk in diapers.

Roberts would assume the top position in the third branch of the federal government. He would swear in the successor to the president who just nominated him. And he would succeed the chief justice -- William Rehnquist, who died Saturday at 80-- for whom Roberts himself clerked. From Day One, he would occupy the largest seat on the Supreme Court -- the chief's seat is physically bigger than the others -- and serve with justices who began their legal careers when he was still in a highchair.

It all fixes Roberts as a seminal figure in the annals of whiz kids.

He is Doogie Howser, Rudolph taking over as lead reindeer (and getting a whole song written about him) and the youngest Osmonds -- Donny and Marie -- taking over the family act. He is Dan Quayle with spell check, leapfrogging the GOP older guard to become, overnight, the 41-year-old vice president. He is Michael Corleone in the "The Godfather: Part II," unbothered by need to rise patiently through the ranks.

Okay, so maybe it's a stretch to compare Justice Antonin Scalia to the character played by Dennis Quaid in the 2004 film "In Good Company," whose new whiz-kid boss -- played by Topher Grace -- is considerably younger and less experienced than he (and who also happens to be sleeping with his daughter). But it's worth asking: What happens when three organizational prototypes -- New Kid, Whiz Kid and Top Dog -- all combine at the same time, in the same person?

If confirmed, Roberts will find out.

"It's going to take a great deal of emotional intelligence on John Roberts's part, which I'm confident he has," says Michael Maccoby, a Washington psychoanalyst and anthropologist who has studied the psychology of leadership in business and government. Maccoby distinguishes Roberts from an array of young leaders -- such as Robert McNamara, who took over as president of Ford Motor Co. at 44, and McGeorge Bundy, who became dean of the faculty of arts and sciences at Harvard at 34 -- whom he describes as "radicals," or "narcissistic leaders." Such types tend to be arrogant and show disregard for traditional protocol.

The Supreme Court is hardly a Silicon Valley start-up with a freewheeling sensibility suited to young leaders and radical thinkers. For starters, there is no board of directors that can fire Roberts. "The Senate is John Roberts's board of directors," says Erik Brynjolsson, a professor at MIT's Sloan School of Management. And if he gets past the Senate, Brynjolsson says, "there's nobody who can boot him off the island if they don't like his work."

The lifetime appointment changes a central dynamic of whiz-kid leadership. What's more, the Supreme Court is an institution rich in tradition, grounded in precedent -- and whose customs Roberts understands. "It will certainly help Roberts that he knows the court and that he clerked there," says Rick Garnett, a law professor at the University of Norte Dame who, like Roberts, clerked for Rehnquist.

Unlike an institution such as Congress, the Supreme Court places less emphasis on seniority, Garnett says. There also tends to be less personal jealousy and ego: "These people don't have to stand for election," he says, so there is less emphasis on taking credit and getting out front on matters.

"Maybe I'm an idealist," Garnett adds, "but there is a certain sense that these justices are in this honored profession. It seems like they're doing something loftier than, say, highway appropriations."

Roberts May Replace Mentor As Chief Justice (REU-Y2)

By Jim Vicini

Reuters, September 6, 2005

John Roberts had hoped to soon join Chief Justice William Rehnquist on the U.S. Supreme Court. Now Roberts may succeed the late legal giant, who was one of his earliest conservative mentors.

A generation ago, Roberts served as a young law clerk to Rehnquist, helping the then associate justice research and write court opinions.

On Monday, President George W. Bush nominated Roberts, a federal appeals court judge for the past two years who has also worked in two Republican administrations, to replace Rehnquist, who died on Saturday after a long bout with cancer.

"I am honored and humbled by the confidence that the president has shown in me," Roberts said as he stood beside Bush in the Oval Office.

"And I'm very much aware that if I am confirmed, I would succeed a man I deeply respect and admire, a man who has been very kind to me for 25 years," Roberts said.

The development came as the Senate prepared to open hearings on Bush's earlier nomination in July of Roberts to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a moderate conservative who often cast the decisive vote on the closely divided nine-member court.

Rehnquist's death gave Bush a historic opportunity to reshape the court, which interprets the U.S. Constitution and decides major legal questions such as abortion.

Bush changed the nomination so Roberts, if confirmed by the Senate, would replace Rehnquist, one of the most powerful and conservative jurists in U.S. history during a more than 30-year career on the Supreme Court.

At 50, Roberts would be the youngest chief justice in more than 200 years since John Marshall was appointed in 1801 at the age of 45.

DOJ_NMG_0002755

As the 17th chief justice, he could end up holding the lifetime seat for decades and help shape the court and the American way of life on matters from civil rights to voting rights to women's rights.

Bush's selection of Roberts came after weeks of tough scrutiny that found public support for the nominee and no major obstacles despite the concerns of a number of liberal groups.

Roberts' record will be closely examined by Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee, who have vowed to question him during his confirmation hearing about his judicial philosophy and whether he supports abortion rights and civil rights.

During Reagan's presidency, Roberts worked as a special assistant to Attorney General William French Smith at the Justice Department in 1981-1982, and then in the White House counsel's office.

PAPER TRAIL

Recently released memos showed that Roberts embraced the conservative Reagan administration's efforts to limit judicial power and opposed a proposed equal rights amendment for women and civil rights remedies such as busing school children.

As a Justice Department aide, Roberts advised O'Connor at her own confirmation hearings in 1981 to avoid specific answers about legal issues likely to come before the court, a tactic he is expected to use to avoid creating any controversy.

Bush first nominated Roberts for the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. The Senate confirmed Roberts in a voice vote on May 8, 2003.

While on the bench, Roberts has been involved in several important rulings.

He was part of the three-judge panel that handed the Bush administration a critical victory by ruling that the military tribunals for terrorism suspects at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, could proceed.

The ruling was announced on July 15, the same day that Roberts later disclosed he had been interviewed by Bush about the Supreme Court vacancy.

Some senators plan to question Roberts about whether he had a potential conflict of interest and should have removed himself from the closely watched terrorism case which is now pending before the Supreme Court.

Roberts argued before the Supreme Court as the principal deputy solicitor general from 1989 to 1993, during the presidency of Bush's father.

In 1990, Roberts signed a brief that stated the first Bush administration's belief that the Supreme Court's historic 1973 decision that legalized abortion should be overturned. But at his 2003 confirmation hearings, Roberts described the 1973 decision as "settled law."

Born in Buffalo, New York, in 1955, Roberts was raised in Indiana. He received his undergraduate degree from Harvard in 1976 and then graduated from Harvard Law School in 1979.

Roberts lives in Chevy Chase, Maryland, with his wife, Jane Sullivan Roberts, and with their two adopted children. The couple has a net worth of more than $5 million, Roberts said.

Chief Justice Rehnquist Dies At 80 (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Law.com, September 5, 2005

The death of Chief Justice William Rehnquist late on Saturday ends his historic 33-year career on the Supreme Court and presents President George W. Bush with a rare challenge to fill a new vacancy just as John Roberts Jr., his nominee to Sandra Day O'Connor's seat on the Court, was about to face Senate hearings.

Bush answered part of that challenge swiftly, nominating Roberts on Monday to replace Rehnquist as chief justice. In an early morning announcement from the Oval Office, the president said he hoped the Senate would confirm Roberts before the Court sits for its next term Oct. 3.

The Senate is expected to begin Roberts' confirmation hearings as chief justice either Thursday or next Monday. The opening of his previously scheduled confirmation hearings, for the position of associate justice, initially was to be Tuesday, but that was canceled until after Rehnquist's funeral on Wednesday.

Roberts himself was a former Rehnquist clerk who would have been the first former law clerk to serve as a justice alongside the justice for whom he worked. Now Roberts could replace him if he is confirmed as the nation's 17th chief justice.

Rehnquist, 80, died at his home in Arlington, Va. after a 10-month battle with thyroid cancer. He was the first justice to die in office since Robert Jackson in 1954. He had squelched rumors of his retirement in July, promising to stay on the Court as long "as long as my health permits...." But Court spokeswoman Kathy Arberg said his health took "a precipitous decline" in recent days, and his three children were with him when he died.

President Bush in a statement on Sunday said Rehnquist's death was "a tremendous loss for our nation" and indicated he would move quickly to name a replacement. Immediately, the speculation that followed O'Connor's retirement announcement on July 1 resumed. Court historian David Garrow, now at Cambridge University, said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was "the presumptive favorite" to replace Rehnquist, but other commentators offered a range of scenarios, including the elevation of Justice Antonin Scalia, renominating Roberts as chief justice, and even O'Connor postponing her departure. In a statement Sunday, Gonzales said Rehnquist "will surely be remembered as one of our Nation's greatest Chief Justices, and his leadership, courage and humility will be missed."

Rehnquist's colleagues issued statements Sunday lamenting his passing. Justice John Paul Stevens, who will preside over the Court as senior justice until Rehnquist is replaced, said, "William Rehnquist's independent, impartial, and dedicated leadership of the Supreme Court has been an inspiration to those of us privileged to serve with him--and to the entire Nation as well."

Rehnquist had a remarkable Supreme Court career, morphing from "lone ranger" status as an associate justice into the influential leader of a conservative Court that nonetheless preserved affirmative action and abortion rights and furthered gay and women's rights.

As chief justice and titular head of the federal judiciary since 1986, Rehnquist gently nudged the nation's highest court into the 21st century, complete with a user-friendly web site that made opinions available online, and quick release of oral argument audiotapes in landmark cases. He drew the line, however, at allowing camera coverage of Court proceedings.

With a manner that was alternately genial, shy and stern, Rehnquist won admirers from all parts of the political spectrum. Republicans praised him for his fealty to a conservative jurisprudence while liberals generally found him to be an affable jurist who ran the Court collegially and well, seemingly unperturbed by his failure to steer the Court sharply to the right. "A great chief justice," the late liberal lion Thurgood Marshall once said of Rehnquist.

Though Rehnquist found conservative camaraderie in Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, his potentially conservative juggernaut was kept in check by other Republican appointees O'Connor and David Souter, and, to a lesser extent, Anthony Kennedy. One of only two dissenters in the 1973 case Roe v. Wade, Rehnquist failed to undo abortion rights when O'Connor, Kennedy and Souter joined to preserve abortion rights when it was at its most vulnerable in the 1992 case Planned Parenthood v. Casey. Even Rehnquist's vaunted federalist push to give states greater protection from federal intrusion has seemed to lose steam in the last two terms. Just this June, Rehnquist found himself in the minority in a 6-3 decision that said federal anti-drug laws trumped a state initiative that legalized the medical use of marijuana.

"It is quite clear that there are three dominant chief justices of American history, and they are John Marshall, Earl Warren, and William H. Rehnquist," said O'Melveny & Myers partner Walter Dellinger III, acting solicitor general under President Bill Clinton. "I think that there's just no question that he's of enormous historical importance."

University of Texas Law School professor Douglas Laycock said, "He started as the young radical, the most extreme of the four Nixon appointees. He finishes not too far from the center, voting with O'Connor and Kennedy slightly more often than he votes with Scalia and Thomas."

Rehnquist was born in Milwaukee and served as a meteorologist in the Army Air Corps during World War II. He graduated from Stanford University and Stanford Law School, with a graduate degree from Harvard University in between. At Stanford, he finished first in his law school class just ahead of his future colleague O'Connor.

The Supreme Court dominated much of Rehnquist's post-law school life. In his 1987 book on the Court, Rehnquist recalled the day in 1952 when he first laid eyes on the "magnificent Greek temple of white marble" as a new law clerk to then-Justice Robert Jackson. In a memo he wrote for Jackson that later haunted his reputation, Rehnquist said in the context of the pending Brown v. Board of Education case that the discredited precedent Plessy v. Ferguson was right and should be re-affirmed. Rehnquist said in his confirmation hearings for associate and chief justice that the memo did not reflect his own views.

Rehnquist went into private practice in Phoenix and cemented his conservative credentials by working in Barry Goldwater's presidential campaign. He came back to Washington in 1969 to head the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel and soon became involved in judicial selection at a time when several vacancies hit the Court. At first President Richard Nixon was not impressed by Rehnquist, who wore his sideburns long, and sported a pink shirt, psychedelic tie and hush puppie shoes at their first meeting. Nixon told an aide that "Renchburg" looked like a clown. As then-White House counsel John Dean wrote in a 2002 book, "All in all, an inauspicious introduction for a future Supreme Court nominee."

Rehnquist himself jokingly discounted his chances of being nominated to the high court, because "I'm not from the South, I'm not a woman, and I'm not mediocre." But as Nixon considered and discarded various candidates, Rehnquist suddenly emerged, along with Lewis Powell Jr., as candidates to fill the seats of John Harlan II and Hugo Black, respectively.

Because of the Jackson memo and allegations that he had harassed black voters as a poll watcher in Phoenix, Rehnquist's confirmation was controversial, and he won by a 68 to 26 Senate vote.

Once on the Court, Rehnquist became the hero of a growing conservative legal movement that valued "strict construction" of the Constitution and a "non-activist" approach to judging that looked askance at expansions of federal power. In a 1985 dissent in Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority, Rehnquist objected to the 5-4 majority's grant of broad federal power over state sovereignty. But his dissent was brief. "I do not think it is incumbent on those of us in dissent to spell out further the fine points of a principle that will, I am confident, in time again command the support of the majority of the court." A decade later, he was proven right.

In a series of rulings, Rehnquist led the Court in reining in congressional power under the Commerce Clause and strengthening state sovereignty in disputes with the federal government.

"He has effected a sea-change in American constitutional jurisprudence," said Pepperdine University law professor Douglas Kmiec, a former Reagan Justice Department official. "His sophisticated revival of federalism, in particular, renews that which makes democracy work -- not in theory, but on the ground. It gives divergent voices a chance to be heard and prevail, not in one venue, but in 50. Had the Court heeded his wisdom more thoroughly, there would be less nonsense about red and blue division and far less cultural warfare."

Other scholars wonder whether Rehnquist's federalism trend will persist after his departure. "In the short run, the 'federalism revolution' of the 1990s is undeniably his most significant substantive achievement," said Cambridge University's Garrow. "But whether these rulings will survive in the long run, or instead be reversed, remains to be seen. It's much more likely that the Rehnquist Court's surprisingly liberal rulings -- on abortion, on gay rights, on gender -- will actually represent the most indelible legacy."

Rehnquist's followers began populating the Reagan Justice Department (one being the young John Roberts), and he became a favored choice to replace retiring Chief Justice Warren Burger in 1986. Again, many Democrats balked at Rehnquist's nomination, and he was confirmed by a 65-33 vote.

As chief justice, his judicial views did not change appreciably, but joined by fellow conservatives he was in dissent less often, and seemed more interested in reaching broader common ground.

Hemmed in by liberal precedents, however, he sometimes was unable to advance conservative precepts in his decision-making. Those constraints became obvious in 2000 when, in Dickerson v. United States, Rehnquist wrote the majority opinion upholding the classic pro-defendant ruling Miranda v. Arizona -- a 1966 precedent Rehnquist had often criticized previously. "Whether or not we would agree with Miranda's reasoning and its resulting rule, were we addressing the issue in the first instance, the principles of stare decisis weigh heavily against overruling it now," Rehnquist wrote. "Miranda has become embedded in routine police practice to the point where the warnings have become part of our national culture."

As administrator of the Court, Rehnquist was able to preserve the Court's traditions and penchant for secrecy, while at the same time keeping up with modern technology. In 2000, the Court launched a Web site that makes it easy to track cases. And starting with the Florida presidential election cases in 2000, Rehnquist agreed from time to time to allow immediate release of audiotapes of newsworthy oral arguments. As a result, for the first time the public outside the courtroom was able to hear the Court's debates over current cases involving issues ranging from affirmative action to campaign finance reform to enemy combatants.

The audiotape release seemed to mute, at least temporarily, the chorus of requests that the Court allow television cameras in. On the subject of cameras, Rehnquist was less adamantly opposed than his predecessor Warren Burger, but he still felt camera access might debase the Court's image. Soon after he became chief justice, Rehnquist said, "I hope we don't get to the time where the members of our court are trying to get on the six o'clock news every night, and I think if they did, it would lessen to a certain extent the mystique and moral authority" of the Court.

But Rehnquist's disapproval of the idea did not keep members of the press from trying to get cameras in. In 1990, with his blessing, the Judicial Conference approved an experiment with camera access for civil trials in selected lower courts. The experiment worked, by and large, with few if any negative findings. But in 1994, the conference declined to make access permanent - partly, it appeared, because of the media frenzy at the time over pretrial hearings in O.J. Simpson's murder trial.

Within the Supreme Court, Rehnquist also seemed open to at least testing the idea of cameras. In 1988, he allowed media lawyer Timothy Dyk -now a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit - to put on a private demonstration of how cameras worked. The demonstration went off without glitches, but none of the justices felt any strong incentive to alter the status quo.

C-SPAN vice president Bruce Collins said that in comparison to the visibility of the other branches of government, the Rehnquist court's resistance looks "just a bit silly." But he credited Rehnquist with being "the first to open the door" to modern media. "Our hope is that his successor builds on his example."

Rehnquist had a sense of humor and not too high a sense of his own importance. He was shy, even awkward at times, though as his tenure as chief justice lengthened, he became increasingly self-confident.

"He is not a Citronelle kind of guy," said longtime friend and fellow poker player Robert Bennett, partner at Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom in D.C.. referring to a fancy D.C. restaurant. "He never let power go to his head."

"William H. Rehnquist is by nature quiet and humble," said Pepperdine's Kmiec. "His legacy is that he has shown us how to disagree with civility."

In private conversation when he told funny stories, he would sometimes start giggling before he finished his sentence. The Blackmun papers released last year included a bawdy limerick Rehnquist passed to his then-all male colleagues in 1975. In 1995, acting purely on his own whimsy, he began wearing a black robe with four gold stripes on each sleeve. The inspiration for the new attire, he said, was a costume he saw at a local performance of Gilbert & Sullivan's Iolanthe.

Rehnquist came in for some ribbing from his colleagues because of the stripes. The late Justice Harry Blackmun said he and his colleagues asked Rehnquist, "Was he wanting to bring back the crimson in the robes as the British had? What were the rest of us to do about it? Did this make him a sergeant or a captain? He was defensive about it, but not in an offensive way."

Rehnquist, like other justices, basked in anonymity. For his daily constitutional that helped alleviate his back problems, he was able to walk around the perimeter of the Court grounds largely unrecognized, though he was usually shadowed by a Court police officer or two. In a 2004 interview with C-SPAN, he said one of the most appealing aspects of being a Supreme Court justice is that "you don't have to become a celebrity or raise your visibility in order to do your job."

Every four years he emerged from anonymity to conduct presidential inaugural ceremonies -- George W. Bush's on Jan. 20 was his fifth -- and he became even more familiar to the public when he presided over President Clinton's Senate impeachment trial in 1999. On occasion during the trial, television camera crews would camp out near his Arlington home to record his comings and goings--a loss of privacy he did not appreciate.

Rehnquist won high marks for conducting the impeachment trial fairly, but characteristically he made light of his role. In a 2001 interview with PBS, Rehnquist borrowed a line from Gilbert & Sullivan -again from Iolanthe to say of his impeachment trial performance, "I did nothing in particular and I did it very well." He continued, "There wasn't much to do. I realized there wasn't much to do. And I didn't do it."

Rehnquist will also be remembered for presiding over a Supreme Court that decided the outcome of a presidential election. He was in the majority of Bush v. Gore, the 2000 decision that stopped the recount of Florida ballots and sealed the election of President Bush over Democrat Al Gore. The Court's intervention in the case placed it in the center of a political firestorm.

From the bench, Rehnquist could be a stern and forbidding presence. Though he mellowed in recent years, earlier in his tenure as chief justice, Rehnquist would correct lawyers' pronunciation, scold lawyers for glancing at the clock behind the bench, and grow impatient with flabby locutions. In 1993, when then-solicitor general Kenneth Starr said he wanted to "share the record" with the justices, Rehnquist shot back, "Why not tell us the record, rather than sharing it with us."

He also for a time snapped at lawyers who addressed him as "Justice" or "Judge," rather than chief justice. After his pique generated news stories, Rehnquist poked fun at himself; at one meeting he donned a feathered Indian headdress to underline his chiefly status.

But Rehnquist also was keenly aware of the limitations of being chief justice--just one vote among nine, with few powers of persuasion over his independent-minded colleagues. He was usually unable to slow the torrent of questions aimed by justices at the lawyers arguing before them, and spoke enviously of a long-ago Canadian counterpart who was able to quiet his colleagues by tapping his pencil on the bench. "I have occasionally wished that I had similar authority in our court," he said in a 1996 speech.

But after the late Warren Burger's more imperious rule, Rehnquist's lighter touch was welcomed by justices and employees alike.

"Politically or ideologically oriented evaluations of Chief Justice Rehnquist should not overlook what a successful and popular chief justice he was within the Court as the justices' presiding officer," said Garrow. "The contrast between Rehnquist's undeniably happy Court and that of his predecessor, Warren E. Burger, could not have been greater."

In commencement speeches and talks with young people, Rehnquist urged listeners to live well-rounded lives and not measure success entirely by their work. "Find ways to enrich your life, entertain yourself, and to enjoy activities you might not have participated in before," he told a 1992 high school graduating class in Arlington, where he lived in his Court years. "Enjoyment of this sort is not contingent upon fulfilling some far distant career goal, but can be harvested right now - today and tomorrow... Learn to live a day at a time."

Rehnquist's own interests ranged from oil painting to tennis to poker. For years he participated in a monthly poker game attended, on and off, by the likes of current appeals court judge David Sentelle, former judge Robert Bork, senior judge Laurence Silberman and bigfoot lawyers like Bennett and Leonard Garment. The unspoken rule was that when lawyers were about to bring a case before the Supreme Court, they would drop out of the poker game temporarily, to avoid improper appearances.

Characteristically, Rehnquist said he would never write a memoir, because publishers would want him to spice it up with criticisms of his colleagues - which he refused to do. He invoked Confederate leader Robert E. Lee, who said he did not want to write his memoirs "because he would have to deal unfavorably with a lot of people whom he likes and he was close to," he told PBS in 2001. "I just don't want to do that."

A Court Choice Well Schooled In Chief Justice Job's Pitfalls (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 5 - As a Supreme Court law clerk to William H. Rehnquist decades ago, John G. Roberts Jr. learned how not to be chief justice.

Now that President Bush has chosen him for the position, he will, if the Senate confirms him, have the rare chance to put those lessons into practice.

His boss back in 1980-81 was an associate justice, one who often chafed under the leadership style of Chief Justice Warren E. Burger and who freed, even encouraged, his law clerks to poke fun at what they saw as the chief justice's pomposity and penchant for self-aggrandizement.

Robert M. Weisberg, who clerked during the same term for another justice, said Monday that he would never forget walking down a corridor at the court and coming upon Justice Rehnquist and his law clerks, who were all peering through a window into an inner courtyard, where Chief Justice Burger was supervising preparations for a reception.

"It was very funny to see Rehnquist and his clerks just spontaneously cracking up at the sight of the chief justice directing the proper placement of the silver," Mr. Weisberg said.

Later, when Mr. Roberts was working in the White House counsel's office, memorandums from that period show, he devoted considerable attention to knocking down various proposals from Chief Justice Burger, including one for a new tribunal to ease the Supreme Court's workload.

In a 1983 memorandum, to Fred F. Fielding, the White House counsel, he said a Burger request for authority to name an administrative "chancellor" for the federal courts was "the silliest" of various proposals and added, in a reference to the Anglophilia for which the chief justice was well known around the court, "The bill does not specify whether the Chancellor will wear a powdered wig."

Justice Rehnquist, upon becoming chief justice in 1986, promptly made changes that clearly reflected his own disapproval of how Warren Burger had run the court. For example, he converted the job of administrative assistant to the chief justice into a two-year appointment rather than a permanent position, to avoid the empire-building that had become evident during the Burger years.

The very different Rehnquist management style, straightforward and unadorned, was much appreciated within the court, as reflected in the statements the associate justices issued after Chief Justice Rehnquist's death on Saturday night. Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg called him "the fairest, most efficient boss I have ever had."

As a law clerk, Judge Roberts, who now sits on the federal appeals court here, would not have been in a position to observe the justices' conference, the twice-weekly closed-door sessions that only the justices themselves attend. But he certainly knew how frustrating Justice Rehnquist found the meandering and confusing way in which the conference proceeded under Chief Justice Burger's leadership.

Among the papers that Justice Harry A. Blackmun left to the Library of Congress is a letter Justice Rehnquist sent to Chief Justice Burger that began: "Dear Chief: I had a feeling that at the very close of today's Conference we may have fitted Matthew Arnold's closing lines in 'Dover Beach' wherein he refers to those 'Swept with confused alarms of struggle and flight/Where ignorant armies clash by night.' "

Justice Rehnquist then went on to "take the liberty of stating my understanding" of what had taken place. When he became chief justice, he streamlined the conference considerably, and justices rarely came away with any doubt about what had occurred.

Running the conference is only one of a chief justice's many functions that are not visible to the public. Indeed, the job is somewhat like an iceberg, with much of it below the surface. And it is confusing: there is no one place to look for a definitive description of the job.

The modern chief justiceship is "a mix of custom, practice and statute," according to Judith Resnik, a professor at Yale Law School who has made a close study of the federal judiciary and the role of the chief justice in particular. In an interview on Monday, Professor Resnik noted that there were dozens of federal statutes that mention the chief justice, with "half a dozen that really matter." The Constitution itself did not even establish the office except by implication, mentioning it only in connection with presiding over impeachment trials conducted by the Senate.

"It's basically a role that has developed over the 20th century, as the federal judiciary has developed into a kind of administrative agency," Professor Resnik said. For example, Chief Justice Burger established, and Chief Justice Rehnquist continued, the practice of issuing an annual "state of the judiciary" report to give voice to the concerns of federal judges and the chief justice's own priorities.

The chief justice presides over a corps of some 2,000 federal judges, including 1,200 with life tenure and the rest, including magistrate and bankruptcy judges, who serve for fixed terms. The judicial branch includes a staff of 30,000, with the chief justice picking the most important central administrators, and runs on an annual budget of $5.4 billion. The chief justice also picks the members of important policy-making judicial committees and of specialized courts, including the 11-member Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act Court, which issues special national security surveillance warrants.

In addition, the chief justice leads the Judicial Conference of the United States, a group of judges who make policy for the federal courts and who present the judiciary's views to Congress. The Judicial Conference has its roots in an organization created by Congress in 1922 at the behest of Chief Justice William Howard Taft, the former president, who carved out an active policy role for the chief justice. He shaped the modern court by lobbying successfully for legislation to give the court discretion in choosing which cases to hear.

As a student of American history, Judge Roberts may find none of this a surprise. Nor is it a surprise that Professor Resnik and other scholars are beginning to ask whether this array of powers, having grown bit by bit over the years, with hardly anyone noticing, really belongs in the hands of a single, unelected, life-tenured official.

"As a democracy, we generally don't believe that power should be centralized in one person for so long," she said, while offering the concededly audacious suggestion that the chief justiceship might rotate every four years or so.

Perhaps that is a conversation that might move from the recesses of the legal academy to the public, sometime during the 25 or 30 years that Chief Justice Roberts would be likely to serve.

Roberts Was Influenced By Critics Of The Warren Court (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

From his youthful days as a Reagan administration aide to his current job as a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, John G. Roberts Jr. has consistently espoused a clear view of federal judicial intervention: Less is more.

This same principle was held dear by the man Roberts served as a Supreme Court clerk, the late William H. Rehnquist -- whose former position as chief justice of the United States is now suddenly within Roberts's grasp.

In the quarter-century since he served as Rehnquist's aide, Roberts has made an instinctual and deeply held conservatism plain at nearly every turn. As a young Reagan administration aide, he registered his skepticism toward court-recognized "fundamental rights," such as the right to privacy. Earlier this year, Judge Roberts voted to permit President Bush to subject terrorism suspects to military trials at Guantanamo Bay.

The question -- more urgent now since Bush nominated him yesterday morning to lead the high court -- is where Roberts's vision of judicial restraint would lead him on the most volatile issues. The woman Roberts was originally tapped to replace, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, sometimes displayed her conservatism by bowing to precedents on social issues -- notably Roe v. Wade , which established a right to abortion rooted in a right to privacy. Rehnquist labored mightily to reverse some rulings on abortion and the rights of criminal defendants that he thought were wrongly decided in the first place.

To Roberts's supporters, his history suggests he will be a careful and principled leader of the federal judiciary, one who would restore the true constitutional balance of power between the courts and the people's elected representatives in Congress, the White House and the states.

To his opponents, it suggests a willingness to leave the constitutional rights of women and minorities unprotected against violations by the more political branches of government.

What is unmistakable from Roberts's record, however, is that his essential philosophy about the role of courts in American life is strongly held. There is little prospect that the 50-year-old judge will be any less likely to press his beliefs in conference with colleagues on the court than he was to promote them in memos to his elders in the Reagan administration.

Sounding very much like the 26-year-old aide who ghostwrote articles and speeches on judicial restraint for President Ronald Reagan's Justice Department, Roberts told the Senate firmly in a written submission last month that federal judges "do not have a commission to solve society's problems, as they see them, but simply to decide cases before them according to the rule of law."The Primacy of Process

Roberts has said that defining the proper boundaries of judicial review is a "central problem" of American government. Few legal analysts of any ideological stripe would dispute that.

Throughout history, the Supreme Court has provoked controversy by using its power to declare laws unconstitutional in ways that critics saw as overstepping its authority.

President Thomas Jefferson condemned the 1803 Marbury v. Madison decision that established the doctrine of judicial review.

DOJ_NMG_0002762

The Dred Scott case of 1857 -- which declared that black people were "beings of an inferior order" and that congressional efforts to restrict slavery in northern territories were a violation of property rights -- discredited the institution for a generation. A series of rulings striking down state and federal economic regulations provoked President Franklin D. Roosevelt's "court-packing" plan, until the justices backed down and began upholding New Deal legislation.

In the 1950s and '60s, the Supreme Court looked at the country's problems and decided, time and again, that the federal judiciary should reform society and establish individual rights. Even today, long after the death of the chief justice, Earl Warren, who led the court during that period, and long after a majority of the court has been named by Republican presidents who opposed the Warren Court's innovations, the court continues to recognize such Warren-like concepts as a "fundamental right" to privacy that protects abortion and private consensual homosexual conduct.

The Warren revolution remains a model for many people of how the court must act as a guarantor of individual and minority rights. Roberts, however, was one of those who recoiled from the Warren Court's activism.

Roberts grew up in a mostly white Indiana suburb where his father's steel company was touched by federal court battles over affirmative action, and he attended Harvard College and Harvard Law School as Boston was grappling, sometimes violently, with court-ordered school desegregation.

But his gravitation to concepts of judicial restraint probably reflected the natural bent of his orderly, traditionalist mind, rather than the controversies swirling outside the academic setting in which he spent most of the 1970s.

Asked by a senator in 2003 to name the legal text that most influenced him, Roberts chose the 1973 edition of Hart & Wechsler's "The Federal Courts and the Federal System," a 1,657-page legal textbook used in Harvard's class on federal courts. It has always been "within reach of my desk" since law school, he told the Senate. And, indeed, he has often cited it in his writings since Cambridge.

Unknown to most Americans, the Hart & Wechsler volume is instantly recognizable to law professors as an exhaustive, sophisticated -- and deeply skeptical -- treatment of the Warren Court revolution.

It is considered a virtual Bible of a postwar legal movement known as the Legal Process School, especially influential at Harvard, whose leading figures were liberals and conservatives who professed concern not so much for the results the court was reaching as for the damage its overreaching might do to the judiciary's own legitimacy.

Roberts's choice of the book is "extremely revealing," said Cass Sunstein, a professor of law at the University of Chicago.

For the Legal Process School, it was a given that "judges in solving legal problems are not doing the same thing that legislators are doing in solving political problems," says Todd Rakoff, a professor of law at Harvard.

The strength of Legal Process was its insistence that courts adhere to neutral principles, that they "should not become champions of particular causes or litigants," as Dennis J. Hutchinson, a professor of law at the University of Chicago, puts it.

Yet Legal Process has lost influence in more recent years, under attack from a new generation of law professors who fault it for ignoring the political power relationships embedded in the law -- that its insistence on identifying neutral principles is unrealistic.

"The question about legal process," Rakoff says, "is 'Is it true that there are legal answers that aren't political answers?' "A Closet Activist?

That, in essence, is the critique liberals are raising about Roberts's jurisprudence today: that his insistence on a limited role for the federal courts is a cover for conservative policy preferences.

Announcing its opposition to Roberts, the Alliance for Justice said that Roberts supports "weakening women's rights and civil rights laws, cutting back the vital role of our courts in enforcing legal protections and restricting the ability of the people's democratically elected representatives to enact crucial, nationwide worker, anti-discrimination and environmental safeguards."

Court conservatives such as Rehnquist and Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas have also espoused judicial restraint. Yet that has not prevented them from striking down many federal and state statutes, often on the basis of a states'-rights doctrine that dissenting justices on the court have criticized as too loosely based in constitutional text.

The accusation that Roberts is capable of his own brand of activism has not come exclusively from liberal advocacy groups.

DOJ_NMG_0002763

On the D.C. Circuit, he wrote an opinion for a 2 to 1 majority in which he interpreted a law to deny a former Amtrak employee the right to sue the government-subsidized railroad in federal court for allegedly spending taxpayer money on defective railroad cars.

Judge Merrick Garland wrote in dissent that Roberts's opinion "falls back on policy considerations" but "the policy on which the court relies are not those of the Congress of the United States."

But to many, Roberts's intellectual pedigree marks him as a careful "lawyer's lawyer," with a healthy recognition of the courts' -- and his own -- fallibility.

"Of all the people Bush could have nominated, this is a guy who is actually telling the truth when he says he can't decide a case until he's seen the facts and the briefs," says Jonathan Macey, a professor of law at Yale University.

St. John's University law professor John Barrett, noting that Roberts has named legal craftsmen such as Justices Felix Frankfurter and Robert Jackson as the Supreme Court members he most admires, suggests that he "may end up disappointing President Bush."

If he remains true to the legal view embodied by the Legal Process School, Barrett said, "he'll shy from agenda-driven decision making" and respect long-established precedents, even those, such as Roe v. Wade , of which he may disapprove.

"A kind of continuity of judicial decision-making is a value in the process world," Barrett said. "Moderation, deference, continuity, caution, candor -- it's not swing for the fences judging."

Another crucial influence on Roberts's judicial philosophy was Henry J. Friendly, a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 2nd Circuit in New York, for whom Roberts worked as a law clerk in 1979-1980, just after graduating from Harvard.

Friendly, a Rockefeller Republican who served on the 2nd Circuit from 1959 until his death in 1986, is widely regarded as the most talented appeals court judge of his generation. He was a longtime private-sector lawyer who wrote his own rigorous opinions, as well as many influential law review articles.

He regularly plucked top students from Harvard, where he had studied, to be his aides. Roberts, whose credentials as a prize-winning undergraduate majoring in history and managing editor of the Harvard Law Review matched Friendly's own, got his clerkship without even having to be interviewed, according to Richard J. Lazarus, Roberts's close friend.

Friendly could be a stern taskmaster. "Sometimes the clerk thought he had something interesting to say, and sometimes the judge would disagree," said Macey, also a former Friendly clerk.

Roberts loved him. His esteem is evident not only from his frequent citations of Friendly's work in his own writings, including six of his 49 opinions on the D.C. Circuit, but also from the fact that he corresponded with the judge throughout his time as a Reagan aide.

In one letter, dated Nov. 4, 1981, Roberts told Friendly that it was "an exciting time to be at the Justice Department, when so much that has been taken for granted for so long is being seriously reconsidered." He continued: "You assist us down here every day through the articles and opinions that so often light the way."

Friendly's views on many issues paralleled those of the Legal Process School, says Rakoff, a former Friendly clerk. The 1988 edition of the Hart & Wechsler book is dedicated to him.

Friendly felt that the Warren Court's 1966 Miranda v. Arizona ruling, which created the "right to remain silent," was misguided. In a famous 1970 article, Friendly attacked the Warren Court for opening up state criminal convictions to wide-ranging federal court review.

Friendly felt that a state conviction should usually be challengeable in federal court only when the prisoner also had a strong claim of innocence, rather than wasting the courts' time on technical issues raised by guilty defendants.

But the Warren Court had expanded access to the federal courts as a remedy for what it considered the widespread abuse of rights by state criminal justice systems, especially in the South.

Friendly thought state courts were just as capable of protecting federal constitutional rights as federal courts were.

On Nov. 12, 1981, Roberts offered then-Attorney General William French Smith his unsolicited critique of the Warren Court's decisions, in a memo that cited Friendly's article seven times and the Hart & Wechsler book once.

"The current availability of federal habeas corpus" -- the legal term for post-conviction constitutional challenges -- "particularly for state prisoners, goes far to making a mockery of the entire criminal justice system," he wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0002764

In April 2003, Roberts, sitting before the Senate Judiciary Committee as a nominee to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, offered similar comments in response to a question by Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) about the death penalty -- a major source of habeas corpus petitions in federal court.

Roberts replied that "it's not certain, it's not definite, and there doesn't seem to be any reasonable time limitation. The effectiveness, if you believe in capital punishment, the effectiveness of capital punishment diminishes if the crime was committed 30 years ago. And if it takes that long to get through the system, it's not working, whether you're in favor of the death penalty or against it."

In the meantime, however, conservative critiques of federal habeas had become the law of the land. In 1996, the Republican Congress passed, and President Bill Clinton, a Democrat, signed a bill that sharply restricted access to federal habeas corpus.

Nevertheless, petitions for habeas corpus from state prisoners continue to occupy much of the court's time -- far more than higher-profile issues such as abortion and school prayer.

Chief Justice Favored Roberts (WT)

By Guy Taylor

The Washington Times, September 6, 2005

Judge John G. Roberts Jr. was long regarded as the best Supreme Court lawyer in the nation by the very man whose shoes President Bush has chosen him to fill.

Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who died Saturday, played a key role in shaping Judge Roberts by making him a pupil during the early 1980s and propelling his career as a lawyer and federal judge in subsequent years.

Ted Cruz, who clerked for Chief Justice Rehnquist during the mid-1990s, recalled that he and fellow clerks once asked their boss whom he considered to be the most superior Supreme Court litigator.

"He chuckled a little and said with a smile that he thought he could probably get the majority of his colleagues to agree that John Roberts was the best Supreme Court lawyer in the country," said Mr. Cruz, now solicitor general of Texas.

Chief Justice Rehnquist's fondness for Judge Roberts dated back years earlier when he had hired him as a clerk in 1980. Judge Roberts had been recommended by federal appeals Judge Henry Friendly, another esteemed conservative for whom Judge Roberts had clerked in 1979.

In the office of Associate Justice Rehnquist, the young Harvard Law School graduate evidently shined brighter than others.

When the clerkship ended in 1981, Justice Rehnquist phoned Kenneth W. Starr, then chief of staff to U.S. Attorney General William French Smith, to recommend Judge Roberts for a Justice Department job.

"It's not every day you get [such] calls," said Mr. Starr, who won fame as a conservative lawyer during the 1990s investigating the Whitewater and Monica Lewinsky scandals and is now dean of Pepperdine University's School of Law.

When Mr. Bush nominated Judge Roberts to replace outgoing Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, some suggested that it might have been more poetic had Judge Roberts been nominated to replace Chief Justice Rehnquist, because it was under the chief justice's wing that his career in Washington blossomed.

After clerking for Justice Rehnquist and working under Mr. Smith, Judge Roberts was associate counsel to President Reagan from 1982 until 1986, when he entered private practice. He served as deputy solicitor general under President George Bush from 1989 to 1993, winning 25 of 39 Supreme Court cases he argued on the government's behalf.

The elder Mr. Bush later nominated him to be a federal judge, but that nomination was withdrawn before confirmation after Mr. Clinton won the presidency in 1992.

Judge Roberts went back to private practice until President George W. Bush nominated him to be a U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals judge in 2001. That nomination and 29 others were blocked in the Senate Judiciary Committee. He was confirmed after Mr. Bush renominated him in 2003.

Observances Begin Today At High Court (WP)

By Tom Jackman

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0002765

The flag-draped coffin of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist will be carried up the long marble stairs to the Supreme Court's main entrance this morning as two days of memorial observances begin.

After a brief prayer service at the court at 10 a.m., the public may pay respects to the chief justice as his body lies in repose at the court from 10:30 a.m. to 10 p.m. today and from 10 a.m. to noon tomorrow.

Ceremonies will conclude with the chief justice's burial at Arlington National Cemetery tomorrow afternoon, which will be private. Rehnquist, 80, died of thyroid cancer Saturday at his home in Arlington.

Rehnquist's family was in meetings yesterday with officials from the Supreme Court and the Archdiocese of Washington, finalizing the arrangements for the funeral and burial. The family toured St. Matthew's Cathedral in Northwest Washington, where a service will be held at 2 p.m. tomorrow.

Officials have said the funeral is for friends and family.

Rehnquist belonged to a Lutheran church in Bethesda, but the family requested that the funeral be held at St. Matthew's. A spokeswoman for the archdiocese has said that the request apparently was based on such factors as size and availability. The service will be Lutheran, a Supreme Court spokeswoman said.

Details about speakers and expected guests at the funeral were not available yesterday.

Justice William J. Brennan Jr.'s funeral also was held at St. Matthew's, in July 1997, after his coffin lay in the Supreme Court's Great Hall.

Construction began on St. Matthew's in 1893, and the first Mass there was in 1895. Its sanctuary seats about 2,000 and contains the marble cathedra, or seat, of the archbishop of Washington. The church has undergone an $8 million restoration in recent years, including the cleaning and repair of two large mosaics inside and the recovering of its copper dome.

St. Matthew's was the site of the funeral Mass for President John F. Kennedy on Nov. 25, 1963. Pope John Paul II addressed 1,500 area priests there in October 1979 during a visit to Washington. The funerals of Cardinal James A. Hickey and Cardinal Patrick A. O'Boyle also were at St. Matthew's, on Rhode Island Avenue just east of Connecticut Avenue.

District police said yesterday that they had not been informed of any special traffic or security needs for the various services, Sgt. Joe Gentile said. The Supreme Court has its own police force.

Rehnquist was a World War II veteran, entitling him to burial at Arlington. His wife, Natalie Cornell Rehnquist, was buried there in 1991.

Rehnquist's two immediate predecessors, Warren E. Burger and Earl Warren, also lay in repose in the Supreme Court building before they were laid to rest at Arlington.

25 Dems Could Vote For Roberts (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, September 6, 2005

Members of the Senate Democrats' K Street inner circle are predicting that as many as 25 Democrats will vote to confirm John Roberts as chief justice of the United States.

Several attendees of the Monday Group, as Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid's (D-Nev.) biweekly lobbyist meetings are known, said the Democrats could suffer politically if their Roberts strategy misfires. Left-wing ideological groups are pressuring Democratic lawmakers to expose Roberts's conservative record without workable grounds for a fight, Monday Group lobbyists said.

"It's not a good thing for Democrats to be dragged into a visible, high-profile battle on him for weeks when Congress ought to be dealing with issues the public really cares about," one key Democratic lobbyist said. "That's the biggest danger for Democrats, if they get sucked into something like that because of the ideological left."

Though some Democrats already have called for Congress to focus on aiding the blighted Gulf Coast as the new session begins, planning for the Roberts hearings likely will dominate the Monday Group's next meeting, on Sept. 12. Informal discussions among some lobbyists and Democratic aides during the recess were said to yield little in the way of cohesive counsel.

"There is no real coordinated effort to enlist K Street in getting involved," said another well-connected Democrat, one of many who hailed Roberts as an unassailably shrewd selection. "There's no sense in creating a big dustup now downtown, when what are you going to fight about?"

Democratic lobbyists' greatest concern about Roberts is not pinning down his positions on federal preemption or civil rights, despite the recent Monday Group guest appearance of Wade Henderson, president of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights. Many K Street Democrats instead questioned what they characterized as poorly coordinated messaging from liberal groups that has unduly influenced some lawmakers.

"The other dirty little secret the Democrats have to deal with is … there may be some in party who see it as, 'It would be worthwhile to drag it out a little bit so we can raise some money off the deal'" from left-wing special interests, a Monday Group member said. "That's shortsighted, and politically dangerous too."

In particular, Democratic lobbyists singled out the NARAL Pro-Choice Alliance decision to endorse Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.), who is certain to face a tough reelection fight next year, in a potential bid to sway him on Roberts. If Chafee spurns the pro-abortion-rights group by voting to confirm, his Democratic challenger could be weakened, and Monday Group lobbyists said a Republican voting against Roberts would be highly unlikely.

"I'd advise my clients to stay out of this one," said another lobbyist with ties to Democratic leadership. "Why would they use up political capital on something they can't possibly win on or benefit from? … I don't see a good opening for us."

One Monday Group regular likened the Roberts confirmation to this spring's tension over the "nuclear option," saying that in both cases a swift resolution and moving on to other business would be the best-case scenario.

K Street Democrats agreed that Roberts ultimately would be confirmed with anywhere from 65 to 80 votes, with most centrist and Southern Democrats voting to approve the nomination. Every Democrat who signed the "Gang of 14" agreement to preserve the minority's right of judicial filibuster will vote for Roberts, they predicted, with several openly forecasting that Reid himself will support the nominee.

Some lobbyists credited Reid with ensuring that no Democrat has declared support for Roberts yet, a stance often phrased by the minority leader as "keeping [our] powder dry."

One lobbyist said, "The only concerted strategy I've seen come out of the caucus has been: Don't make any commitments to support him. Leadership's been very successful in keeping everybody on that page."

But, K Street Democrats said, as soon as the hearings begin, either Thursday or Monday, expect Democratic senators such as Ben Nelson (Neb.), Mary Landrieu (La.) or Blanche Lincoln (Ark.) to reveal quickly their votes in Roberts's favor.

Reid spokesman Jim Manley said that Monday Group lobbyists would be consulted as the hearings progress but that they would not be relied upon for messaging. "We talk to them all the time. Are we planning on using them? No," Manley said. "It's up to the members of the Judiciary Committee to carefully review Roberts's qualifications for the job."

Asked whether a majority of the Democratic caucus voting for Roberts would concern Reid, Manley declined to comment. "Let's just wait and see," he said.

All About A Guy Named John (USNEWS)

By Liz Halloran

U.S. News and World Report, September 5, 2005

It was late August 1976, just a week before classes were to begin at Harvard Law School, and first-year student Stuart Miller, intent on a last few days of R&R on Cape Cod, had unloaded his belongings in Shaw Hall dormitory when he noticed an open door down the hall. Curious, he poked his head in and saw a young man surrounded by law books. His new classmate appeared to be at least a quarter of the way through the thick first-year texts. Why, Miller asked with some incredulity, are you doing all this work? "I want to get a head start," replied John G. Roberts, who returned to his books while Miller, now a San Francisco lawyer, set off for the Massachusetts shore.

Nearly three decades later, President George W. Bush's first nominee to the U.S. Supreme Court will have his legendary preparation skills put to the test when the Senate Judiciary Committee opens confirmation hearings this week in the historic caucus room of the Russell Senate Office Building. The hearings, chaired by Republican Sen. Arlen Specter, are expected to continue through early next week (story, Page 44).

True blue? Barring a blockbuster disclosure, Roberts will win support from a majority of the committee's 18 members, 10 of them Republicans. And he's likely to be confirmed by a majority of the full Senate later this month in time to join the court by the October 3 start of its new term.

But the hearings may still have their share of drama. Will the nominee get any Democrats' votes? How will Democrats position themselves, especially those with an eye on congressional and presidential elections to come and another Supreme Court vacancy that could materialize at any time? And, perhaps most important, what about Roberts himself? Is he the true-blue conservative his champions suggest, or might he have a few surprises up his sleeve?

There's little argument that Bush made a savvy choice in the 50-year-old federal appeals court judge who served in the Reagan and George H. W. Bush administrations and clerked for Chief Justice William Rehnquist. His sterling legal credentials and, perhaps more important, his likability and made-for-TV attractiveness have made it difficult for those opposing him to get much traction. The down-and-dirty fight everyone expected over the first appointment to the high court in 11 years simply hasn't happened.

Activist groups on both sides seem to have accepted that reality: They've used press conferences and E-mails to broadcast their messages, stockpiling most of their advertising money for future battles. Even the White House has had to spend little political capital on Roberts, who argued 39 cases before the Supreme Court and earned a small fortune as the top appellate lawyer for the Washington firm Hogan & Hartson. Though every major liberal interest group has announced its opposition to Roberts, no Senate Democrat has yet come out against him. "Ninety percent of this," said Democratic committee member Sen. Charles Schumer, "is going to be decided at the hearing."

Democrats plan to aggressively question Roberts about his conservative legal views and judicial philosophy but acknowledge privately that a Senate floor fight would be fruitless and politically damaging. The math doesn't work, either. Democrats are outnumbered by Republicans 55 to 44 (Vermont Sen. James Jeffords is an Independent), and this spring they essentially dealt away their ability to filibuster the nomination by agreeing not to block judicial nominees absent "extraordinary circumstances." "The filibuster deal was an incredible success for us," said the conservative Federalist Society's Leonard Leo. "It took it off the table and defanged the other side."

A Supreme History Of Conflict (USNEWS)

By Bret Schulte

U.S. News and World Report, September 5, 2005

By all accounts, John Roberts will be confirmed to take his place on the high court in a month's time as America's 109th Supreme Court justice. But before it's over, Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee intend to rough him up a bit.

For many, the partisan scrapping recalls the failed nomination of Robert Bork in 1987. The Bork fight had it all: overheated rhetoric, warring ideologies, and lingering bitterness among conservatives. The bruising battle over Bork is widely considered one of the most contentious ever. But it was hardly the first.

In fact, bare-knuckle battling has always been part of the process. Of the 148 people nominated to the highest court, 28 have failed to be confirmed. Only a handful were rejected because the candidates were perceived as unqualified. The rest? Politics. "Almost never has a Supreme Court [nominee] been defeated because he was inept . . . . " says James O'Hara, a former legal professor at Loyola College in Baltimore and a trustee of the Supreme Court Historical Society. "Almost always, it's a battle between a significant portion of the Senate and the president." Nominees weren't actually present at confirmation hearings until 1925. But even in the earliest days of the high court, when it carried little prestige (some justices quit the bench to return to private practice), political crossfire took down many a nominee.

Firestorm. The first fight came with the first president--a nearly deified figure in the new nation. But George Washington appeared quite mortal when he nominated John Rutledge, a former governor of South Carolina, to replace Chief Justice John Jay in 1795. Rutledge was a defender of slavery and an advocate of exclusionary voting practices, but that's not what sparked outrage in the Senate. Federalist newspapers and a cadre of northern senators attacked Rutledge for a speech in which he criticized a new treaty with Great Britain. As Peter Irons details in A People's History of the Supreme Court, a whispering campaign ensued alleging that Rutledge's fiery speech was proof that he was "deranged in his mind," according to Attorney General Edmund Randolph, who reported the rumors to President Washington. Whether or not Rutledge was mentally unstable or just a firebrand orator remains a matter of debate, but after seeing his bid go down to defeat by a final vote of 10 to 14, Rutledge attempted suicide. He died a few years later.

In 1835, President Andrew Jackson deliberately ignited his own Supreme Court firestorm by nominating close friend Roger B. Taney. Taney was already radioactive; he'd served as Jackson's secretary of the treasury via a controversial recess appointment after two former secretaries refused to withdraw government funds--as Jackson had requested--from the Second Bank of the United States. The Second Bank was a semipublic institution that acted as the federal depository, which Jackson considered unconstitutional. Taney complied with Jackson's request, but he paid for his loyalty when outraged bank supporters in the Senate refused to accept his nomination to the treasury secretary's post.

John G. Roberts: What Answers Is He Going To Give? (NSWK)

Newsweek

Newsweek, September 5, 2005

In 39 arguments before the U.S. Supreme Court, John G. Roberts earned a reputation as an unflappable advocate for his clients. But this week, when Roberts testifies before the Senate Judiciary Committee in his own bid to join the high court, he'll face a different challenge. Instead of sparring with nine erudite justices interested in ferreting out fine points of the law, Roberts will confront 18 senators eager to score political points and rack up minutes on the cable news channels. The stakes soared after the death of Chief Justice William Rehnquist late last week. While the senators will try to press Roberts for specifics on controversial topics like civil rights, abortion and congressional authority, Roberts will attempt to keep his answers as general as possible without seeming to stonewall. "There's going to be a pretty restrictive line that he's not going to cross, and some senators aren't going to be happy about it," says one person close to Roberts's confirmation team who did not want to be quoted talking about the secretive preparation process.

Roberts has had plenty of practice. In at least 10 closed "murder board" sessions at the Department of Justice over the past few weeks, the nominee has wrangled with administration officials, lawyers and law professors playing the role of senators. Though a few have been full-blown mock panels of 18 "senators," other sessions have included just a handful of lawyers quizzing Roberts. Used to strict time limits and impatient justices, Roberts was firing off answers quickly; some participants urged him to slow down and let windy senators run out the clock, says an adviser who asked not to be named because the sessions were private. Administration officials assume Roberts will get grilled about abortion and many of the memos released from his days in the Reagan administration. They also worry that he may be pressed on the White House's refusal to release records from his days in the solicitor general's office.

Senators want to pin down Roberts's judicial philosophy, but they know the direct approach may not work. "I don't think you can ask how he would decide Roe for the future [or] extract a commitment from him," Sen. Arlen Specter, Republican committee chair, tells NEWSWEEK. But Specter says he plans to press Roberts on whether Roe—reaffirmed in 38 other decisions—is a "superprecedent" not to be tampered with. A source close to the prep who requested anonymity to speak more freely about the process says Roberts will likely follow the lead of Clarence Thomas, who confirmed a constitutional right to privacy encompassing contraception but steered clear of specifics on abortion in his hearings. "This discussion on the right to privacy will be important," says Sen. Sam Brownback.

Outside the hearing room, interest groups on both sides plan the kind of spin wars usually reserved for a presidential debate. Look for dueling press conferences, a raft of rapid-response e-mails and outside experts armed with talking points. Despite stepped-up efforts from liberal groups, Roberts is widely expected to win Senate confirmation later this month. The key question is margin of victory: a bigger bipartisan win—approaching 80 yea votes—could give George W. Bush more latitude in filling the next court vacancy.

Roberts' Deputy Post Not So Political (LEGALT)

DOJ_NMG_0002769

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 5, 2005

After weeks of document dumps and media scrutiny of John Roberts Jr.'s copious writings, the Supreme Court nominee goes before the Senate Judiciary Committee this week with one important part of his professional life still a mystery.

Roberts' three years and three months as principal deputy solicitor general (the so-called political deputy), from 1989 to 1993, produced easily as much paper as his earlier jobs in government. But except for briefs filed with the Supreme Court, all of it—including memorandums on cases—remains sealed, to the chagrin of Democrats and groups that oppose his nomination.

That part of Roberts' life is likely to provoke questioning from Senate Democrats who are intent on seeing if the conservative views he expressed as a young Reagan White House aide burned as brightly in his psyche a decade later. "The SG materials may be the only real source that reflects his own mature personal thinking," said Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) in an Aug. 10 statement.

Adds Nan Aron, president of Alliance for Justice, "At this point, the American people know next to nothing about the legal views Judge Roberts expressed during the most important, most influential period of his career as a lawyer." The group announced its opposition to Roberts last week.

So far, the only formal White House response has been to release a list of the Supreme Court cases Roberts handled—among them, 717 case recommendations, 77 briefs on the merits, and 31 petitions for certiorari. But the Bush administration won't release the texts, holding to the position taken during Miguel Estrada's bid for the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit in 2002: that releasing the memos he wrote in the SG's office would chill much-needed candor.

Beyond the posturing and politics of the dispute, however, some question how valuable the documents would be, asserting that the tussle results from a gross misunderstanding of the job Roberts held under Solicitor General Kenneth Starr during the first Bush administration.

The documents "still wouldn't tell you his personal views about a case," says Maureen Mahoney of Latham & Watkins, who served alongside Roberts as another deputy in the office. "No matter how you describe the position of political deputy, he does not have the authority to decide to file a brief requesting the Court to overrule Roe v. Wade."

Jones Day's Donald Ayer, Roberts' predecessor in the job, agrees, saying, "The great bulk of what you do does not have any political consequences. You are in the trenches along with everybody else."

Duke University Law School professor H. Jefferson Powell, who held the principal deputy's job for part of the Clinton administration, says that Democrats are wasting their time. "The memos would reveal that he was pushing the positions of President Bush I," says Powell. "That news would make me want to yawn and take a nap."

Some of the mystery and misunderstanding about the job Roberts held stems from its informal title, the "political deputy" solicitor general. That signifies only that the person filling the position is a political appointee who comes and goes with administrations, unlike the other three or four deputies in the office who are career civil servants. And it also means, in a general sense, that the person is "with the program" of the administration that hires him, as Powell puts it. Beyond that, though, the political nature of the job appears limited.

Yet those who have held the job say they have had to fight the impression that they were White House moles who enforced political or ideological orthodoxy in an office that has a long-standing tradition of independence.

"We thought the person with this job would be a political overseer or a political commissar, but it didn't turn out that way," says Andrew Frey, a Mayer Brown Rowe & Maw partner who served in the SG's office when the position was created, a few years before Roberts arrived.

The job's creation dates back to a 1982 episode that brought rare attention to the Office of the Solicitor General. Bob Jones University was fighting an Internal Revenue Service ruling that had stripped the institution of its tax-exempt status because it did not admit blacks. When the case went before the Supreme Court, Reagan administration officials pressured the Solicitor General's Office to support the university. Rex Lee, then the solicitor general, recused himself from the case, which meant that Lawrence Wallace, a career deputy with seniority in the office, was called on to write the brief. But there was a problem: Wallace believed the IRS position was correct and should be defended.

After much negotiation, Wallace wrote the brief as requested but made it clear in a footnote that he disagreed with it. The footnote launched headlines and editorial comment for weeks, and, ultimately, the Court supported the IRS policy, 8-1. "They didn't listen to me, and they embarrassed themselves," says Wallace, now retired.

In the aftermath of the Bob Jones debacle, Reagan officials pressed for a deputy position that would be a political appointment, so that when the solicitor general could not participate, someone else would be available to espouse the administration's position.

Lee, now deceased, resisted the idea, fearing the politicization of the office. "Rex was not enthusiastic about it," Wallace recalls. "So he decided to use it to enrich the office by bringing in someone with distinction, not someone just with political credentials." Lee recruited the late Harvard Law School professor Paul Bator, who is credited with creating the political deputy's tradition as a largely nonpolitical position equivalent in most ways to that of other deputies. As with the other deputies, the solicitor general himself signs off on all the political deputy's briefs.

Roberts has argued that the job was largely apolitical and that it served to insulate the rest of the office from politics. At a 2002 conference at Brigham Young University, Roberts, then in private practice at Hogan & Hartson, said, "It promotes, rather than undermines, the traditional institutional independence of the Office of the Solicitor General."

Roberts went on to explain that when he was in the position he, rather than the career deputies, would take the angry calls from others in the administration questioning the SG's position in a given case. "It was my job, I thought, to explain to this person that although this particular position . . . may be causing you some political heartburn, here is why we have to do it: It is compelled by our obligation to represent long-standing institutional interests of the United States."

By fielding those calls, Roberts said he protected the career attorneys in the office, who were sometimes suspected of being "holdovers" from previous administrations with different agendas.

As an example, Roberts mentioned the so-called Boston Harbor case. At issue was whether Massachusetts could require union-labor-only contracts in the project to clean up Boston Harbor. Starr filed a brief agreeing that the state acted within its powers.

The Association of Builders and Contractors pressured the administration to withdraw the brief, at one point threatening to oppose President George H. W. Bush's re-election. Starr held his ground, the brief was not withdrawn, and the Court unanimously agreed with his position.

Lawyers in the Solicitor General's Office at the time confirm Roberts' role as a buffer against political pressure. "He was certainly not viewed as a 'fixer,' " says Mahoney. "He was universally admired by lawyers in the office of all political persuasions."

In their document requests, Democrats have focused on a handful of cases in which Roberts signed the brief or handled the oral arguments. Two involve abortion rights: Rust v. Sullivan, a challenge to prohibitions on abortion advice at federally funded clinics, in which Roberts repeated in passing the administration position that Roe v. Wade should be overturned, and Bray v. Alexandria Women's Health Clinic. In that case, Roberts argued in support of the position taken by militant anti-abortion protesters that the Ku Klux Klan Act of 1871 did not apply to their activities.

Democrats hope Roberts' memos on the cases might reveal more of his views, but veterans of the office say that case memos, if released, would likely contain only a handwritten sentence or two from Roberts atop what other attorneys in the office wrote analyzing the case and recommending whether the government should seek review.

In a Washington Post op-ed column, former acting Solicitor General Walter Dellinger III suggested that because Roberts was a political appointee, a stronger case could be made that his memos should be made public, especially in the context of a Supreme Court nomination. But in an interview, Dellinger says he is not certain they should be released, partly because by doing so, the views of other attorneys in the office would also be revealed. He also says that, by and large, the work of the political deputy is no different from that of any other deputy.

One of the petitions Roberts wrote as a deputy SG might even get him in trouble this week with a Republican. He wrote the government's brief in O'Keefe v. Specter, a dispute over military-base closings, in which Roberts was on the opposite side of Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), who will preside over Roberts' confirmation hearings. Specter argued the case himself in 1994. He lost, 9-0.

The Judiciary Committee's Star Turn (LEGALT)

By T.R. Goldman, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 5, 2005

This week's Supreme Court confirmation hearings promise to be as theatrical as Congress gets. But the telegenic John Roberts Jr. will, in some respects, be a supporting actor, sharing the stage with 18 senators who view the hearings as their own star vehicle.

More than simply trying to pin down the elusive Roberts on his jurisprudence, the Senate Judiciary Committee's 10 Republicans and eight Democrats will be putting their own ambitions and agendas on display.

Rival Democrats will be trying to electrify their party base by showing who can be the toughest on the nominee, while Republicans will be seeking to burnish their own national credentials, competing to place Roberts' more controversial statements in the most benign light.

It is a committee of extremes — both liberal and conservative — and, even by Senate standards, of powerful egos. Six members have either run for president or are contemplating a bid (or in Delaware Democrat Joseph Biden Jr.'s case, another bid) in the 2008 election.

And there's another dynamic at play: A Supreme Court confirmation gives Congress a rare chance to tell the Court what it thinks about its co-equal branch.

While the Judiciary Committee already gets plenty of attention — it deals with the most explosive topics facing the country, from gun control to flag burning to abortion — the Roberts hearings will provide a chance for members to enhance or sink their own political futures. Just ask Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), another former presidential candidate. His opposition to Judge Robert Bork nearly cost him his Senate seat, while his aggressive cross-examination of Anita Hill during the Clarence Thomas hearings both failed to assuage hard-line conservatives and drew the wrath of liberal supporters.

"Think of all the legislation Congress does; most of it will be forgotten," says Melissa Patack, a former counsel to Judiciary Committee member Sen. Charles Grassley (R-Iowa), who worked on four Supreme Court nominations. "This will not be forgotten. This will make it into the history books."

JOCKEYING FOR POSITION

Specter, who is a stickler for order and has no problem cutting off the most senior committee members if they speak too long, is expected to run the Roberts hearings with characteristic rigor.

That means members will make statements and use their allotted question time in strict order of committee seniority, alternating between Republican and Democrat. That in itself has strategic implications, because each side will have very different objectives.

For Democrats, the goal is to put Roberts on the spot, to probe his few contentious writings and pin down his legal philosophy as precisely as possible.

Republicans will then do what they delicately refer to as "rehabilitation," holding up those same statements and explaining how the Democrats have willfully misread them.

"The challenge," says one senior Republican committee aide, is that "we don't know what documents they will wave around or what statements they will take out of context."

For example, Sen. Jon Kyl (Ariz.), considered one of the brightest of the 10 GOP members, is set to follow Biden, a former Judiciary chairman, who, despite a tendency for drama, generally asks difficult, well-considered questions. But Biden, like fellow committee Democrat Russell Feingold of Wisconsin and Republican Sam Brownback of Kansas, has presidential ambitions. That, say committee staffers, might make each senator play to his respective constituencies even more than usual.

"What do Feingold and Biden have to gain by voting for Roberts?" asks one Democratic Judiciary counsel. Biden, for example, may be carrying a grudge. He sponsored the Violence Against Women Act of 1994 (VAWA), which the high court struck down in part in 2000, saying Congress had failed to establish a link between violence toward women and regulating interstate commerce. In recent years the Court has shown hostility to broad prohibitions laid down by the legislative branch.

"The Court has slapped down Congress on more than one occasion — on VAWA, on the CDA, on guns in the schoolyard," says former Democratic Judiciary counsel Beryl Howell, referring to the Communications Decency Act and a 1990 law forbidding students from carrying guns in a school zone. Like VAWA, the Court struck down those laws on the grounds that Congress had exceeded its constitutional authority.

"The Court has slapped Congress and treated them worse than an administrative agency," adds Howell, now the general counsel at Stroz Friedberg in Washington. Biden may demand to know how Roberts views congressional power. And if Biden doesn't like the answer, it may be up to Kyl to smooth it over, to say, in effect, that Biden's question is out of line — something Roberts won't be able to say directly.

For Kyl and two other Republicans, Sens. Mike DeWine (Ohio) and Orrin Hatch (Utah), who ran for president in 2000, the hearings have special significance: The three are up for re-election in 2006. Three committee Democrats are also up next year: Sens. Herbert Kohl (Wis.), Dianne Feinstein (Calif.), and Edward Kennedy (Mass.), whose presidential bid was in 1980 and who will be running for his eighth term.

PLAYING DEFENSE

Republicans, of course, have made educated guesses about the subjects Democratic members are likely to broach and are preparing their responses accordingly.

Kennedy, for example, is viewed as most likely to toe the tough line of liberal special interest groups like the Alliance for Justice and People For the American Way. He will talk about civil rights, voting rights, and affirmative action, while Biden will focus on privacy and women's issues. Ranking member Patrick Leahy of Vermont, often overshadowed by Biden and Kennedy, will raise the issue of Roberts documents missing from the Reagan archives. Kohl, the antitrust subcommittee's ranking Democrat, will most likely bring up business-related queries.

Feinstein, the only woman on the committee, is sure to talk about abortion. Like other Democrats, she's in a bit of a political bind. Roberts was confirmed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia in 2003 by unanimous consent. If she votes "no," she will be accused of flip-flopping; if she votes "yes," she risks alienating her base.

Feingold is among the most unpredictable of committee Democrats: the only senator of either party to vote against the USA Patriot Act and the only Judiciary Committee Democrat to vote to confirm former Attorney General John Ashcroft. Like Biden, Kennedy, and New York's Charles Schumer, who follows Feingold in committee seniority, he can be a tenacious questioner, especially when it comes to his favorite subjects, such as the death penalty and campaign finance reform.

Of course, says one former Democratic committee counsel, members will have to remain flexible. "You wouldn't expect Feingold to focus on choice, but he follows Feinstein, and if something's left hanging, he'll try to clean it up."

Schumer, so far the most outspoken Democratic critic of the Roberts nomination — and the Democrat conservative Republicans most love to hate — has released a long laundry list of questions he might ask. "All the fireworks will be about how much Chuck Schumer makes this about Chuck Schumer," insists one Republican leadership aide working on the hearing.

Illinois' Richard Durbin, who despite being assistant Senate minority leader is the committee's most junior Democratic member, will likely focus on any subjects that are left. "He's at the bottom of the ladder, so he'll get the crumbs," notes a Democratic aide.

So important is the order of questioning that Republicans are quick to note that, given their 10-8 numerical advantage, the GOP will have three members in a row ask questions: Brownback; Tom Coburn (Okla.), the committee's most junior Republican; and then back to Specter, before Democrats get another shot at Roberts in round 2, which Specter has said will last only 20 minutes per person.

Specter, who will almost certainly vote for Roberts, could nonetheless deliver some of the week's toughest attacks on the 50-year-old judge. Last month he sent Roberts an angry letter denouncing the Court's ruling in U.S. v. Morrison, which declared that Congress could not create a federal civil remedy for gender-related crimes.

"Members of Congress are irate about the Court's denigrating and, really, disrespectful statements about Congress' competence," Specter wrote, referring to the Court's rejection of Congress' "method of reasoning."

In that vein, he is likely to mirror some of Biden's objections, though without Biden's flamboyance.

The committee's second-ranking Republican and its former chairman, Hatch, on the other hand, is Specter's polar opposite. Where Specter's questions are likely to dig in, Hatch is better known for his brand of rehabilitative questioning on the order of, " 'Isn't it true, sir, that you're a really good guy?' " mocks the Democratic counsel.

DOJ_NMG_0002773

It's true that while Democrats will have the luxury of remaining on the offensive, and Republicans will largely be forced to play defense, the 10-member GOP team is hardly monolithic.

Hatch will be followed by Grassley, a longtime committee member; he and Coburn are the panel's only non-lawyers. Grassley, a blunt-speaking farmer; DeWine; and South Carolina's Lindsey Graham are probably the panel's most independent-minded Republicans.

It is the committee's three most junior members — Coburn, Brownback, and, especially, former Texas Supreme Court Justice John Cornyn — who are most likely to do the White House's bidding.

Indeed, while Democrats would love to pin down Roberts on his views on Roe v. Wade, it is possible that the job may be done for them by a conservative Republican such as Brownback, something that would be anathema to most committee Republicans.

"Brownback and [Virginia Sen. George] Allen are the only two Republicans competing for the outer limits of the conservative party," notes a Judiciary Committee counsel for a Republican member. "So of course Brownback would love to pin him down on Roe v. Wade. That way, if he turns out to be another [David] Souter, Brownback can say he tried." But, he adds, "we're working hard on Roberts not to answer."

Brownback's office declined to comment.

The senior leadership staffer, however, denies any split in the ranks. "We've had meeting after meeting on this and we're all very much up the middle," he says. "I'm expecting a relatively dull experience."

Irritating Them All (USNEWS)

By Terence Samuel

U.S. News and World Report, September 5, 2005

The man with the gavel, Arlen Specter, 75, of Pennsylvania, Republican chair of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, is, depending on who's talking, a contradiction, a compromise, or a curse. He has been called pragmatic, erratic, and opportunistic. Over a political life of more than 40 years, he has bucked the odds, defied conventional wisdom, and sailed against the wind. But he's no cliche.

A moderate in a party increasingly controlled by conservatives, Specter is pro-abortion rights in a GOP that is antiabortion to its core. He is a contrarian often at odds with fellow Republicans, not just on abortion but on issues like tax cuts and tobacco litigation. He enjoys quoting a popular Democrat on party fealty: "JFK had the best line on that," Specter says, "when he said that sometimes the party asks too much." But Specter annoys the other side, too. His continued political survival remains a source of deep frustration for Democrats, who see him as perpetually vulnerable--but impossible to beat.

Always, he has been singularly Arlen Specter, infuriating his friends and confounding his enemies. It is hard to know what to expect from Arlen Specter. Which is why it will be so fascinating to watch him this week as he chairs the Judiciary Committee's hearings on Supreme Court nominee John G. Roberts.

Roots. Born in Kansas in Wichita, Specter grew up in the town of Russell, which also claims former Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole as a native son. Dole was seven years older and a basketball star; Specter was on the debating team at the same high school. Specter's parents were Jewish immigrants, his father from Ukraine, his mother from Russia. His father ran a junkyard.

Specter went east to college, at the University of Pennsylvania, and then, after a stint in the Air Force, graduated from Yale Law School. After three years at a prestigious Philadelphia firm, Specter joined the Philadelphia district attorney's office in 1959 as an assistant D.A. It was while he was a prosecutor in Philadelphia, in December 1963, that he was invited by a law school friend at the Justice Department to join the staff of the Warren Commission. In that position, Specter, dogged and determined, developed the single-bullet theory to explain how a lone gunman had fired the single shot that killed President Kennedy and injured Texas Gov. John Connally, who was in the car with him.

"I now call it the single-bullet conclusion," Specter writes in his memoir, Passion for Truth. "It began as a theory, but when a theory is established by the facts, it deserves to be called a conclusion." As a commission investigator, Specter drafted 78 questions to ask Lyndon Johnson, "who would, under other circumstances, have been considered a prime suspect." Specter said he didn't think Johnson had anything to do with the assassination, but "no self-respecting investigator would omit a thorough investigation of the slain president's successor." Those questions were never asked, because Johnson submitted just a brief affidavit. But Specter was ready.

Higher Stakes For Roberts (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

Why did President Bush pull such a quick switch yesterday and name Judge John Roberts to be chief justice of the United States? There are several theories, but here's the most sensible: Bush had always planned to make Roberts chief someday.

Recall that before Sandra Day O'Connor announced her retirement in July, much of official Washington was expecting that Chief Justice William Rehnquist would be the first to leave. The administration's extensive vetting was organized in large part to find a replacement for Rehnquist.

Roberts's combination of a conciliatory personality with firmly conservative convictions made him the perfect choice to lead the judicial revolution Bush would like to unleash. Successful chief justices need to be good politicians, and Roberts's political gifts were much in evidence this summer as he seemed to be charming his way toward relatively easy Senate approval.

But Rehnquist's passing and Bush's decision to withdraw Roberts's nomination as associate justice so he could name him chief create new political problems for both Bush and his appointee.

Until yesterday, even Roberts's staunchest critics judged their chances of stopping him for O'Connor's seat as bleak. Discussion among Senate Democrats revolved less around a strategy for blocking Roberts than on tactics that would make the best of his likely confirmation.

The debate focused on how many votes Democrats should try to muster against him -- to send a message for the big fight that would come over Rehnquist's job -- and whether senators from states where Bush had been popular should even consider voting no. Should Democrats try to look "moderate" by going along, or cast themselves as fighters for principle?

By proposing that Roberts lead the court, Bush has given the liberal groups that oppose the nomination (and Democratic senators inclined to join them) a chance to regroup and argue that this battle is no longer a practice session for the next round. This is the next round.

"Now that he's been nominated for chief justice, he's not a test case anymore," said a Senate Democratic staffer close to his party's discussions. "There's a difference between being one of nine and Number One of nine. And if he's confirmed, he's likely to hold the job for the next generation."

Fully aware that postponing confirmation hearings scheduled for today would give Roberts's opponents more time to organize, some Senate Republicans urged against any delay. Yesterday, it became clear that the hearings would be put off until either Thursday or next Monday. But the administration's allies are clearly wary of any further postponement.

Democrats, in turn, wanted more time to make the case that their requests for Roberts's past writings as an executive branch official -- documents the administration is holding back -- are more reasonable and appropriate than ever, "given the even greater importance of this new position," as Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) put it yesterday.

Moreover, now that Bush will be naming not one but two justices, it becomes clear that the argument before the Senate is not primarily about one person and his qualifications, but about the future direction of the judiciary. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) was right to say that before the Senate acted on Roberts, "we should know whom the president intends to propose to nominate as a replacement" for O'Connor, since Americans were concerned with "the overall balance of their highest court."

Until yesterday's announcement, Roberts seemed likely to win on the basis of his personal attributes. By raising the stakes, Bush has given the Democratic opposition an opportunity to show some spine. He has reminded senators that this is a vote not just about a smart, affable lawyer, but also about principles that could steer the Supreme Court for 30 years.

There is no telling whether Bush's diminished standing from the disastrous failure of hurricane relief efforts may embolden Democrats to challenge the White House across a much broader front, including the future of the court. But in the statement he issued within hours of Roberts's new nomination, Kennedy wanted no one to miss that possibility. He pointedly referred to

Hurricane Katrina as "a defining moment in our nation's history" and urged the president "to take this time to unite and heal the country."

Bush no doubt turned to Roberts as a safe harbor in the midst of the greatest political storm of his presidency, and Roberts may yet triumph. But the fierce winds that have buffeted Bush could imperil what once might have been an easy passage for a calm and collected nominee who, in his warm and witty way, would move the court and the country rightward.

A Weakened Bush Plays It Safe On Chief Justice (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings And Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON -- At a time of increasing political weakness, President Bush tapped John Roberts as his nominee for chief justice, choosing to avoid -- or at least delay -- a fresh ideological battle over the Supreme Court.

In quickly shifting gears following Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist's death from thyroid cancer Saturday night, the White House steered away from the controversial path some supporters have advocated: elevating to chief one of the court's two most outspoken conservatives, Antonin Scalia or Clarence Thomas.

Judge Roberts -- currently a member of the federal appeals court in Washington, D.C. -- appears more likely to follow the collegial Rehnquist example. While moving the court in a rightward direction on issues such as criminal law, the late chief tried during his 19 years in charge to create an amicable atmosphere. He sometimes shaped his opinions to cement a five-vote majority, rather than hewing completely to his views.

As Hurricane Katrina, rising gas prices and Iraq have sent Mr. Bush's poll ratings to the lowest levels of his administration, the Roberts nomination in July to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor has been one of the few moves to go smoothly for the White House lately. Mr. Bush's conservative base praised the pick, while many Democrats have found the genial judge difficult to attack. Public-opinion surveys show the country largely accepting Judge Roberts moving to the high court.

"For the past two months, members of the United States Senate and the American people have learned about the career and character of Judge Roberts," Mr. Bush said in an Oval Office announcement yesterday morning before heading to the Gulf Coast for the second time in four days. "They like what they see."

The White House likes the fact that Judge Roberts, at 50 years old, could run the court for a quarter century or more. If confirmed, he would be the youngest chief justice since John Marshall, who took office in 1801 at the age of 45.

When Judge Roberts was in line to succeed Justice O'Connor, he had the potential to shift the court's positions dramatically on hot-button social issues. Justice O'Connor often split the difference between the left and right on abortion, affirmative action and government support of religion. Now Judge Roberts would replace a jurist whose votes he is thought likely to track. Viewed this way, having Judge Roberts replace Chief Justice Rehnquist, for whom the nominee once clerked, wouldn't affect the court's political balance.

But it leaves open the big question of whom Mr. Bush will choose this time to replace Justice O'Connor. She has said she will stay on the bench until a successor is approved by the Senate.

Will he select a moderate candidate and try to shore up his standing with independents who are losing confidence in the administration? Or should he pick a hard-line conservative and please the party base that still supports him?

If he wanted a strong conservative in the Scalia-Thomas mold, he could turn to Judge J. Michael Luttig, an intellectual heavyweight on the Fourth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, who has been outspoken against abortion rights. "There's no question in my mind with what's on the president's plate right now, the war and Katrina in particular, he is not going to create more uncertainty by abandoning the base on this issue," said Leonard Leo, who is helping outside groups build support for the president's judicial nominees. Mr. Leo is on leave from his position of executive vice president of the Federalist Society, a conservative lawyers organization.

But pleasing the base would risk alienating moderate voters already cooling to Republicans ahead of the 2006 mid-term elections. Gender and particularly race may also play a role, especially in post-Katrina politics. The image of poor, black families stranded on New Orleans rooftops or begging for water has rejuvenated a debate over the Republican Party's posture toward minorities. After a week of such images, Republicans may be hesitant about a second white male nominee to the high court.

Nodding to those sensitivities, the president could name his friend from Texas, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, to fill the slot. Mr. Gonzales would be the first Hispanic on the Supreme Court and has an inspiring story as a self-made man raised by Mexican migrant workers. He has sounded more moderate on abortion rights and affirmative action than some of the other jurists on the short list.

Mr. Bush said yesterday he would choose a new O'Connor replacement "in a timely manner" but aides wouldn't be more specific. The president telephoned Justice O'Connor yesterday to let her know that she might have to stay "a bit longer," said White House spokesman Scott McClellan. If Judge Roberts is cleared quickly by the Senate, the court could open its new session in October with all nine seats filled. If he isn't confirmed by then, John Paul Stevens, the senior associate justice, would preside.

The Senate decided yesterday to delay the start of the Roberts confirmation hearings until after tomorrow's[wed] funeral for Mr. Rehnquist. The Roberts hearings were originally scheduled to open today.

The assumption in Washington has been that, absent a bombshell at those hearings, Judge Roberts would easily win confirmation in time to join the court in October. The White House is betting that as nominee to be chief justice, he will fare just as well.

Records Dispute

Liberal activists and some Democrats, frustrated at their inability to slow the Roberts nomination, argued yesterday that the higher post required a new level of scrutiny. The White House has refused to release records from Judge Roberts's years in the solicitor general's office during the administration of President George H. W. Bush.

"Given the greater importance of this new position, we hope the White House will reconsider its refusal to release relevant and important documents that will shed light on what kind of chief justice Judge Roberts would become," said New York Democrat Sen. Charles Schumer, a member of the Judiciary Committee.

Democrats hope that, in light of the heightened attention to race because of Hurricane Katrina, they can stir more criticism of Judge Roberts's record on civil rights. As Congress was considering reauthorizing the Voting Rights Act in 1982, Judge Roberts, then a White House lawyer, wrote memos urging the Reagan administration to oppose efforts to expand the law's scope. He criticized a U.S. Civil Rights Commission report that argued for affirmative action. "Under our view of the law it is not enough to say that blacks and women have been historically discriminated against as groups and are therefore entitled to special preferences," he wrote in one memo that Democrats may try to use against him.

In tapping Judge Roberts to be chief justice, President Bush yesterday praised the nominee's "natural gifts as a leader." But just as Judge Roberts's thin two-year resume on the bench makes it hard to divine how he would rule on many issues, his relative lack of management background creates uncertainty over how he would handle being head of the federal judicial system. Apart from serving as a mid-level political aide and a private lawyer, he held the post of principal deputy solicitor general in the Justice Department for four years, more than a decade ago -- his only claim to executive experience.

Judge Roberts may have less combined judicial and management experience than any of the prior 16 chief justices at the time of their confirmation. While Chief Justice Rehnquist had never been a judge before joining the Supreme Court in 1971, he served on the court for 15 years before becoming chief in 1986.

Despite his exalted rank -- something Chief Justice Rehnquist highlighted by adding gold stripes to his robe -- the chief justice has few powers beyond those of the eight associate justices. He presides over the private meetings the justices hold to discuss cases and, when he is in the majority, assigns the writing of opinions. Outside the Supreme Court, the chief justice heads the Judicial Conference, which is the policymaking arm of the federal judiciary.

In both roles, however, the chief justice's influence depends more on force of personality than raw power. Among recent chief justices, Mr. Rehnquist and Earl Warren are considered to have been strong leaders. On the other hand, Warren Burger, chief justice when Judge Roberts was a Supreme Court clerk, garnered respect neither as an intellectual force nor as an effective manager, despite his experience as an appellate judge and assistant attorney general.

Part of Mr. Rehnquist's influence as chief came from his evolution from a hard-edged ideological justice to a cooperative manager of his fellow justices. When he first joined the Supreme Court, his background had been as a Republican political operative and then an architect of the Nixon administration's hard line on criminal justice and political dissent. But when elevated to chief justice in 1986, he became known less for stinging dissents than a deep respect for the Supreme Court.

That leadership style sometimes affected the substance of judging. Chief Justice Rehnquist joined the bench as a fierce critic of the Warren Court's efforts to deter police misconduct by excluding ill-gotten evidence and requiring that authorities advise prisoners of their rights before questioning them. But in 2000, he wrote for a seven-member majority to affirm the 1966 decision that established the famous Miranda warning. "Miranda has become embedded in routine police practice to the point where the warnings have become part of our national culture," he wrote. By siding with the majority -- and against dissenting Justices Scalia and Thomas -- he could assign himself the job of writing the opinion and prevent a more liberal justice from expanding Miranda's sweep.

As a young lawyer, Judge Roberts was, like the young Rehnquist, sharply critical of a judicial establishment he considered too liberal. After serving as a clerk to then-Justice Rehnquist, Judge Roberts helped vet potential Reagan judicial nominees. At one point, he proposed a 15-year judicial term limit to help "ensure that federal judges would not lose all touch with reality through decades of ivory tower existence."

Over the years, however, he has shown signs of having more respect for the judiciary, including its long-serving members. As a litigator before the Supreme Court, he learned to craft arguments to sway the justices he now is poised to lead.

The White House has been debating how to fill the O'Connor seat since Sunday morning. The circle of participants is small, and the primary voices are those of Vice President Dick Cheney, top political adviser Karl Rove, Chief of Staff Andrew Card and White House Counsel Harriet Miers. Mr. Rove keeps the pulse of the party base, regularly communicating with the administration's outside allies.

Although Mr. Bush said he would act quickly, conservative activist groups are counseling against naming an O'Connor replacement before the Senate Judiciary Committee sends Judge Roberts's name to the Senate floor. That could take up to three weeks.

Mr. Bush has long been seen as personally partial to Mr. Gonzales, who served on the Texas Supreme Court when the president was the state's governor. He was on Mr. Bush's short list to fill the O'Connor seat the first time around.

Still, conservatives launched an unusually public campaign to derail his Supreme Court appointment over the summer, arguing he is not sufficiently opposed to abortion rights and affirmative action. It didn't help that Mr. Gonzales, in his early weeks on the job at the Justice Department, met face-to-face with officials from the liberal American Civil Liberties Union. Yesterday, conference calls among conservative activists buzzed with concern that Mr. Bush would nominate Mr. Gonzales. "We've come full circle," one participant said in an interview.

Among conservative intellectuals, Judge Luttig remains a favorite. After service in the first Bush administration, where he helped prepare Supreme Court nominee Clarence Thomas for confirmation hearings, Judge Luttig was rewarded with a seat on the Fourth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va. There he quickly emerged as a powerhouse. He writes taut and sometimes acerbic opinions and has helped a large numbers of his clerks obtain Supreme Court clerkships and positions of power in the current Bush administration. Many consider Judge Luttig an academic equal of Justice Scalia, for whom he once clerked. He would probably be a more inflammatory choice, likely to provoke a political fight the president may not welcome now.

The White House is also considering naming a woman to replace Justice O'Connor. Officials have already conducted background checks on several, including two on the Fifth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans: Judge Edith H. Jones and Judge Edith Brown Clement. The White House is likely to expand its list of female candidates to include Karen Williams of the Fourth Circuit and Justice Maura D. Corrigan of the Michigan Supreme Court.

President Names Roberts As Choice For Chief Justice (NYT)

By Richard W. Stevenson

DOJ_NMG_0002778

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 5 - President Bush said on Monday that he would nominate Judge John G. Roberts Jr., who had been his choice to fill the Supreme Court seat being vacated by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, to succeed William H. Rehnquist as chief justice of the United States.

Mr. Bush announced the switch less than 36 hours after Chief Justice Rehnquist's death and a day before the Senate Judiciary Committee had been scheduled to open hearings on Judge Roberts's nomination to replace Justice O'Connor.

If confirmed after hearings that are now expected to get under way in the next week, Judge Roberts would become the 17th chief justice. In taking the job at age 50, he would be in a position to play a pivotal role for decades in shaping the Supreme Court's rulings.

Saying that the Senate and the American people "like what they see" in Judge Roberts, Mr. Bush hailed what he called "his striking ability as a lawyer and his natural gifts as a leader."

The quick decision reflected the White House's conclusion that Judge Roberts, despite opposition to his conservative views from liberal groups and many Democrats in Congress, had withstood intense scrutiny since being nominated to replace Justice O'Connor and could be confirmed comfortably. Mr. Bush said he wanted him to be sworn in as chief justice before the start of the court's new term on Oct. 3.

In choosing Judge Roberts to be chief justice at a sensitive political time, Mr. Bush avoided the fiery ideological fight that would have been ignited had he chosen to elevate Justice Antonin Scalia, a favorite of many conservatives, or turned to a sitting federal judge with a clearer and more extensive conservative record of opinions on social issues than Judge Roberts has.

The rapid sequence of events left Mr. Bush back where many in Washington had thought he would be at the end of the court's last session in June, when Chief Justice Rehnquist was widely expected to step down first, perhaps to be followed by Justice O'Connor.

Having essentially moved to swap one reliable conservative for another in the chief justice's seat, the president now faces what is likely to be a much more intense battle to replace Justice O'Connor, a swing voter on abortion and other contentious issues. But the political climate Mr. Bush faces now is very different from the one in July, when he first moved to fill Justice O'Connor's seat.

The federal government's slow response to suffering inflicted by Hurricane Katrina, on top of the continued bloodshed in Iraq and high gasoline prices, has eaten into Mr. Bush's political strength, emboldening his opponents.

A senior administration official, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of personnel issues, said Mr. Bush's decision on the next nominee would not be swayed by the politics of the moment. But the official made a point of saying that Mr. Bush was considering candidates "from all walks of life," signaling that the administration was sensitive to the pressure to nominate a woman or a member of a minority to replace Justice O'Connor.

Mr. Bush offered the job of chief justice to Judge Roberts at a 7:15 meeting Monday morning in the Oval Office. The two men had met in the White House residence on Sunday evening to discuss the situation, Scott McClellan, the White House press secretary, said. The senior administration official who spoke on the condition of anonymity said the president had not interviewed anyone else for the chief justice position after Chief Justice Rehnquist's death late Saturday.

"It is in the interest of the court and the country to have a chief justice on the bench on the first full day of the fall term," Mr. Bush said in disclosing what has the potential to be one of the most consequential personnel decisions of his presidency.

It was fitting, he said, that Chief Justice Rehnquist "be followed in office by a person who shared his deep reverence for the Constitution, his profound respect for the Supreme Court and his complete devotion to the cause of justice."

Judge Roberts, standing by Mr. Bush in the Oval Office for the hastily arranged announcement just after 8 a.m. as the president prepared to leave for a tour of the storm damage in Louisiana and Mississippi, said he was "honored and humbled." Judge Roberts, a Rehnquist clerk in 1980 and 1981, said that if confirmed he would "succeed a man I deeply respect and admire."

Mr. Bush said he would select a nominee for the O'Connor seat "in a timely manner." White House officials signaled that there would not be an announcement this week and that they saw no real possibility of having a nominee for that seat confirmed by the start of the new term.

Speculation immediately centered on the same group of people who had been most prominently mentioned for the O'Connor seat the first time around. They include Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and several federal appeals court judges, including Edith Brown Clement, Edith H. Jones, J. Michael Luttig, Michael W. McConnell, Priscilla R. Owen and J. Harvie Wilkinson III.

Republican leaders in the Senate continued to work late Monday on a timetable for Judge Roberts's confirmation hearings, taking into account the funeral services for Chief Justice Rehnquist on Wednesday. Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, said the Judiciary Committee would announce a schedule on Tuesday, with the hearings most likely to start on Thursday or next Monday.

With the White House on the defensive over Mr. Bush's performance in dealing with the hurricane, Democrats pressed their advantage on Monday, pledging to subject Judge Roberts to more intensive scrutiny than they had so far and suggesting that the president was already displaying signs of political uncertainty.

Senate Democrats signaled that they would press the White House again to release more documents that might shed light on his thinking about divisive issues likely to come before the court. They have been seeking, unsuccessfully, the release of documents from the four years he spent as principal deputy solicitor general under the first President Bush, when he helped argue the government's position on civil rights issues and other topics of intense interest to liberal groups.

A CBS News poll released Monday found that 57 percent of Americans believed that the Senate should consider a Supreme Court nominee's positions on the issues as well as his or her legal qualifications. That was up from 46 percent last month.

"Now that the president has said he will nominate Judge Roberts as chief justice, the stakes are higher and the Senate's advice and consent responsibility is even more important," said Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader.

In what amounted to a warning to the White House not to select too conservative a nominee for Justice O'Connor's seat, Mr. Reid also urged Mr. Bush to take into account Justice O'Connor's role as what he called "a voice of moderation and reason on the court" in selecting a replacement.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, said there were signs that Mr. Bush was pulling his ideological punches because of political weakness.

"If he had been in a stronger position, he would have nominated Scalia as chief justice," Mr. Schumer said. "The president's general view on court nominees has been to make sure the hard right is happy. His weakened position removes him from that a little bit. We'll see how much."

Mr. Bush called Justice O'Connor from Air Force One on Monday morning, a little more than two hours after announcing his decision about Judge Roberts. A spokeswoman for Mr. Bush, Dana Perino, said Justice O'Connor had not heard the news until the president called. Justice O'Connor repeated to the president that her retirement would become effective when a successor was confirmed, Ms. Perino told reporters traveling with the president, indicating her willingness to start the new term on the bench.

On Sunday, Justice O'Connor said that not having a successor in place by Oct. 3 would present her with a "surprising dilemma."

It is not clear whether she will choose to hear any cases during the opening weeks of the term, since she would most likely have departed by the time they were decided, assuming Mr. Bush makes a choice relatively soon and the nominee appears headed toward confirmation.

Roberts Tapped For Higher Court Calling (CSM)

By Warren Richey And Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON - By naming Supreme Court nominee John Roberts to succeed William Rehnquist as chief justice, President Bush is seeking to avoid a Senate showdown that might have left the nation's highest court short-handed and embroiled in controversy with a new term fast approaching.

DOJ_NMG_0002780

Instead, the move maintains the rough balance of power that existed on the high court prior to the chief justice's death on Saturday. It does so by requiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor to continue to serve on the court until a new nominee to her seat is named and confirmed. What remains unclear, given Mr. Roberts's sparse judicial record, is how a Chief Justice Roberts might compare to Chief Justice Rehnquist. Will Roberts embrace the same conservative constitutional approach as Rehnquist?

"It's too early to tell. Some people believe that Roberts may be similar to Rehnquist in his jurisprudence, although that's not at all clear yet," says Carl Tobias, a constitutional law professor at the University of Richmond Law School.

Should Roberts win Senate confirmation, court watchers will learn the answer soon enough with a lineup of hot-button cases on the court's docket this fall - including assisted suicide on Oct. 5, abortion on Nov. 30, and gay rights on Dec. 6.

The real impact of Rehnquist's sudden passing is that instead of replacing Justice O'Connor, a centrist, with Roberts, who is presumed to be more conservative, the president is now replacing Rehnquist, a conservative, with a prospective chief justice who is to some extent an unknown quantity. The result is likely to be that O'Connor continues to wield her decisive tie-breaking vote in high-profile cases.

Legal analysts and court scholars say the president had few other options.

"To have a Supreme Court open just four weeks from now, the first Monday in October, with only seven people and no chief justice would be unprecedented, and I don't see that happening," says Sheldon Goldman, a political scientist at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

Although O'Connor's continued presence on the high court is a welcome development to Democrats, most fear that it will be short-lived. The president is expected to move quickly to appoint an O'Connor replacement who could shift the court significantly to the right.

In the meantime, Democrats say that Roberts's elevation to chief makes his nomination even more controversial and substantially raises the stakes. In anticipation of his confirmation hearings, Democrats are ramping up to use Roberts's record on civil rights and affirmative action as a main point of attack.

"The chief justice is the most important judge in the country, with even more responsibility for the protection of the rights and freedoms of all Americans. Thus, John Roberts bears a heavier burden when he comes before the Senate," says Sen. Edward Kennedy (D) of Massachusetts.

Republicans are praising the White House choice of Roberts as chief justice, noting that he has the necessary leadership skills to guide the high court. Some suggest his service on the court will mirror that of Rehnquist's.

"Throughout his years on the nation's high court, Chief Justice Rehnquist stood as a beacon of judicial restraint and reverence for the Constitution and the institution of the Supreme Court. I believe Judge Roberts will follow the lead of his mentor, and guide our nation's highest court by those same principles and devotion to the rule of law for all," says Sen. John Cornyn (R) Texas.

Although the chief justice casts only one vote like the other justices, the chief has the power when in the majority to assign who will write the majority opinion. In a closely divided court, the assigning power can sometimes be used strategically to draw an otherwise dissenting justice into the majority by naming that justice to write the opinion. The chief justice also has the power to assign the decision to him or herself and thus limit or expand the scope of a decision in subtle but meaningful ways.

The chief justice's personality is also important, legal analysts say. "He does have many of the qualities that potentially can make for a great and influential chief justice," says Professor Tobias. "He has that great intellect, which no one has denied, and a personality in many respects similar to Rehnquist's - a very charming, affable, low-key, modest personality that was able to make the court a much friendlier and somewhat less contentious place."

Liberal advocacy groups say they will continue to oppose the Roberts nomination. Ralph Neas, president of People For the American Way, says the group's objections apply to an even greater degree to efforts to elevate Roberts to chief justice.

"The nomination of John Roberts has evolved considerably since July, when the White House was successful in portraying him as a lawyer above the fray.... Almost daily revelations coming out of the Reagan presidential library show someone at the epicenter of a comprehensive assault on fundamental rights that have been part of the law for decades," says Mr. Neas. The road to confirmation

Supreme Court nominations over the past three decades have encountered a variety of receptions by the Senate.

Newsview: Bush Takes Safe Path On Roberts (AJC/AP)

By Ron Fournier, Ap Political Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON — President Bush chose the path of least resistance in nominating John Roberts as chief justice, acting with unusual haste as the war in Iraq and Hurricane Katrina sap his political strength. He was the safest choice Bush could make.

Roberts is a Washington insider well versed in the functions of the Supreme Court and the levers of power in Congress, an accomplished lawyer whose smile and sterling resume seem to take the sharp edges off his deeply conservative ideology.

Liberal activists who opposed Roberts' nomination to replace retiring justice Sandra Day O'Connor had found little in his record to suggest they could thwart that nomination.

He will draw less partisan fire than two other candidates pushed by Bush's conservative backers to succeed the late William H. Rehnquist — associate justices Clarence Thomas and Antonin Scalia.

While Roberts' confirmation still seems likely, he may face a tougher road to confirmation because the position of chief justice will be held to a higher standard. Bush's weakening political standing could complicate things for Roberts, according to strategists in both parties.

Republican and Democratic strategists also agree that Bush will come under intense pressure now to name a woman or minority to replace O'Connor. It's no small factor that flooding in New Orleans hit poor, black residents the hardest, raising questions about Bush's sensitivity to minorities and the poor.

"When Roberts' record on civil rights is reviewed inside the Judiciary Committee, it's going to sound more jarring post-Katrina than before the hurricane," said Democratic consultant Jenny Backus. "America was reminded about the big issue out there that has not been openly addressed by the administration — economic disparity based on race."

Bush may also be boxed in ideologically — less inclined to nominate somebody as conservative or to the right of Roberts. But officials close to the White House predicted the president would pick a conservative in the mold of Roberts.

"The fight is over the next one," said Democratic consultant Nick Baldick. "Roberts is taking the Rehnquist voting slot and no one worried about him being much more conservative than Rehnquist."

Privately, several Republicans predicted Monday that Bush's political stature will continue to decline as the Gulf Coast death toll mounts. That may make Roberts an easier target.

But the real complications come later, when Bush turns to O'Connor's seat.

As one senior Republican put it: Weak presidents beget weak nominees. Whoever Bush selects next will be vulnerable because the president's political troubles have grown since he first tapped Roberts. The officials, including two who are working closely with the White House on Supreme Court picks, spoke on condition of anonymity because they are not authorized to discuss the process publicly.

Democrats wondered why it took Bush less time to name Rehnquist's replacement than it did to visit the Gulf Coast after Katrina hit.

"This is about who will run the Supreme Court for the next generation and it looks like they rushed a decision together in a way that doesn't look that thoughtful," said Joe Lockhart, press secretary in the Clinton White House.

Some Democrats urged Bush to delay the nomination process while he responds to Katrina, a not-too-subtle dig at his efforts thus far. "In the midst of a national disaster of biblical proportion," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., said, "it is difficult for the American people to participate fully in the selection of the next chief justice."

In fairness to Bush, he had weeks to consider Roberts' qualifications, and a summer spent in the spotlight turned up no warts on the nominee.

"I think the public vetting proves that this guy is the real deal — bright, knows the issues and can leave a long-term imprint on the court because of his youth and intellect," said Rick Davis, a GOP consultant.

That is a major point that easily gets lost amid the politicking. Roberts, 50, could lead the nation's judicial branch for a generation or more. He may be the last chief justice most Americans know.

On top of that, O'Connor's seat is a critical swing vote — and she may not be the last justice who leaves during Bush's term.

DOJ_NMG_0002783

When voters re-elected Bush, they gave Republicans the keys to the future of the U.S. judiciary. Bush and his party control the Judiciary Committee and a solid majority of votes in the Senate. Nobody should be surprised that the Supreme Court, once a liberal bastion, will continue further down the conservative path plowed by Rehnquist himself.

Political Equations Are In For A Revision (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON — By choosing federal judge John Roberts to succeed William Rehnquist as chief justice, President Bush picked someone who has been screened extensively and who could be confirmed by the Senate before the court's term begins Oct. 3.

Roberts, who had faced confirmation hearings this week as Bush's choice to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, was perfectly positioned to move over to the chief's slot when Rehnquist, 80, died Saturday. Suddenly, the White House was able to put its top choice for the high court in the center seat.

But Bush's nomination of Roberts to be chief justice shakes up the complicated political calculus that invariably accompanies judicial nominations, particularly those involving the Supreme Court. It also reopens the debate over who should replace O'Connor's moderate voice on the divided court at a time when the Bush administration is battling criticism over its response to Hurricane Katrina.

A key question in the coming weeks will be whether the White House — which has been feisty in its determination to put strict conservatives on the bench in lower courts — now has the appetite for a knock-down, drag-out fight over a Supreme Court nomination. With O'Connor's seat back in play, Bush also will be under increasing pressure to select a woman or a minority for the nine-member court.

The events of the past several weeks mean that a court that went 11 years without a change in membership will be transformed.

Roberts now is in line to replace the solidly conservative Rehnquist rather than the moderately conservative O'Connor. Roberts, a former law clerk to Rehnquist, was a conservative go-getter as a government lawyer during the Reagan and first Bush administrations, before he moved on to a lucrative private-sector legal career. But his paper trail is not complete, and his current views on major issues of the day — such as abortion, affirmative action and religion's role in government — aren't totally clear. Regardless, he has friends in both parties and has been moving toward a relatively easy confirmation.

Meanwhile, the court will eventually be without O'Connor, who supported affirmative action in college admissions and who is one of six justices who have endorsed abortion rights.

Her successor could shift the court to the right — as Bush's conservative base wants — or add more unpredictability.

It's unclear how all the maneuvering will affect the law in America, but there is certain to be a long shakeout period among the members of the nation's highest court. O'Connor's successor probably won't join the court until after the start of the annual term on Oct. 3. O'Connor has said she will stick around to hear cases until her replacement arrives, but the possibility that she will leave the bench during the middle of a case could further complicate matters for the court.

A key political question is how Bush will respond to pressure to pick a woman or a minority for the court. Without O'Connor, the nine-member court will have only one woman, Ruth Bader Ginsburg. There is only one African-American on the bench, Clarence Thomas, and there has never been a Hispanic justice.

"I think the president himself values diversity on the courts," says David Leitch, a former deputy White House counsel to Bush and now general counsel at Ford Motor Co. "It will be something that he'll consider. But I don't think it's more or less likely to be a factor because of poll ratings or anything else going on in the short-term news cycle."

If Bush wants to make the court more diverse, that could enhance the prospects for Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, a longtime friend of the president. Gonzales was born in San Antonio to parents whose families immigrated from Mexico.

But Gonzales has a moderate record that has drawn criticism over the years from staunch conservative groups such as the Coalition for a Fair Judiciary. Gonzales has spoken in favor of affirmative action, and as a Texas Supreme Court justice he endorsed the idea of abortion rights.

DOJ_NMG_0002784

"Judge Gonzales would be the obvious choice for this next pick, but for the opposition of conservative groups," says Bradford Berenson, a Washington lawyer who was an associate White House counsel during Bush's first term.

Another candidate for O'Connor's spot could be Larry Thompson, who was deputy attorney general and the highest-ranking African-American law enforcement official in Bush's first term. He is senior vice president and general counsel at PepsiCo in Purchase, N.Y.

Several federal appeals court judges are possible contenders: Samuel Alito of Newark; Janice Rogers Brown of Washington, D.C.; Edith Brown Clement of New Orleans; Emilio Garza of San Antonio; Edith Jones of Houston; Michael Luttig of Alexandria, Va.; Michael McConnell of Salt Lake City; and J. Harvie Wilkinson of Charlottesville, Va.

The president's choice for the O'Connor seat and the resolution of other looming questions will have long-term consequences for the nation's highest court. Rehnquist served 33 years, the last 19 as chief justice. O'Connor is in her 24th year on the bench. Roberts and whoever else is tapped could affect significantly the law for decades to come. This fall, the justices will consider disputes over abortion rights, physician-assisted suicide and campus bans on military recruiting.

Roberts' record generally appears to be in line with Rehnquist's conservative views. Rehnquist presided over a court that curtailed Congress' power in local affairs, reduced protections for criminal defendants and diminished the court's presence in American life, particularly in achieving social goals such as school desegregation and prison reform.

Predicting the high court's decisions in such disputes has become more difficult now that there are two openings. When Roberts was the potential successor to O'Connor, for example, it was easy to see the court taking a slight turn to the right. If Roberts winds up opposing abortion rights, for example, the number of justices in favor of such rights would drop to five.

But if Roberts succeeds Rehnquist — who was a strong opponent of Roe v. Wade, the 1973 decision that made abortion legal nationwide — there might be no change in the court's overall stance on abortion. Roberts is 30 years younger than Rehnquist and is in a generation whose members were young adults when Roe was decided, so it is possible that Roberts could favor restrictions on abortion without voting against the basic right to the procedure. If so, he would represent a softening of the chief justice's position on the issue.

Some Senate Democrats say Roberts should get tougher scrutiny now that he is being nominated for chief justice. "The chief justice is the most important judge in the country, with even more responsibility for the protection of the rights and freedoms of all Americans," Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said in a statement. "Thus John Roberts bears a heavier burden when he comes before the Senate."

Marci Hamilton, a law professor at Yeshiva University's Cardozo Law School and a former clerk to O'Connor, says recent events could lead the administration to avoid a nomination fight in the Senate and pick a moderate candidate, someone who could win support from Democrats, to replace O'Connor.

"The poll numbers are bad. Katrina is added to other failures. The moderate choices look better politically," Hamilton says.

But Leitch, who agrees that a woman or Hispanic jurist is a real possibility, counters that Bush aides "will probably do everything possible to make the best long-term decision, rather than just pay attention to the vicissitudes of the moment. Thirty years from now, you might still have the (new) justice making decisions."

Roberts's Personal Skills And Political Savvy Seen As Assets (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

On Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist's Supreme Court, Justice Antonin Scalia has been the acknowledged intellectual leader of the conservative bloc, a brilliant writer and legal thinker with many followers in legal academia.

Yet when it came time to replace Rehnquist as chief justice, President Bush did not tap Scalia, 69, as some conservatives had hoped. Rather, he reached outside the court and selected John G. Roberts Jr.

Roberts, 50, is not only younger than Scalia, but also mellower, a former law clerk of the easygoing Rehnquist. Roberts became known for his astute political judgments in the Reagan administration and his cordial personal relations with many liberal attorneys during his years as a Supreme Court advocate. In a role in which he will have few means of forging majorities other than persuasion and tact, that could make Roberts an effective force for conservatism on the court.

"A committed conservative with interpersonal skills equal to or superior to Rehnquist's would be a far more effective chief justice than a nominee of equal intellect who lacks those graces," said David J. Garrow, a professor of law at Emory University.

Historians have often labeled different eras at the court for the chief justice who presided at the time. Yet whereas the chief justice runs oral argument and closed-door conferences, he has only one vote and few formal means of control over the court. Rehnquist himself once likened leading the Supreme Court's eight associate justices to controlling "hogs on ice." The court's nominal boss, he said, "may at most persuade or cajole" his independent-minded colleagues.

Thus, the Warren Court's jurisprudence probably owed as much to the thinking and interpersonal skills of Justice William J. Brennan Jr. as it did to the ideas of Chief Justice Earl Warren. Sandra Day O'Connor, an appointee of President Ronald Reagan who often found herself unable to agree with Scalia, was the controlling force of the Rehnquist Court.

Probably the chief justice's principal power is the right to assign the writing of opinions for the court when he is in the majority. Rehnquist was known for the fairness with which he distributed opinions among the associates -- especially in contrast to his predecessor, Warren E. Burger, who often generated ill will by manipulating the process.

Rehnquist also prevented the court's conferences from turning into prolonged debates, which had often led to delays and personal feuding at the court earlier in the 20th century.

Instead, Rehnquist's policy was that every justice would speak at least once, to announce his or her vote and view of the case, before anyone would be allowed to raise an objection.

The Burger period was a time of notorious internal bickering at the court, which Roberts saw first-hand as a law clerk for Rehnquist -- then an associate justice -- during the 1980-1981 term.

As chief justice, Rehnquist would sometimes join a majority he probably did not agree with, so as to reserve the opinion-writing for himself and thus limit the damage to his own legal preferences. But he would also take his share of less-glamorous assignments, such as tax and Indian law cases.

As a young aide in the Reagan administration, Roberts was an advocate of conservative policy positions -- but also a keen student of politics and the media who frequently counseled his superiors how to achieve their objectives without ruffling feathers.

In an Aug. 31, 1982, White House memo, Roberts advised his bosses on relations between the executive branch and the Supreme Court. The document showed great solicitude for the sometimes prickly sensibilities of the justices.

"Any effort to improve relations between the Executive Branch and the members of the Supreme Court must be undertaken with extreme care to ensure that there is no appearance of an effort to affect the deliberations or decisions of the Justices," Roberts wrote. "The dignity of the Court must also be maintained, and the Justices should under no circumstances be made to feel that they are being used as part of any political campaign or an effort to achieve any political end."

In inviting justices to state dinners, Roberts counseled, "no favoritism should be shown based on the Justice's individual views."

If confirmed by the Senate, Roberts, 50, would be the youngest chief justice since John Marshall took office at the age of 45 in 1801; he would also be taking the helm of a group that has been together for the last 11 years and has known no other chief justice during that time.

Yet few expect either Roberts's age or his newness on the court to be liabilities. That is because he is already so familiar to the current justices, both from his 39 oral arguments before them, and from socializing outside the courtroom.

"He probably knows them as judges and as people better than all but a few other people," said David G. Leitch, a former associate White House counsel in the Bush administration who also served as a law clerk to Rehnquist.

As chief justice, Roberts would also serve as head of the Judicial Conference, which makes policy on behalf of the entire federal judiciary. In this role, Roberts will be expected to represent all federal courts in their efforts to win budget funding and salary increases from Congress, as well as to fend off threats to the judicial branch's independence that might come from the legislative or the executive branch.

There is even a cultural side to the post as chief justice. If confirmed, Roberts would, by law, serve on the boards of the Smithsonian Institution, the National Gallery of Art and the Hirshhorn Museum and Sculpture Garden.

Bush Nominates Roberts As Chief Justice (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0002786

By Patti Waldmeir

Financial Times, September 6, 2005

President George W. Bush on Monday nominated Judge John Roberts as Chief Justice of the US, but left open the more difficult question of who should fill the second vacant seat on the US Supreme Court.

The president is faced with a rare opportunity to make two appointments to the Supreme Court at once and shift the Court to the right for decades to come.

Apparently eager to return to the urgent task of repairing his tarnished image after Hurricane Katrina, Mr Bush moved swiftly to fill the first of those seats. He promoted Judge Roberts, 50, who was already in line to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor to fill the seat vacated by the death of Chief Justice William Rehnquist.

The choice is widely viewed as a shrewd one: John Roberts is respected for intelligence, temperament and demeanour. It seems likely he will be confirmed, even by the bitterly divided Senate.

But that leaves Justice O'Connor's seat vacant. She said in July that she would retire, but offered to stay until a replacement could be seated.

Mr Bush said on Monday he would choose a nominee “in a timely fashion”, and a White House spokesman said he called Justice O'Connor from Air Force One to discuss the decision.

But it was not clear whether the announcement would come before or after Judge Roberts' Senate confirmation hearings.

Those hearings, which were to have begun on Tuesday, are expected to be delayed. Much of the groundwork for them has already been done: Judge Roberts's background as a government lawyer, corporate attorney and appeals court judge has already been thoroughly scrutinised, and nothing has yet emerged to fuel enough opposition to defeat him.

Mr Bush urged the Senate to move quickly before the new Supreme Court term on October 3. One prominent liberal group, People for the American Way, immediately came out against him. It said in a statement that Judge Roberts was “unfit to be Chief Justice” largely because of his “hostility to the laws and remedies that protect Americans from discrimination”.

But overall, liberal groups are likely to fight harder over Justice O'Connor's seat. That nominee could go further in shifting the balance on the evenly divided Court.

Democrats Pledge More Intense Scrutiny Of Roberts (WP)

By Jo Becker

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

Senate Democrats yesterday promised to subject John G. Roberts Jr. to an increased level of scrutiny in light of President Bush's decision to nominate the 50-year-old appeals court judge to replace the late William H. Rehnquist as chief justice.

But with conservatives and liberals alike saying that Roberts is on track to be confirmed, the focus was already shifting to what both sides believe will be the real battle: Bush's yet-to-be-named pick to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

O'Connor's seat is critical because she often provided a swing vote on such controversial issues as affirmative action, abortion and prayer in public places. Roberts was initially chosen to replace her, but instead is now poised to succeed Rehnquist, a reliable conservative who died Saturday of thyroid cancer.

The rare opening of two seats on the nine-member court gives Bush the opportunity to dramatically move the balance of power on the court to the right.

The switch, which comes as the Bush administration struggles to deal with the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, had both sides hurriedly recalibrating their strategies. Senate leaders agreed to postpone Roberts's confirmation hearings, which had been scheduled to start today, probably until next Monday.

Bush urged the Senate to quickly confirm Roberts in time for the Oct. 3 start of the new Supreme Court term, saying that the Senate was "well along in the process of considering Judge Roberts's qualifications."

But Senate Democrats said that the move to make Roberts the 17th chief justice of the United States required careful deliberation, particularly given Roberts's relatively short, two-year tenure as a federal appeals court judge.

DOJ_NMG_0002787

"The stakes are higher and the Senate's advice and consent responsibility is even more important," said Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.). "If confirmed to this lifetime job, John Roberts would become the leader of the third branch of the federal government and the most prominent judge in the nation."

Democrats on the Judiciary Committee plan to renew their calls for the White House to release memos and other documents from Roberts's 1989-1993 tenure as principal deputy solicitor general in the administration of President George H.W. Bush, his highest government posting. "Judge Roberts has a clear obligation to make his views known fully and completely," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y).

Still, even liberal groups opposed to Roberts's nomination said yesterday that the shift is unlikely to alter his chances of being confirmed, given that Republicans are in firm control of the Senate. Some Republicans argued that it will even help his prospects, given that replacing Rehnquist with Roberts isn't likely to change the ideological center of the court.

Kate Michelman, a former president of NARAL Pro-Choice America, said that what senators must do now is highlight Roberts's record on civil rights, his skeptical writings about the legal underpinnings of abortion rights and other stances to "show people what it means to have his views on the court and lay the groundwork for the next nomination fight."

Democrats are already moving to link the two nominations. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said that a review of memos that Roberts wrote while a young lawyer in the Reagan administration shows that Roberts sought to "weaken voting rights, roll back women's rights, and impede our progress toward a more equal nation."

Before the Senate acts on Roberts's new nomination, Kennedy said, the Senate has a right to know whom Bush intends to nominate for O'Connor's position. "The American people care deeply about the overall balance of their highest court."

With President Bush's approval ratings at an all-time low and his administration under fire over its handling of Hurricane Katrina, some conservatives are worried that Bush will forgo the chance to pick another conservative in favor of someone who will not provoke a fight.

Manuel Miranda, former legal counsel to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and the founder of a conservative group that follows judicial issues, said Bush must keep his campaign promise to nominate a justice in the tradition of conservative Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, or risk "sinking even lower in the polls."

"If anything is keeping him afloat right now, it's conservative support," Miranda said.

Meanwhile, Democrats on the Hill are feeling more emboldened by the president's weakened political standing, according to interviews with senior aides and Democratic strategists. Ron Klain, a former aide to President Bill Clinton, said Democrats may be more willing to fight a staunchly conservative second pick.

"As his poll numbers fall, his domestic problems accumulate, and as independent voters increasingly wonder if he is out of touch with what's going on in the country, then Democrats in conservative states have less to fear by crossing him," Klain said.

The question for Democrats is whether the American public, consumed with images of the devastation in the Gulf Coast states, will tune in to the nomination hearings.

Senators are treading carefully. Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) said that the Senate looks forward to consulting Bush on a successor to O'Connor, a pick he stressed will "affect all of us, and the generations who follow us."

At the same time, he said, "these are not the only challenges facing the nation at this critical time. Most urgent at this moment is providing the necessary help to Americans still suffering in New Orleans and elsewhere along the Gulf Coast."

Special Interests Gear Up For Fight On Court Vacancy (USAT)

By Mark Memmott

USA Today, September 6, 2005

Now that there are two Supreme Court seats to fill, a relatively quiet debate among interest groups is expected to become the more bitter, multimillion-dollar slugfest opposing sides have long anticipated.

“Watch for World War III,” conservative lawyer John Hinderaker wrote Monday on Power Line, his widely read Web log, or blog.

Interest groups plan to ramp up their rhetoric, TV ad campaigns and grass-roots lobbying even though Chief Justice William Rehnquist's death may not fundamentally change the court.

DOJ_NMG_0002788

If President Bush gets his way in the Senate, Rehnquist will be replaced by another conservative — federal judge John Roberts. "That doesn't turn the court to the right," said Mark Hurwitz of Western Michigan University.

The vacancy Roberts had previously been tapped to fill, the seat of retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, offers the better opportunity for Bush to at least slightly affect the balance on the court.

O'Connor is a moderate on some social issues. Hers is one of six votes on the nine-member panel to support abortion rights.

Before Rehnquist's death on Saturday, Roberts' nomination to fill O'Connor's seat had generated relatively little heat. Progress for America, a conservative group that pledged to spend up to $18 million to support Bush's nominee, had spent just a few million dollars.

Leading liberal groups such as People for the American Way, Alliance for Justice and NARAL Pro-Choice America had announced their opposition to Roberts' confirmation. But among those, only NARAL had run anti-Roberts TV ads.

Overall, efforts by the White House, Republican Party officials and conservative groups to portray Roberts as a "fair" judge who deserved a "fair," up-or-down vote in the Senate had dampened debate.

Things changed with the prospect of two court openings:

•Ralph Neas, president of People for the American Way, said in a statement that Roberts' "hostility" to laws that many in the left view as guarding Americans from discrimination makes him "unfit for the position of chief justice." Neas promised his group will "vigorously oppose his confirmation."

In an interview, Neas said stakes are higher now because as chief justice, Roberts, 50, "could have a tremendous impact on the judiciary well into the 21st century."

•Nancy Keenan, president of NARAL Pro-Choice America, called on the White House to release documents written by Roberts when he was a deputy solicitor general in the first Bush administration. "The American people need to know where this man stands on the issue of privacy," Keenan said.

As for the O'Connor vacancy, Neas and Keenan called on Bush to choose a moderate, "consensus" nominee. C. Michael Comiskey, political science professor at Penn State Fayette, said that's unlikely. Bush may be riding low in polls, but "I don't think he's afraid of a fight," Comiskey said. "He's going to nominate the person he wants."

Interest groups on the right said they are ready to support the president's nominees. "The left is doing its predictable show of hysterical scare-mongering," said Sean Rushton, executive director of the conservative Committee for Justice.

"We'll defend and promote the nominees," said Brian McCabe, president of Progress for America.

The groups "have no reason to exist and collect money if they don't fight on this now," said Hinderaker, the conservative blogger.

Bush Wants Roberts To Be Next Chief Justice (LAT)

By David G. Savage And Henry Weinstein

The Los Angeles Times, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON -- President Bush moved quickly Monday to replace the late William H. Rehnquist on the Supreme Court by nominating Rehnquist's onetime law clerk, Judge John G. Roberts Jr., as the 17th chief justice of the United States.

Bush had nominated Roberts in July as an associate justice to succeed Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. When she wrote Bush about her plans to retire, O'Connor had said she would remain on the court until her successor is confirmed, and she reiterated that sentiment Monday.

The Oval Office announcement of Roberts' new status came less than 36 hours after Rehnquist died at his home in Arlington, Va., and just a day before the Senate Judiciary Committee was to open confirmation hearings on Roberts' nomination as an associate justice. Those hearings were put off, at least until Thursday.

The switch permits Bush to replace the conservative chief justice with a 50-year-old appellate court judge who appears to be an ideological twin. And because the Roberts nomination has been generally well-received, both the White House and Senate Republicans expect he will be confirmed before the first Monday in October, when the Supreme Court begins its new term.

"It is in the interest of the court and the country to have a chief justice on the bench on the first full day of the fall term," the president said. He added that Roberts' "striking ability as a lawyer and his natural gifts as a leader" make him an ideal choice to be chief justice, despite his relative youth.

Indeed, Roberts had been the first choice of White House lawyers earlier this year as a successor to Rehnquist, who had been diagnosed with thyroid cancer last October and was widely expected to retire in June, at the end of the court's 2004-05 term. Roberts was chosen as O'Connor's successor only because she unexpectedly announced her retirement first.

Now, the intense speculation has focused again on a replacement for O'Connor, the court's swing vote on issues such as religion, abortion and affirmative action. In his remarks Monday morning, Bush said he would choose her successor in a "timely manner."

If the president chooses Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales or Judge Edith Brown Clement from the federal appellate court in New Orleans, the change may not tip the balance of the court to the right. Both are seen as moderate conservatives, somewhat akin to O'Connor.

But Bush could select a nominee with more conservative credentials, such as Judges J. Michael Luttig and J. Harvie Wilkinson of Virginia, Edith H. Jones of Texas or Janice Rogers Brown, the former California Supreme Court justice who was confirmed this summer to the U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington. Any of those nominations would set off a political battle in the Senate.

Bush also could turn to Judges Emilio Garza or Priscilla R. Owen, both Texas conservatives, or to Larry D. Thompson, a former deputy attorney general who is highly regarded by Bush insiders and now serves as general counsel to Pepsico.

Gonzales and Garza are Hispanic, and Thompson and Brown are black. Many legal analysts said Monday they expected that Bush would choose a woman or a member of a minority group to fill O'Connor's seat, and not a conservative white male.

"I expect intense pressure on the president from the loyal opposition to nominate as moderate a voice as he can find for the O'Connor replacement," said Pepperdine University law professor Douglas W. Kmiec. That bodes well for the prospects of Gonzales or Clement, he said.

"The realpolitik of the situation is a president who is low in the polls, facing considerable difficulty externally with Iraq and internally with (Hurricane) Katrina will have more difficulty holding his party together than not. That will not augur well for a ... conservative nominee," he said.

But Northwestern University law professor Steven G. Calabresi, a former law clerk to Justice Antonin Scalia and one of the founders of the Federalist Society, a conservative legal group, contended that Bush's political problems with hurricane recovery efforts would not affect his decision.

"I really think the president regards these decisions as among the most consequential of his presidency," Calabresi said. "He will do what he thinks is right for the country regardless of its immediate impact on his political standing. That doesn't necessarily mean he will do something confrontational."

Meanwhile, the new Roberts nomination was praised as a smart move by conservative activists and some independent analysts.

Bush's action Monday "makes a lot of sense. He now knows with near certainty that Roberts is a survivor, who has been vetted by the press and the legal establishment," said Stephen Gillers, a New York University law professor and legal ethicist. "No skeletons have been found, nothing that could possibly derail his confirmation despite some opposition from progressive groups."

Roberts' confirmation "is a virtual shoo-in," he said.

Kmiec predicted that Roberts would exert real influence as chief justice. "He is genial, warm, welcoming, not quick to take umbrage or disagree. He will be very effective by wit, intelligence and the ability to build coalitions for particular points of view," he said.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, who was appointed to the court by President Reagan, has infuriated some conservatives by voting to uphold abortion rights and gay rights, and Kmiec suggested that the presence of Roberts as chief justice "may cause Kennedy to be more faithfully conservative."

Liberal groups that were already sharply critical of Roberts said the new nomination raised the stakes in the confirmation hearings.

DOJ_NMG_0002790

People for the American Way called Roberts "unfit to be chief justice of the United States." Roberts has shown "hostility to the laws and remedies that protect Americans from discrimination," the group said.

NARAL Pro-Choice America said it was flatly opposed to Roberts, and the National Organization for Woman called him "an anti-women's rights, anti-civil rights judge."

"It is an outrage and an insult to the women of this country that George W. Bush has nominated such as jurist to be chief justice of the United States," said NOW president Kim Gandy.

Duke University's Erwin Chemerinsky, who last week led a group of liberal law professors in announcing opposition to Roberts, said Bush's move Monday "dramatically changes the dynamics of the Roberts confirmation."

Roberts "by all accounts seems to be like Rehnquist ideologically. This means the focus has to be on replacing O'Connor, because it is that seat in the short term that could change the outcome of so many cases," he said. Viewed through this prism, Roberts' path to confirmation could be eased, he said.

"If Bush tried to replace O'Connor with Jones or Luttig, the Democrats will go to the wall" on both nominees, he predicted. "The flip side is that if Bush picks a more moderate conservative, Democrats will let both go through because it does not change the overall balance of the court. Again, this makes the crucial issue who replaces O'Connor."

Picking Roberts For Court's Top Job Raises Stakes (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON — President Bush's swift decision Monday to nominate John Roberts as the replacement for Chief Justice William Rehnquist raises the stakes of Supreme Court confirmation hearings as Congress and the White House struggle to cope with anational crisis.

Roberts, 50, whom Bush had previously tapped to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, got the nod after his mentorRehnquist died Saturday following a battle with thyroid cancer.

Bush made the announcement as a helicopter waited to take him on a second tour of the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast.

If confirmed, Roberts would be the youngest chief justice since 1801. That means he could have decades to influence the court's direction. Some Democrats say that argues for tougher hearings.

“Judge Roberts has a clear obligation to make his views known fully and completely,” said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y.

Roberts, a federal appeals judge, would be the 17th chief justice. Five were promoted from the high court. Eleven came from politics, lower courts and other posts.

Still unresolved: When confirmation hearings should begin. Originally set to start today, they've been postponed until after Rehnquist's funeral Wednesday.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., argued that the nation needs time to cope with the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., pushing for confirmation this month, said hearings will start by next week.

The president said he selected Roberts, a former Rehnquist clerk, because of his “natural gifts as a leader” and to ensure the court has all nine justices when its new session begins Oct. 3. O'Connor has said she will remain until her replacement is confirmed.

The chance for two court appointments gives Bush a historic opportunity, but also increases pressure on him.

Conservatives such as James Dobson of Focus on the Family want a like-minded justice to replace O'Connor, a swing vote on abortion and other issues. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., counters: “Justice O'Connor has been a voice of moderation and reason on the court and should be replaced by someone … like her.”

In a USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll taken before Rehnquist's death, 52% said they favored Roberts' confirmation.

Bush Chooses Roberts, Weighs Other Vacancy (AJC/AP)

By Terence Hunt, Ap White House Correspondent

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 6, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0002791

WASHINGTON — Seizing a historic opportunity to reshape the Supreme Court, President Bush swiftly chose conservative John Roberts as chief justice Monday and weighed how to fill another vacancy that could push the nation's highest court to the right on issues from abortion to affirmative action.

Polished and plainspoken, Roberts had been on a likely track to be confirmed as an associate justice and it appeared Bush turned to him for the top job to avoid an acrimonious fight at a volatile moment. Bush was on the defensive about the administration's sluggish response to Hurricane Katrina and his poll ratings had fallen to their lowest point of his presidency.

"For the past two months members of the United States Senate and the American people have learned about the career and character of Judge Roberts," Bush said. "They like what they see."

Roberts' nomination, just two days after the death of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, raised fears among Democrats about a rightward shift as Bush fills two openings on the nine-member court. Democrats have been frustrated by Roberts' popularity and said the Senate must take a closer look at his new nomination.

"The stakes are higher and the Senate's advice and consent responsibility is even more important," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., expressed concerns about the court's balance.

"Replacing two justices at the same time will have an enormous impact on the court and on the lives and liberties of all Americans for decades," said Ralph Neas, president of the liberal advocacy group People for the American Way, which opposes Roberts' nomination.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said Roberts was "one of the most well qualified candidates to come before the Senate." He said he still expects Roberts to be confirmed before the new court session begins Oct. 3.

Like Rehnquist, Roberts is deeply conservative. He was nominated in July to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who angered conservatives with her tie-breaking votes on contentious issues like abortion restrictions, campaign finance limits, discrimination laws, and religion.

The Roberts-for-Rehnquist nomination would not affect the balance, but Bush could force an ideological shift by replacing O'Connor with a reliably conservative vote. O'Connor has offered to remain on the bench until her successor is named, and Bush called her Monday to say he would move quickly to find her replacement as well. He is not expected to name a new O'Connor successor this week.

After turning twice to Roberts, Bush faces increasing pressure to name a woman or a minority. Some conservatives fretted Bush would pick Attorney General Alberto Gonzales whose views on abortion and other issues have raised their suspicions.

"The president promised in two campaigns to nominate justices who will faithfully uphold the text and principles of the Constitution," said Wendy Long, counsel for the conservative Judicial Confirmation Network. "One would expect the president to nominate more exceptional judicial conservatives like Judge Roberts for as many vacancies as occur, whether it is two, three, or more."

But Brad Berenson, a former Bush White House lawyer, said, "My own view is that Judge Gonzales would be a more conservative justice" than O'Connor.

Other possible replacements include federal courts of appeals judges Edith Clement, Edith Hollan Jones and Emilio Garza. Also mentioned are judges J. Michael Luttig, Samuel A. Alito Jr., James Harvie Wilkinson III and Michael McConnell, and former Solicitor General Theodore Olson, lawyer Miguel Estrada and former deputy attorney general Larry Thompson.

No president has nominated two newcomers to the Supreme Court at the same time since Richard Nixon filled a pair of vacancies in 1971.

The change in Roberts' nomination scrambled plans for his confirmation hearings, which had been scheduled to begin Tuesday. Instead, the capital prepared for the ritual of honoring Rehnquist. His body will lie in repose in the Great Hall of the Supreme Court on Tuesday and Wednesday and he will be buried at Arlington National Cemetery following funeral services Wednesday.

Moving swiftly, Bush met with Roberts in the private residence of the White House for about 35 to 40 minutes on Sunday evening, then officially offered him the job at 7:15 a.m. Monday when Roberts arrived at the Oval Office. The president announced the nomination during morning television shows in a live appearance from the Oval Office.

The president praised Roberts as a man of fairness and integrity, a natural leader. He said the Senate was well along in the process of considering Roberts' qualifications and "they know his record and his fidelity to the law. I am confident that the Senate can complete hearings and confirm him as chief justice within a month."

In brief remarks, Roberts said he was "honored and humbled at the confidence that the president has shown in me. And I am very much aware that if I am confirmed I would succeed a man I deeply respect and admire, a man who has been very kind to me for 25 years."

Only 50 years old, Roberts could be a conservative legal force for decades — as was Rehnquist, who served 33 years on the court, 19 of them as its leader.

There are striking similarities between the two men. Both were first in their class in law school, enjoyed reputations for brilliance and were known as good writers. As a young man, Roberts clerked for Rehnquist and the justice was one of many influences in Roberts' life and legal career.

Roberts' conservative views have been illuminated in thousands of documents from his time as a lawyer in the Reagan administration and the first Bush administration and as a federal appeals court judge. Many of those stands put him at odds with O'Connor and in line with Rehnquist.

The papers showed Roberts' support for prayer in public schools and national identification cards and how he fretted over extended death penalty appeals. He advocated broad power for the White House and disparaged state efforts to combat discrimination against women.

Roberts referred in one memo to the "abortion tragedy" and helped write a legal brief that argued for overturning Roe v. Wade, the landmark 1973 case legalizing abortion.

Getting a new chief justice of Bush's choosing in place quickly avoids the scenario of having liberal Justice John Paul Stevens presiding over court sessions, leading private meetings of the justices and thereby influencing court deliberations. As the court's senior justice, Stevens would take over Rehnquist's administrative duties until a new chief is confirmed.

Roberts Tapped To Lead Court (DMN)

By David Jackson

The Dallas Morning News, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON – Seeking to put an indelible conservative stamp on the Supreme Court, President Bush said Monday he is nominating John Roberts to replace Chief Justice William Rehnquist.

The sudden move, two days after Justice Rehnquist's death, upped the ante in the battle to succeed Sandra Day O'Connor – often the swing vote on the court's most contentious cases.

"Judge Roberts has earned the nation's confidence," Mr. Bush said during a brief Oval Office ceremony, nearly seven weeks after he had tapped the appeals court jurist to replace Justice O'Connor.

Senate Democrats said they would press for the release of more documents from Judge Roberts' past, though analysts said there is a good chance the federal appeals court judge will be confirmed to replace the conservative Rehnquist.

More intense opposition awaits the proposed successor to Justice O'Connor, often the decisive vote in 5-4 court decisions involving abortion rights, affirmative action and church-state relations.

"These are lifetime appointments that we can expect to extend into the lives of our grandchildren and great-grandchildren," said Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., top Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee.

That committee delayed confirmation hearings for Judge Roberts that were set to start today. Members cited the new nomination, as well as Wednesday's funeral for Justice Rehnquist.

Officials said the Roberts hearings would begin later this week or early next.

Given the new opening for the O'Connor seat, Mr. Bush is likely to be under pressure to nominate a Hispanic or a woman. The search could involve such Texans as Attorney General Al Gonzales and federal appeals Judges Priscilla Owen and Edith Jones.

The eventual nominee, and perhaps Judge Roberts, may be more vulnerable to opposition because of Mr. Bush's weakened political state, analysts said, citing the Iraq war and criticism of the federal response to Hurricane Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0002793

"The timing could not be more difficult for the Bush administration," said Kimi Lynn King, associate professor of political science at the University of North Texas.

The question, analysts said, is whether Mr. Bush nominates a second conservative in the mold of Judge Roberts, or goes with a more moderate figure, such as Mr. Gonzales.

While some Democrats said Mr. Bush should make his second pick before a Senate vote on Judge Roberts, the president offered no timetable, saying he would act "in a timely manner."

In reintroducing Judge Roberts, Mr. Bush noted that the Senate has spent weeks reviewing his record and should act before the Supreme Court begins hearing cases again Oct. 3.

If that happens, the court would have a full complement of nine justices. Justice O'Connor reconfirmed in a telephone conversation with Mr. Bush on Monday her earlier stated intention to stay on until her successor is confirmed.

Judge Roberts, who once clerked for Justice Rehnquist, thanked Mr. Bush for giving him a chance to "succeed a man I deeply respect and admire."

It would not be unusual for someone outside the court to become chief justice. Justice Rehnquist was only the third of 16 chiefs to be promoted from associate justice.

The chief justice has no more nominal power than the other eight associates but assigns opinion writing if he or she is in the majority. The chief justice also runs the entire federal court system.

The added responsibilities are among the reasons Senate Democrats cited in calling for release of more Roberts documents.

The administration has resisted requests for papers from Mr. Roberts' years in the solicitor general's office for the first President Bush. They said Mr. Roberts' advice to his client – the government – should remain private just as with any other attorney-client relationship.

Democrats said the government represents the public and it is entitled to know the full range of Judge Roberts' views, especially now that he is in line to become the nation's top judge.

White House press secretary Scott McClellan said the Senate has been provided with "tens of thousands of pages of documents."

"We'll continue to work to make sure the Senate has what they need to move forward in a timely manner," he said.

The papers that have been reviewed came mostly from Judge Roberts' years as a White House lawyer for President Ronald Reagan.

Liberal interest groups zeroed in on what they called Judge Roberts' hostility to affirmative action, his narrow reading of the Voting Rights Act and opposition to a program designed to equalize pay between men and women.

Conservative groups rallied behind Mr. Roberts, saying he opposed "racial quotas" and believed that the "pay equity" plan involved massive government interference in the economy.

Before Justice Rehnquist's death, activists who opposed Judge Roberts said they faced an uphill fight, finding it difficult to build much public opposition.

That may still be the case, some of these activists said, especially because the court essentially would be switching one conservative with another.

The politics are different with the O'Connor vacancy, analysts said, given her pivotal role on the court.

There are other pressures at work as well. After Justice O'Connor announced her retirement plans, first lady Laura Bush had asked her husband to appoint a woman.

Mr. Bush is also known to want to nominate the court's first Hispanic member.

Bush supporters urged quick action on filling all Supreme Court vacancies, while critics advised a go-slow approach – and both cited the horrific impact of Hurricane Katrina.

Urging Senate confirmation for Judge Roberts, the conservative group Progress For America cited "this difficult time when Americans need the third branch of the United States government to function at full force."

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., who expressed "serious concerns" about the Roberts nomination, said, "The president should take this time to unite and heal the country."

Roberts Picked For Chief Justice (WT)

By Bill Sammon

The Washington Times, September 6, 2005

President Bush yesterday upgraded his Supreme Court nomination of Judge John G. Roberts Jr. from associate justice to chief justice and called on the Senate to confirm him before the court reconvenes Oct. 3.

"Judge Roberts has earned the nation's confidence, and I'm pleased to announce that I will nominate him to serve as the 17th chief justice of the Supreme Court," Mr. Bush said in an Oval Office appearance with the nominee.

Judge Roberts, originally tapped to replace retiring Associate Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, is now slated to succeed Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who died Saturday.

Judge Roberts' Senate confirmation hearings have been postponed from today until at least Thursday because of Chief Justice Rehnquist's funeral, set for tomorrow.

"I am honored and humbled by the confidence that the president has shown in me," Judge Roberts said. "And I'm very much aware that if I am confirmed, I would succeed a man I deeply respect and admire, a man who has been very kind to me for 25 years."

Judge Roberts, 50, once served as a clerk for Chief Justice Rehnquist and had been looking forward to serving alongside his old boss.

Democrats said the nomination to a higher post justifies a higher level of scrutiny of Judge Roberts' record. Although more than 60,000 pages of documents have been released, liberals want additional papers that the White House deems privileged.

"John Roberts bears a heavier burden when he comes before the Senate," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat and a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee. "Before the Senate acts on John Roberts' new nomination, we should know even more about his record."

Spokesman Scott McClellan said the White House already has "provided them with an enormous amount of information to be able to move forward on his nomination."

After announcing the nomination, Mr. Bush boarded Air Force One to tour the Gulf Coast hurricane damage. En route, he telephoned Justice O'Connor to tell her Judge Roberts no longer would replace her.

Justice O'Connor, who had not seen Mr. Bush's televised announcement minutes earlier, reaffirmed her willingness to remain on the court until a successor is nominated and confirmed, said White House spokeswoman Dana Perino. Mr. Bush is not expected to nominate another justice until Judge Roberts is confirmed.

By tapping Judge Roberts as chief justice, Mr. Bush passed over justices who have been serving on the court for years, including Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas. That spares the president from yet another potentially rancorous political battle, because Justice Scalia or Justice Thomas would have had to be confirmed by the Judiciary Committee.

The president always has regarded Judge Roberts as a potential chief justice, White House officials said. The two met in the White House for 30 to 45 minutes late Sunday, with White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. participating in the start of the meeting.

At 7:15 a.m. yesterday, Judge Roberts was summoned to the White House, where the president officially offered the job.

After Judge Roberts accepted and before the 8 a.m. announcement, Mr. Card notified Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat; Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican; Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican; Sen. Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the ranking Democrat on the panel; and House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican.

Meanwhile, the White House counsel's office alerted Justice John Paul Stevens, the senior and most liberal justice, who otherwise would serve as acting chief justice. The confirmation of Judge Roberts would mean that he, not Justice Stevens, will run the court and assign the writing of decisions.

Yesterday, the president praised Judge Roberts' "natural gifts as a leader." Mr. Bush also expressed confidence that the judge would be confirmed.

"Twenty-five years ago, John Roberts came to Washington as a clerk to Justice William Rehnquist," Mr. Bush said. "In his boss, the young law clerk found a role model, a professional mentor and a friend for life.

DOJ_NMG_0002795

"I'm certain that Chief Justice Rehnquist was hoping to welcome John Roberts as a colleague, and we're all sorry that day didn't come," he added. "Yet it's fitting that a great chief justice be followed in office by a person who shared his deep reverence for the Constitution."

Several liberal groups, who had voiced discontent with the Roberts choice, were further enraged by the elevation yesterday.

"America can't afford a Supreme Court justice -- let alone a chief justice -- with Roberts' record of eroding the rights of workers and turning back the clock on civil rights," said Eli Pariser, executive director of MoveOn.org Political Action Committee. "There's no mistaking that he's a stealth right-wing candidate."

Conservative-leaning groups also were quick to reiterate their opinion of Judge Roberts and warned against efforts at stalling.

"Opposition to this nomination will be based on nothing but partisan politics, and would be an unfortunate strategy at a time when the Senate ought to be coming together to get things done for the American people," said Brian McCabe, president of Progress for America Inc.

John Roberts Nominated To The Chief Justice Position (KRT)

Knight Ridder, September 6, 2005

Proving that he intends to move swiftly to fill two vacancies on the Supreme Court, President Bush announced Monday that he will nominate John G. Roberts to be Chief Justice, replacing William H. Rehnquist, who died Saturday.

Roberts, already Bush's choice to replace retiring Associate Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, would become the nation's 17th high court leader and would be the first to replace his former boss. Roberts clerked for Rehnquist in the early 1980s; the two have had a close personal and professional relationship ever since.

"I'm certain that Chief Justice Rehnquist was hoping to welcome John Roberts as a colleague, and we're all sorry that day didn't come," Bush said. "Yet it's fitting that a great chief justice be followed in office by a person who shared his deep reverence for the Constitution, his profound respect for the Supreme Court, and his complete devotion to the cause of justice."

Roberts' nomination only partially clears the court's clouded future, as the justices prepare to return to business Oct. 3. His confirmation hearings to succeed O'Connor are scheduled to being Tuesday, but would almost certainly need to be delayed.

Senate Democrats said the chief justice seat is fundamentally different, and more pivotal.

"The stakes are higher and the Senate's Advice and Consent responsibility is even more important," said Sen. Harry Reid (D-Nev.), the minority leader.

"Before the Senate acts on Roberts' new nomination, we should know even more about his record," said Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) "And we should know whom the president intends to nominate as a replacement for Sandra Day O'Connor."

Some Senate Democratic staffers said hearings might not begin until next Monday.

The Senate is expected to need at least three weeks to work through the Judiciary Committee's confirmation process and the full chamber's vote. That would put Roberts in the seat just days before the new court term begins.

Roberts' elevation to chief also re-opens the O'Connor seat. Bush said he would move swiftly to nominate someone else for it. He's expected to face new pressure to replace O'Connor, the court's first female justice, with another woman. He could also nominate his attorney General, Alberto Gonzales, to the seat, making him the first Hispanic to sit on the court.

It's unlikely that Bush could get anyone confirmed for O'Connor's seat before Oct. 3, though, leaving the opening of the next term in flux.

O'Connor's resignation is technically set to take effect only once her successor is confirmed, so she may be expected to return to the bench while confirmation proceedings take place. But that raises further complications: She can't hear cases in October or November and then have her successor vote on them when they're decided in January or later.

O'Connor's continued service could also be compromised by personal concerns. One of the reasons she retired was to care for her ailing husband, who is stricken with Alzheimer's disease.

The Roberts nomination to chief justice unfolds as the nation prepares to pay its final respects to Rehnquist. The former chief justice is scheduled to lie in repose in the Supreme Court's great hall Tuesday and Wednesday. Burial at Arlington National Cemetery will follow a funeral Thursday.

O'Connor's Staying On Might Tie Up The Court (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Justice Sandra Day O'Connor reaffirmed Monday that she would remain on the Supreme Court until her successor is confirmed, but her presence is likely to have more symbolic than practical significance.

That is so because a justice's votes really count only when an opinion is issued, not when the court first hears a case. At first glance, O'Connor would look to be a tie-breaker for cases heard in October or November, before President Bush's nominee to replace her is likely to be confirmed by the Senate.

But the opinions in those cases are not likely to be issued until early next year, after O'Connor presumably would be gone. Therefore, her vote would not count, and the court could find itself evenly split 4-4.

In such instances, the justices can order the case to be reargued before the full nine-member court.

When O'Connor sent a retirement letter to the president on July 1, she closed by saying that her retirement would be "effective upon the nomination and confirmation of my successor." She also said she was leaving to spend more time with her husband.

White House aides said Bush called O'Connor Monday morning to tell her he had named Roberts as chief justice. In that call, she reiterated her pledge to stay on the court until Bush could win confirmation for her replacement.

Senate Democrats also cited O'Connor's presence as a reason for not rushing to choose and confirm a second Bush appointee.

Her presence could prove significant if the Senate were to block Bush's choice for her replacement. But if the president's nominees win confirmation by December, she is not likely to cast decisive votes.

On Oct. 5, two days after the court's term begins, the justices are scheduled to hear a major test of the nation's only right-to-die law. Oregon permits doctors to prescribe lethal medication to individuals who are terminally ill and wish to hasten their deaths.

The Bush administration has sought to nullify the law by threatening doctors with a loss of their right to prescribe medication. They rely on federal drug control laws and argue that prescribing lethal medication is not a legitimate medical use of these drugs.

Oregon's officials and two lower courts have said that the state has the power to regulate the practice of medicine.

The White House says it would like to have Roberts confirmed as chief justice by the time the court convenes and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said Monday that he expected to have a confirmation vote before the full Senate by late September. There is little chance, however, that a successor to O'Connor would also be confirmed by the court's opening day.

Two days after the argument in the Oregon case, the justices will meet behind closed doors to vote. If the court splits 5-4 with O'Connor in the majority, her vote would look to be decisive. But since the justices typically work months on their majority and dissenting opinions, the ruling probably would not be announced until early next year, after O'Connor's replacement is confirmed. In such a case, the court would be split 4-4, and it would have to reargue the case to include the new justice.

A Shaky Ethics Charge (WP)

By Ronald D. Rotunda

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

Does John Roberts have an ethics problem?

Three ethics professors argue that Roberts, whom President Bush has just nominated to be chief justice, should have disqualified himself from a case he helped decide earlier this year while serving as a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit.

The case, Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, which concerns a key issue in the administration's war on terrorism, may be headed for the Supreme Court, and at the time of the appeals court ruling, Roberts was being considered for a vacancy on the high court, though it did not yet exist.

DOJ_NMG_0002797

The three professors -- Stephen Gillers of New York University, David J. Luban of Georgetown University and Steven Lubet of Northwestern University -- say that in not disqualifying himself, Roberts violated the "appearance of impartiality." If true, it may become a prominent issue because it offers one of the few arguments against Roberts. In the case at issue, the appeals court upheld the constitutionality of the administration's plan to use military commissions to try terrorist suspects.

Just a short time ago, Gillers said that he "saw no problem" with the fact that Bush met with Roberts about the Supreme Court vacancy on July 15, the same day the appeals court ruled 3 to 0 in Bush's favor in Hamdan. But Gillers said he changed his mind after Roberts disclosed the White House interviews in his Senate questionnaire. What seems to be crucial is that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales spoke to Roberts on April 1, six days before oral arguments in the Hamdan case.

Gillers and his colleagues conclude that Roberts violated a federal statute that requires what Gillers calls "an appearance of impartiality." The federal statute doesn't put it that way; it says that the judge should recuse himself if his "impartiality might reasonably be questioned." The case law says the issue should be considered from the perspective of a reasonable, objective lawyer fully informed of the facts.

The American Bar Association says the "appearance of impartiality" standard is "question-begging" and leads to "ad hominem attacks."

We sometimes think, loosely, that ethics are good and that more is better than less. But "more" is not better if it exacts higher costs, measured in vague rules that impose unnecessary disqualifications.

Gillers's main source is Scott v. United States , a 1989 case in which a criminal trial judge in the District was discussing a managerial position with the Justice Department while the U.S. attorney's office was prosecuting a criminal case before the judge. Gillers says the judge acted improperly by presiding at the trial during his employment negotiations.

The problem with Gillers's reliance on the Scott case is that he leaves out what the case really said: "By December 23, 1984, when he had decided to accept the position in the Executive Office for United States Attorneys, the judge had a duty to recuse himself from Scott's case."

The Scott case does not support Gillers's argument; it undermines it. What Scott says, at most, is that Roberts had no obligation to withdraw from a case in which the government is a party before he was offered and decided to accept the position. That date could not be before the vacancy existed; in fact, it could not be before July 15, when he met Bush for the first time. By that time, the Hamdan case had already been decided.

Judges are offered other jobs all the time. A Supreme Court justice may become chief justice, or, like Justice Arthur Goldberg, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations. Appeals court judges may become Cabinet officers. Trial judges may become appellate judges. Gillers's stance would require judges to recuse themselves in any case in which the federal government is a party.

Gillers's response is that the Hamdan case was "hotly contested." I have never found any case to be "coldly contested," or even "warmly contested."

Do we really want to give the president or attorney general the power to force recusal of one or more judges on a panel simply by asking the judge if he might be interested in a different position that is not yet open but that eventually will be ? Should Judge (later Justice) Ruth Bader Ginsburg have recused herself from any case involving the federal government from the time that Justice Byron White announced his resignation until the time President Bill Clinton announced her appointment? What of Judge (later Justice) Stephen Breyer, who was not nominated until a year after his initial interview with Clinton?

The president is not the only person responsible for court appointments. In many states, judicial selection committees present choices to the president. The case law (which Gillers does not cite) has uniformly rejected motions for disqualifying judges from cases in which members of the selection committees are directly involved.

Conflict-of-interest charges should not be raised lightly, and historical precedents and case law show the allegations against Roberts are unfounded.

The writer is a law professor at George Mason University; he rejoined the faculty in June after working at the Defense Department and was not assigned to the Hamdan case. This article is based on an ethics opinion he wrote at the request of Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.).

The Rehnquist-Roberts Court (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

With his nomination yesterday of John Roberts to be Chief Justice of the United States, President Bush moved to fulfill the Supreme Court legacy of the late William Rehnquist, and also took what we hope is the first step toward guaranteeing his own.

Elevating Judge Roberts to Chief was a logical decision, both politically and on the merits. The Senate and media have been investigating the nominee since July, and have found superlatives with nary a negative. The Judge is in a position to be rapidly confirmed and ready to preside by the time the High Court begins its new term on October 3.

More importantly, what we have learned about Judge Roberts suggests that he shares Chief Justice Rehnquist's judicial philosophy. If Mr. Bush now follows with the nomination of an equally distinguished conservative for the Court's second opening, the Roberts Court will be able to continue the legal restoration that the late Chief Rehnquist began but was never able to finish.

That historic mission is to restore the Court to its proper Constitutional role as a judicial arbiter rather than as an engine of liberal policy-making. Judicial activism was in its heyday in 1972, the year Justice Rehnquist arrived at the Court. In his early years, he earned the nickname the "Lone Ranger" because he was often the only dissenter on the nine-member Court. But after he became Chief in 1986, and with the help of other Reagan appointees, he began to move the Court back toward the center.

He made some progress, notably on limiting federal power over state governments (Lopez in 1995); church-state relations, especially with the 5-4 Zelman decision in 2002 that found private-school vouchers constitutional; racial preferences (Richmond v. Croson, 1989); and property rights (Nollan in 1987). It's a tribute to Mr. Rehnquist's principles that he also upheld liberal precedents if they had become embedded in common practice, such as the Miranda warnings (Dickerson v. U.S., 2000) that he had once opposed as policy. Modern liberals never display such deference to precedent when their policy preferences are at risk.

But the Chief was denied a genuine intellectual majority by the protean quality of some of his colleagues. Justices Anthony Kennedy and Sandra Day O'Connor tapered their views to the Beltway winds, while David Souter repudiated his confirmation testimony and joined the Court's liberal wing. When Bill Clinton replaced Byron White (Justice Rehnquist's partner in dissent on Roe v. Wade in 1973) with Ruth Bader Ginsburg in 1993, most conservative momentum stalled.

The judicial left understands these stakes, which is why they are now ratcheting up their rhetoric against Judge Roberts. People for the American Way yesterday called him "unfit" to be Chief, which is the ultimate compliment. They're afraid he's every bit as smart as he seems. Mr. Roberts will be confirmed in any case, but the real game here is to intimidate Mr. Bush into naming a less conservative nominee for the second opening.

All the more so now that Mr. Bush is on the defensive in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. With a war in Iraq and down in the polls, Mr. Bush will hear from some of his own advisers that he should play it "safe" with his second choice. They'll suggest he avoid another "divisive" battle by selecting someone who will win the acquiescence of Democrats Ted Kennedy or Chuck Schumer.

We hope he rejects such counsel. With two vacancies, Mr. Bush now has a genuine chance to remake the Court. He told voters during two election campaigns that he'd nominate Justices in the mold of Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas. Especially with his other troubles, Mr. Bush can't afford to alienate his most loyal supporters in the hope of buying a confirmation truce.

A battle with Senate liberals over a distinguished conservative nominee would probably even help Mr. Bush politically. While the activist left is howling about Judge Roberts, Red State Democrats have kept a studious silence. They know that the "values" issues that so motivate the political left -- abortion, gay marriage, racial preferences -- are far less popular in Nebraska, North Dakota or Florida.

Democrats from these states will need an excuse beyond ideology to oppose a qualified nominee. And Mr. Bush has many such candidates to choose from: J. Harvie Wilkinson, Edith Jones, Ted Olson, Michael Luttig, Sam Alito, Larry Thompson, Michael McConnell or Janice Rogers Brown. The political trap for Mr. Bush would be to choose someone who is less distinguished but is somehow thought to be easier to confirm. The President should be thinking about his Supreme Court legacy for the next 30 years, not the next 30 days.

John Roberts's Rapid Ascension (NYT)

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

President Bush surprised many with his swift decision to nominate Judge John Roberts Jr. to be the next chief justice of the United States. If Mr. Bush thought Mr. Roberts had already impressed both the public and the Senate with his intelligence and sincerity, he figured correctly. But if he regards the judge as a known commodity whose confirmation should be a shoo-in, he is wrong. The Senate did not have enough information to make an informed judgment about Mr. Roberts when he was the nominee for just one of the nine seats on the court. Now it simply becomes more important than ever that he be questioned thoroughly about his views.

Besides his long and stellar résumé, Mr. Roberts, who was appointed to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit less than two and a half years ago, has an extremely short and thin record of actual decisions. Those two attributes may be equally desirable for a Supreme Court nominee these days. The résumé attests to his right to be considered, and the lack of a real judicial record makes it hard for potential critics to guess how he might rule on controversial issues.

Like the president, this page worries about activist judges who might use the Constitution as a cloak for their desires to remake society in the mold of their own political preferences. Unlike Mr. Bush, we believe the record now shows that most of those jurists are conservatives, who strike down laws that do not fit their political philosophies or their extremely narrow view of governmental power.

The Senate has a duty to find out whether Judge Roberts has that kind of mind-set. There are troubling hints that he may. If the coming confirmation hearings were important before, they now become crucial. The chief justice is in many ways positioned to have more long-term influence over the nation than any other person. Given a lifetime appointment, Mr. Roberts, 50, could lead the court through the administrations of a half-dozen presidents.

The Bush administration could make the Senate's job easier by handing over all the documents Mr. Roberts prepared when he worked for the administrations of Ronald Reagan and George H. W. Bush. And when Judge Roberts is questioned at his confirmation hearing, he should speak candidly and at some length about his views on important legal issues and precedents. The president could also help by giving the country a fuller idea of how he intends to shape the court. Some Democrats have urged that he make his second nomination, for the seat occupied by Sandra Day O'Connor, before the Senate takes up Judge Roberts's nomination. That seems reasonable. Chief Justice William Rehnquist, who died on Saturday, was a very conservative jurist, and from what we know about Judge Roberts, it is clear that President Bush has nominated a very conservative man to take his place. It is also important to know the president's plans for filling the seat held by the more moderate Justice O'Connor.

A Nominee For Chief (WP)

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

President Bush lost no time in naming a successor for Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist. If confirmed, Judge John G. Roberts Jr. will bring the same virtues to the job of heading the country's judiciary as he would have brought to the job of associate justice. A highly regarded former appellate lawyer and current appeals court judge, he is a modest, smart lawyer who, unlike some of the president's judicial picks, is generally well regarded across party lines. Mr. Bush deserves credit for acting with dispatch. The Senate should do so as well and, giving a full airing to the issues, should make a point of voting on the nomination before the court reconvenes in October.

In most respects, the change in position ought to signify little in terms of how senators regard Judge Roberts. The difference between the chief justice and the other members of the court, after all, is largely administrative, not substantive; all justices have only one vote. Judge Roberts is, to be sure, on the young side for the job of chief. At 50, he will have, if confirmed, the odd distinction of being the youngest member of the court he heads. On the other hand, his easy manner and collegiality ought to serve him well.

Yet his nomination as chief justice nonetheless raises the stakes in the discussion of what Judge Roberts actually believes -- a subject about which a great deal more has been said than is really known. Liberal groups that feared what a Justice Roberts might do can only fear a Chief Justice Roberts all the more. The hearings will provide an excellent opportunity for the Senate Judiciary Committee to explore -- and for Judge Roberts to address -- a raft of important questions: What is his attitude toward what is called stare decisis , the doctrine of generally letting past cases stand even if wrongly decided? How does he regard the balance of power between the federal government and the states, an ongoing debate in which a new justice could play a dramatic role, either constructive or unfortunate. What does he believe about privacy rights?

Documents from Judge Roberts's service in the Reagan administration -- in the Justice Department and in the White House counsel's office -- have raised fears that he might harbor reactionary views on a range of civil rights questions. Some of this is overblown; opponents have tried to make controversy out of reasonable positions Mr. Roberts took against policies few still advocate today. On the other hand, Judge Roberts opposed changes to the Voting Rights Act that had broad bipartisan support, as well as affirmative action programs and the proposed Equal Rights Amendment. He seemed deeply suspicious of federal review of state convictions. He seems to have objected to decades of Supreme Court rulings restricting the role of religion in public life. Judge Roberts was quite young when these memorandums were drafted, and his views may have evolved as he matured. Which part of this record as a young lawyer does he stand behind now, and which part does he not? All of these questions take on a greater sense of importance -- at least symbolically -- with Judge Roberts now nominated to be chief.

In one critical respect, however, moving Judge Roberts to the chief's slot may actually reduce his impact on the court's ideological balance. Chief Justice Rehnquist, unlike Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, was not often a swing vote on the court. In replacing him, Judge Roberts will be very unlikely to move the court substantially to the right. He would not have to prove all that surprising to move it to the left on certain issues.

This fact, in turn, puts a heavy premium on Mr. Bush's choice regarding a new replacement for Justice O'Connor -- whose decision to stay on the court until a nominee garners confirmation is proving invaluable at a delicate transitional moment. Before nominating Judge Roberts, Mr. Bush consulted widely and emerged with a candidate Senate Democrats have -- by and large, anyway -- treated with respect. As he once again considers a nominee to replace Justice O'Connor, Mr. Bush would do a public service by consulting widely and meaningfully.

How Would Roberts, As Chief Justice, Affect You? (USAT)

USA Today, September 6, 2005

By all accounts, John Roberts is the kind of guy you might want your daughter to bring home for dinner: brilliant, personable , possibly destined for greatness. Even the sternest father — if he's not too liberal — would probably grant nodding approval, as the Senate is likely to do in the next few weeks, seating Roberts on the Supreme Court.

The positive reaction to Roberts since President Bush first nominated him to the court in July undoubtedly contributed to Bush's decision to choose him Monday to succeed William H. Rehnquist, who died Saturday after nearly 19 years as chief justice.

But as impressive as Roberts has appeared, the most important question about him remains largely unanswered: How would a Chief Justice Roberts affect the country? As the youngest chief justice since 1801, Roberts, 50, would be a potent influence on society for a generation or more.

Would he, for instance, vote to reverse existing law on abortion or, more sweepingly, the right to privacy? His record suggests he might. Would he limit Congress' ability to protect the environment, public health and civil rights? That, too, is open to question.

The Senate Judiciary Committee will plumb for answers in hearings that may begin as early as Thursday, and it needn't linger long on basics. Roberts easily surpasses the threshold qualifications for justices.

By all accounts, he is a brilliant lawyer with a forceful intellect suited to the court. The American Bar Association calls him "well qualified."

Politically, he's conservative but not an outspoken ideologue, with little history of brash pronouncements. But which of the several sharply opposed conservative camps he falls into is in doubt, and the difference stands to affect every American.

Roberts' public record — inconclusive but provocative — raises questions whether he prefers limited government and cautious change, or whether he is an activist who would seek to overturn important Supreme Court precedents and legal protections:

DOJ_NMG_0002801

Right to privacy. In memos written when he was in the Reagan administration, he disparaged the notion that there is a constitutional right to privacy. He wrote approvingly of the dissent in the landmark 1965 case that firmly established that right and overturned state laws against birth control. Reversing that decision would reopen the door to government meddling in the most private aspects of life, again criminalizing abortion, gay sex, even contraception.

Abortion. As deputy solicitor general for the first President Bush, he signed a government brief urging reversal of Roe v. Wade, the 1973 decision that state laws banning abortion were unconstitutional. The court has since reaffirmed that decision.

Civil rights. Roberts argued for standards that would make it easier for school districts to evade desegregation orders. He also disparaged affirmative action — still sanctioned by the court in some circumstances — as "recruiting of inadequately prepared candidates" and argued that it is unconstitutional. That record raises questions about whether he would restrain the ability of Congress to help those victimized by discrimination.

Powers of Congress. Roberts parted company with the majority of conservative judges on his appeals court two years ago to take a swipe at the constitutional basis of the Endangered Species Act. The narrower interpretation he seemed to suggest could also limit the reach of federal laws regulating health, safety, civil rights, commerce and the workplace.

Freedom of speech. He argued that a federal law prohibiting flag burning did not violate the First Amendment, even after the Supreme Court had already declared a nearly identical state law unconstitutional.

Freedom of the press. Roberts wrote a memo challenging the 1964 Supreme Court decision New YorkTimes v. Sullivan, a cornerstone of the freedom to report aggressively on public officials. He suggested reverting to an earlier standard that gave officeholders greater ability to prevail in libel suits.

Church-state entanglement. He argued for lowering the wall between church and state and allowing officially led prayers at public school graduations. He criticized the Supreme Court's decision in another school prayer case as "indefensible."

Women's rights. Roberts ridiculed the notion that women are subject to workplace discrimination or entitled to constitutional protection. He also argued for narrowing the government's ability to enforce the ban on gender discrimination in education.

Roberts' defenders point out that most of his statements challenging the legal status quo were made while representing either the interests of a private client or the political commitments of an earlier administration. They might not represent his personal views — and many are more than 20 years old.

Both assertions are accurate. Less defensible is that the Bush administration has spurned Senate requests for records later in Roberts career. Senate questioning will have to fill in those blanks.

Much will be made at the hearings of the doctrine that Roberts should not be asked to say how he might rule in cases coming before the Supreme Court. But that should not deter senators from demanding to know how he views issues more generally and cases already decided — and the standards he would use to overturn settled law.

To suggest that the Senate should simply ignore the impact Roberts would have on constituents is to suggest that it stick its collective head in the sand.

The Next Chief Justice (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 6, 2005

Maybe if there had been no Katrina, and if the Iraqi occupation were proceeding as Pentagon optimists had once envisioned — with the few thousand remaining U.S. troops in the country lolling about in the dozens of Starbucks cafes popping up across Mesopotamia by now — President Bush would have tried elevating Antonin Scalia or Clarence Thomas to serve as the chief justice of the United States. But under present conditions, Bush doesn't need any more trouble than he already has. And so, in the wake of William H. Rehnquist's death, the president has wisely nominated John G. Roberts Jr., a former Rehnquist law clerk, to become the next chief justice.

It's a smart move. Roberts has the intellect and temperament to lead the court and the federal judiciary. It's somewhat counterintuitive that newcomers to the court usually become the chief — Rehnquist was an exception — but that tends to preserve good relations among the nine justices. The elevation of either Scalia or Thomas would have proven highly contentious and divisive in Washington, and maybe even on the court.

The Senate confirmation hearings for Roberts' nomination to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor had been slated to commence today, but there will now be a short delay to honor Rehnquist. But there is no reason for the Senate to avoid taking action well in advance of the Supreme Court's new term on Oct. 3. The suggestion by some Democratic senators that they will need more time to review Roberts' credentials now that he is in line to be chief justice rings hollow. Yes, the chief justice wields a great deal of subtle power by virtue of his authority to control arguments and assign the writing of opinions, but it's not as if anyone was taking the confirmation of an associate justice lightly.

In their questioning of Roberts, senators should focus special attention on his views on the proper deference that courts owe the executive branch in a time of war. Roberts was on a panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia that ruled in July that the Bush administration has virtually unchecked power to try anyone it labels an "unlawful combatant" before a military commission that does not live up to the standards of the Geneva Convention. The extent of presidential power in the war on terror is likely to loom large in the Supreme Court docket for years, and it's a subject that Roberts, a former White House lawyer, should be asked to address in his hearings.

Meanwhile, the president faces a second opening on the court, although O'Connor could still be on the bench on Oct. 3 if her replacement hasn't been confirmed. Many of the candidates reportedly being considered earlier by the White House are radical conservatives who could trigger the kind of opposition we haven't seen to Roberts. Then there is the president's friend and attorney general, Alberto Gonzales, who is not trusted by social conservatives and should be disqualified, in any case, for encouraging the administration to disregard international law in conducting the war on terror.

So, mindful of Bush's other headaches, from Katrina to Iraq, he'd be well served by making another sensible move (is there a surprise candidate up his sleeve?) in replacing O'Connor.

William Rehnquist (WSJ)

By Randy E. Barnett

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

Last December, during my oral argument in the medical marijuana case of Gonzales v. Raich, the center chair normally occupied by Chief Justice William Rehnquist was empty. Without the towering, and sometimes glowering, visage of the Chief, with his no-nonsense demeanor and questioning, there was a palpable void in the courtroom that day. Now, with his passing, there is a void in the Supreme Court itself. Today we mourn the death of William Rehnquist. One day soon we may mourn the death of his legacy -- the jurisprudence of the Rehnquist Court.

Even before becoming chief justice, often in lonely dissents, it was William Rehnquist who was most personally responsible for what is now called "the New Federalism" -- the revival of the ideas that judiciary should protect the role of the states within the federal system and enforce the textual limits on the powers of Congress. Establishing the New Federalism took enormous effort and leadership by Rehnquist over many years. Now that legacy is in jeopardy.

At the founding, and for some 150 years thereafter, the limits on congressional power provided by the Constitution of 1789 -- as modified by the Fourteenth Amendment -- were enforced by the Supreme Court. According to the textual plan, Congress is, with few exceptions, confined to the express powers enumerated in Article One of the Constitution. While these express powers were understood as flexible, they were nonetheless limited. When the federal government was limited to its enumerated powers, the states were left to the exercise of their police powers, subject to the limitations imposed upon them after the Civil War by the Fourteenth Amendment.

The Founders' plan was more or less intact until the 1930s, when President Roosevelt and the New Deal Congress enacted a massive expansion of federal power. By the 1940s, the textual scheme of limited federal powers was effectively swept away by a Supreme Court dominated by appointees of President Roosevelt. In a series of landmark decisions, such as Wickard v. Filburn in 1942, the New Deal Court replaced the Constitution's textual scheme of limited federal power with a policy of judicial deference to any claim by Congress to regulate anything and everything with even a remote connection with the national economy.

By the early 1990s, even the requirement of a remote connection was giving way, as Congress began to regulate subjects that could only be described as "interstate commerce" by Lewis Carroll's Humpty Dumpty, who asserted (in a rather scornful tone) that: "When I use a word, it means just what I choose it to mean -- neither more nor less." With no judiciary to provide a constitutional compass, Congress passed laws reaching activities such as possessing a gun near a school without even trying to show how the regulated activity had any conceivable connection with "commerce . . . among the several states."

But William Rehnquist had a constitutional compass. In the beginning, he took what he could get. As an associate justice, his opening strategy for nudging the Court back onto the constitutional path was to carve out of federal power exemptions for state discretion. His first major triumph came in the 1976 case of National League of Cities v. Usery, which established a limit on the powers of Congress to interfere with such "traditional governmental functions" as fire prevention, police protection, sanitation, public health, and parks and recreation. Writing for the Court, then-Justice Rehnquist announced that, "This Court has never doubted that there are limits upon the power of Congress to override state sovereignty, even when exercising its otherwise plenary powers to tax or to regulate commerce which are conferred by Art. I of the Constitution." This sort of reliance upon first principles to draw an outer limit to federal power became his trademark.

Rehnquist's initial victory, however, was short-lived. Notwithstanding the precedent of National League, in 1985 the Burger Court reversed itself in Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority. In Garcia, the Court announced that the protection of the states would, once again, solely be a political rather than also a judicial question. In a terse four-sentence opinion, Rehnquist presciently predicted, "I do not think it incumbent on those of us in dissent to spell out further the fine points of a principle that will, I am confident, in time again command the support of a majority of this Court."

With Justice Rehnquist's ascension to chief justice, the Rehnquist Court cabined Garcia's laissez-faire approach toward Congressional power with a series of "Tenth Amendment" cases that aimed at protecting state sovereignty from federal interference in a variety of ways. I put Tenth Amendment in quotes because this jurisprudence was never grounded on the original meaning of the Tenth Amendment, which merely affirms that the Federal government is one of delegated powers, and that all powers not delegated are reserved to the states or to the people. With the post-New Deal judiciary interpreting the delegated powers so as to allow the Federal government to do virtually anything it wants, federal power had completely enveloped any "reserved" powers of states. Instead of directly holding Congress to the powers enumerated in the text, these earliest New Federalism cases attempted indirectly to preserve the underlying "principle" of federalism by carving out islands of state sovereignty in a sea of federal power.

Chief Justice Rehnquist understood this, of course. In 1995, he launched a direct attack on the source of the problem in the case of U.S. v. Lopez, which held unconstitutional the Gun Free School Zone Act because it exceeded the power of Congress to "regulate commerce . . . among the several states." There he wrote, "We start with first principles. The Constitution creates a Federal Government of enumerated powers." For the first time in 60 years, the Court found a federal statute to have exceeded the commerce power of Congress. Rehnquist's opinion in Lopez sent shock waves through the legal academy.

Few thought the Rehnquist Court was serious, however, until 2000, when, in U.S. v. Morrison, it struck down a portion of the Violence Against Women Act that created a federal civil cause of action for "gender motivated violence." Once again, the chief justice affirmed that: "The Constitution requires a distinction between what is truly national and what is truly local. . . . In recognizing this fact we preserve one of the few principles that has been consistent since the [Commerce] Clause was adopted."

Together with the Tenth Amendment cases, Rehnquist's opinions in Lopez and Morrison were the keystones of the New Federalism. Had he been able to marshal a consistent majority for the constitutional "first principles" these cases represented, the Rehnquist Court might have overseen a constitutional restoration as substantial as the constitutional demolition begun by the Roosevelt Court. But both decisions were 5-4, with the five more "conservative" justices in the majority and the four more "liberal" justices in strong dissent. The four adamant dissenters have not relented in their opposition and need only pick off one of the New Federalists to uphold the constitutionality of a claim of federal power.

Perhaps because his illness prevented him from providing his strong personal leadership, in this the final year of the Rehnquist Court there are signs that his legacy may not endure. In Gonzales v. Raich both principles of state sovereignty and of enumerated powers were put to the test. Rehnquist was one of only three justices who were willing to say that Congress cannot magically transform the noncommercial possession of homegrown marijuana into "interstate commerce." The Chief joined the dissenting opinion written by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Many who now lionize her when discussing her replacement omit mentioning her stalwart support of the New Federalism so strongly advanced by her fellow Arizonian and Stanford classmate.

Sometime this fall, two of the five votes that made up the Lopez and Morrison majorities will have been replaced. Only Justice Clarence Thomas will be left from the three Raich dissenters. As the new chief justice (assuming he is confirmed), will John Roberts assume the role of his mentor William Rehnquist -- for whom he clerked -- and lead the Roberts Court to enforce the Constitution's original plan of limited federal power? Will President Bush now look for a nominee to replace Justice O'Connor who is as committed to the New Federalism as she was? Given that so many of the New Federalism cases were 5-4, if either of the new justices adopts the mantra of "judicial deference" to congressional power, then Chief Justice Rehnquist's death, along with Justice O'Connor's retirement, may presage the second death of federalism. A judicial withdrawal from enforcing the original limits on the powers of Congress would undo the New Federalist legacy of William Rehnquist.

As the president now decides who next to nominate, he would uphold the Constitution by selecting a person with a firm and demonstrated commitment to the Rehnquist Court's New Federalism legacy. Only such a choice would continue the movement to restore the "first principles" of constitutionally limited government that William Rehnquist affirmed so eloquently. One can hardly imagine a sadder end to the tenure of William Rehnquist than that his most prized and important contribution to constitutional law is aborted by a conservative Republican president and a Republican-controlled Senate.

Gentleman Of The Court (NYT)

By Laurence H. Tribe

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

Cambridge, Mass.

In October 1971, the White House tapped Assistant Attorney General William H. Rehnquist to respond to my critique of someone at the top of its short list for one of the two vacancies created by the nearly simultaneous resignations of two justices. I found his tepid apologia underwhelming. Yet within two months, when Mr. Rehnquist took the Supreme Court seat once marked for the target of my critique, I began to see how foolish it would have been to measure him by his defense of a candidate about whom he probably felt lukewarm. While it may be too soon to assess the chief justice's enduring impact, it is not too soon to reflect on why so many who served with him as colleagues, worked for him as law clerks or appeared before him as advocates are already prepared to render a verdict of greatness and to tell the world how deeply his passing is mourned.

Seeing past the chief justice's sometimes abrupt manner in oral argument was eased for me by his willingness to engage me, then an unknown law professor in his mid-30's, in a public debate in 1978 on the role of an active judiciary in a pluralistic democracy, moderated by the legendary Judge Henry Friendly. Charmed by his disarming informality and candor during the debate and at the private dinner that followed, my wife and I emerged with fond feelings toward a man whose warmth and humor within the court were not always evident to strangers.

When I began arguing regularly before the Supreme Court two years later, I felt from the start that I was conversing with a brilliant colleague who always got right to the point. In more than 30 oral arguments over the past 25 years, I never saw him ask questions, as his colleagues sometimes do, to hide the ball, parade his brilliance, show up a colleague, or play to the galleries. When he thought you were approaching a dead end, he told you so, as he did in 1997, when he said I wouldn't "find much disposition on the court to enlarge on" a precedent on which one of my arguments rested. Taking the hint, I shifted to the other pillar on which my case stood (and won the case).

Chief Justice Rehnquist was attentive to legal doctrine but impatient with legalisms that ignored reality. His strong pragmatic streak, differentiating him from those on his right, was manifest. In a case about asbestos litigation that I argued in 1998, the legal issue was the propriety of certifying a particular lawsuit to proceed as a class action, but he insisted on knowing how well those allegedly injured would "fare if they just keep fighting their individual lawsuits," especially if the companies they sue "end up in bankruptcy." Had I not been reminded to paint that larger picture, the case might have come out differently.

That Chief Justice Rehnquist was unlike both puritanical conservatives like Warren E. Burger and movement conservatives like Antonin Scalia was evident in the character of his questions in the two gay rights cases I argued in the mid-1980's, one about firing teachers for "advocating" homosexual activity and the other about prosecuting consenting adults for same-sex intimacy. In neither case did his questions have the "I'm shocked" tenor of Chief Justice Burger's contribution to the dialogue. Justice Rehnquist simply pressed me appropriately on the absence of evidence that the challenged school board regulation had "ever been applied to a single living soul." And when I argued that consenting adults have a fundamental right to engage privately in the sex acts of their choice, while Chief Justice Burger and Justice Byron R. White could barely contain their disgust, Justice Rehnquist calmly pursued the question of just when and how that "fundamental right" arose.

A dry and gentle wit was among the chief justice's greatest strengths. In a 1991 abortion financing gag order case, I tried to lighten things up by responding, when the chief justice suggested that a State Department press secretary has to toe the government's line, that "some of them don't seem to realize that." Chief Justice Rehnquist let me enjoy the laughter before topping me with a deadpan, "Well, some of them may not realize it, but I think they'll soon learn." In the two cases I argued in which Chief Justice Rehnquist penned a dissent (a freedom of speech case in 1980 and a church-state separation case in 1982), his deliberately playful solo opinions were written with so light a touch that I enjoyed reading them far more than I did the sober 8-to-1 opinions in my favor.

Chief Justice Rehnquist's goal of weakening the checks on presidential power happily met decisive opposition within the court, although I worry that the seeds he planted to that end might yet bear dangerous fruit. No pleasure in argument could overcome my sadness at the Supreme Court's performance in the 2000 election, or my disappointment at how far the chief justice succeeded in his goals of lowering the wall of separation between church and state, shrinking Congress's power and reducing the protections accorded the mostly poor people of color who are suspected or accused of crime.

RECENT events might change the direction of the winds that moved America toward the point Justice Rehnquist comfortably occupied from his earliest days on the court. How the new court will tack with or against those winds will be Topic A at the forthcoming confirmation hearings, as it should be. But Topic B had better be the ability of the new justices to help the court earn the respect of all who take part in its proceedings or are affected by its rulings - which means everybody. Chief Justice Rehnquist was a master at that mission. For that, and for the steadiness of his leadership, I will always remember him with profound gratitude and admiration.

Social Security Waits For Action By Divided GOP (WT)

By Amy Fagan, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 5, 2005

House Republican leaders, who weeks ago pledged to take the lead on Social Security, still say they will act this fall, but the party remains divided, as some of their members push for a personal accounts bill, some want a broader package and others don't want to act at all.

"We hope to put a bill together," said House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, describing a likely retirement security package that includes personal accounts.

The Texas Republican, however, said he can't guarantee a floor vote until the Ways and Means Committee approves the bill. His statements were more forceful several weeks ago, when he and other leaders pledged action.

House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas, California Republican, has insisted on his broad retirement package, which emphasizes pension reform and private savings.

It is expected to include a Social Security proposal, introduced by Republican Reps. Jim McCrery of Louisiana and E. Clay Shaw Jr. of Florida, that would use the system's surplus to create voluntary private accounts.

Some Republicans and outside advocates would like a vote on the McCrery-Shaw bill by itself, and a few last week said House leaders have decided unofficially to do that.

"From my conversations, they agree this is the best strategy," said Larry Hunter of the Free Enterprise Fund, arguing that such a tactic would pressure the Senate and give House Republicans a concrete and popular proposal to take to constituents.

But Mr. DeLay said Friday: "If it's done, it will be done as part of the retirement security package."

DOJ_NMG_0002806

Supporters of the accounts proposal say Republicans remain divided.

"You still have a lot of members in the House that don't want to pass anything only to have the Senate sit on it," said Rep. Jack Kingston of Georgia, one of the few Republicans to address the issue during the August recess. "You have others who want a vote so they can vote yes, and then blame it on the Senate."

Mr. Shaw said his constituents liked his proposal once he explained it, and that Republicans will decide whether to proceed in the next few weeks, perhaps after a vote behind closed doors.

"We need to take the temperature of the conference," he said.

After talking with Mr. Thomas in July, Mr. DeLay said he expected a Social Security bill ready in late September or October. But members, aides and advocates noted that Social Security action likely will wait so that Congress can deal with relief to survivors of Hurricane Katrina, appropriations, budget reconciliation and immigration.

Opponents of private accounts feel confident.

"We come into the fall in a position of strength. The public has overwhelmingly rejected ... private accounts," said Brad Woodhouse, spokesman for Americans United to Protect Social Security.

"There are a large number of Republicans who want this cup to pass from their lips, and yet the House Republican leadership seems to be convincing itself that this is an easy vote," said Roger Hickey, co-director of Campaign for America's Future.

Where The Rumsfelds Retreat, The Cheneys Soon Could Follow (WP)

By Dan Morse, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 5, 2005

ST. MICHAELS, Md. -- They've grown used to having a secretary of defense in their midst -- the way his weekend estate is tucked behind a bend in the road, how he takes casual walks tailed by dark SUVs. Now, residents of this Eastern Shore retreat are preparing for someone even bigger to buy a house down the road: the vice president.

"I'd heard it was going to close either Tuesday or Wednesday of this week," Carroll Hurley, a funeral home owner, said Saturday, seated with his breakfast gang at the Carpenter Street saloon and restaurant.

Whether it's true -- that Dick and Lynne Cheney are buying an estate here -- could not be confirmed. Those closest to the deal -- Cheney's office, the purported sellers, the listing agent -- aren't talking. Hurley admits he's not certain: "All I have is hearsay. It wouldn't stand up in court."

Still, a nosy visit here leaves a person with one of two possibilities: Either the Cheneys are coming or a lot of people have bad information. Police Chief Ed Henry -- who breakfasted along with Hurley -- even referred to the lot in question as "Cheney's house."

The house, listed at $2.9 million, backs up in spectacular fashion to an inlet of the Chesapeake Bay. "Right out by [Defense Secretary Donald H.] Rumsfeld's," said Charles Mangold Sr., whose Benson & Mangold agency brokers high-end estates in the area. "It's under contract, but he hasn't settled yet."

Reaction to the two men's presence is embedded into everyday conversation -- even as residents take pride in taking it all in stride. They tick off celebrities who have lived in or visited the area: Margaret Thatcher, Walter Cronkite, James Michener, Yasser Arafat and Vince Vaughan -- the latest during nearby filming of "Wedding Crashers."

Residents joke about the occasional helicopter overhead and what flavor Rumsfeld gets at Justine's Ice Cream parlor. One woman even drew a clear distinction -- pro-Rumsfeld, anti-Cheney.

"Cheney's a politician. He's connected with Bush," said Rhonda Lewis, 58, a bookkeeper at a bike shop in nearby Easton. She has always had a crush on Rumsfeld. "He is just adorable."

She thinks the defense secretary often looks stressed out on TV, and seeing him walk casually through St. Michaels in khakis is comforting. "Bush just dumped all the hard stuff on him," Lewis said.

At Albright's Gun Shop, a highly regarded draw for goose and duck hunters, a photo of the vice president hangs near the counter. "Best Wishes. Dick Cheney," says the autograph.

DOJ_NMG_0002807

Near the photo, behind the counter, Jim Kohlhaus remembered a recent day when several security people walked into the store, followed by the vice president. "I'll be . . . ," Kohlhaus said. He recalled telling Cheney he voted for him twice, "and I finally get to shake your hand."

Cheney extended his hand, Kohlhaus said, and bought some shotgun shells.

Rumsfeld bought a weekend house in St. Michaels two years ago, reportedly for about $1.5 million. He gets generally good reviews here for his desire to blend in -- even if that means taking a walk with his wife, Joyce, down a rural stretch of road tailed by SUVs. Residents say he doesn't like to pose for pictures alone, preferring to ask people to stand next to him and have a brief chat.

Lori Cuthbert, who lives nearby, said she met the defense secretary at a neighborhood St. Patrick's Day party. She intends to invite the Rumsfelds to an upcoming barbecue -- despite the Kerry-Edwards bumper sticker on her Honda.

Sue Stockman, an artist who sells jewelry and mosaics, bears witness that different types of people blend together here. Her Volkswagen van parked in her driveway is painted with flowers and sports "Think Peace" and "It Takes a Village to Raise a Child" bumper stickers. She protested the war in Iraq before it started and describes herself as an "environmentalist, holistic thinker and a pacifist."

Stockman reported having a run-in with someone she suspects was part of Rumsfeld's security detail. They argued over the film "Fahrenheit 9/11" at the Blue Crab Coffee shop -- ending with her putting a hand on his shoulder, sending him Reiki energy healing and telling him she had to get going.

A short time later, the man showed up at her house and gave her a small book, Stockman said. She fetched it from inside her house. "The Meaning of Life" is filled with photographs of animals, bits of wisdom and an inscription from the former Marine asking Stockman to accept his apologies and the book "as a token of friendship."

Cheney seemingly has spent far less time here. He, his wife and the Rumsfelds did dine on April 16 at 208 Talbot, a high-end restaurant in central St. Michaels.

"Cheney had the lamb," said Deborah Miller, seated behind the hostess stand.

She knew something was up that day when security agents showed up in the afternoon to scout out the place. An attache of Cheney's then arrived, saying he'd prefer a table among the regular diners -- rather than in a back room. No one bothered their table, and the foursome couldn't have been more pleasant, Miller recalled. But she didn't know whether Cheney was buying a place.

And the owner of the house in question declined to comment, saying politely from the end of its long driveway that he didn't want to talk about anything.

The estate goes back to 1930 and was said to be built by one of Thomas Edison's daughters, according to Robert Snyder, the Coldwell Banker agent who is listing the property.

The nine-acre lot includes extensive gardens, ornamental pools and spectacular views of the water behind it. Deer and osprey can be seen.

Snyder, who is vice president of the St. Michaels town commission, declined to say when any deal might close and whether the Cheneys were going to move in. "It truly is a magnificent piece of property," he added.

Civil Rights, Terrorism Cases On Circuit Slate (LEGALT)

By Lily Henning, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 5, 2005

The federal appeals court in Washington, where oral arguments resume this week after a nearly three-month summer hiatus, is facing a season of change.

The departure of Judge John Roberts Jr. to Capitol Hill for hearings on his nomination to the Supreme Court and the arrival of Janice Rogers Brown and Thomas Griffith on the circuit court's bench resulted in a reshuffling of panels and argument dates for the fall.

Lawyers with upcoming cases before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit say they've received oral argument dates later than usual. As of late last week, the court had posted its calendar through the end of October.

DOJ_NMG_0002808

The court's argument calendar, which continues to take shape, opens with the pleas of Guantánamo Bay prisoners. Over the next two months the court will also hear cases involving immunity and liability for public officials such as police officers and will revisit long-running litigation that pits states and interest groups against the federal government.

The D.C. Circuit begins arguments Sept. 8 with two of its most closely watched cases.

That day, Judges A. Raymond Randolph, David Sentelle, and Judith Rogers—appointees of Presidents George H.W. Bush, Ronald Reagan, and Bill Clinton, respectively—will hear the cases of Guantánamo Bay prisoners challenging their detention.

The arguments were originally scheduled to be heard Oct. 6 by a panel that included the D.C. Circuit's two newest judges, Brown and Griffith. The court did not comment on the changes in the panel, but lawyers for the detainees had requested that the hearing date be moved up so that if necessary, they could file an appeal that would reach the Supreme Court during its upcoming term.

"This must feel gigantic to these judges," says Barbara Olshansky, deputy legal director at the Center for Constitutional Rights in New York. "These are the kinds of decisions that are remembered and cited for centuries."

The learning curve is steep for any judge—regardless of whether he or she is a veteran or new to the bench, says Olshansky, who coordinates dozens of pro bono lawyers representing detainees.

Of the three judges, Randolph likely would be most familiar with the detainees' appeals.

In July he wrote the opinion in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld that upheld the military tribunals set up by the Bush administration to try terrorism suspects for war crimes.

Randolph's presence on the panel could create some "hurdles" for the detainees, says Olshansky, but the questions in the current cases are different. Hamdan challenged the legality of the military commissions to try suspected terrorists. The cases to be heard this week contest the legality of the detention of the prisoners, some of whom were picked up outside of the battlefield.

Lakhdar Boumediene v. Bush and Khaled Al Odah v. USA resulted in dramatically different outcomes in the lower court. In Boumediene in early January, U.S. District Judge Richard Leon, a George W. Bush appointee, held that the detainees have no rights under U.S. or international law that can be asserted in federal courts. Weeks later, Senior Judge Joyce Hens Green, appointed by President Jimmy Carter in 1979, ruled in Al Odah that the detainees do "possess enforceable constitutional rights."

No matter which way the circuit rules, the cases are expected to wind up before the Supreme Court, which last year ruled 6-3 that the detainees have a right to file habeas challenges in federal court.

"We're hoping for a speedy decision," says Stephen Oleskey, a lawyer with Wilmer Hale in Boston who represents a group of Bosnian-Algerians taken into custody in January 2002 and held at Guantánamo Bay.

CONGRESSIONAL IMMUNITY

Thus far, just two cases are slated for review this fall by all active members of the court. In those, the D.C. Circuit will address the unsettled question of whether members of Congress can be sued for employment discrimination by their legislative staffers.

Lawyers say the decision to hear Fields v. Johnson and Hanson v. Dayton en banc was even more unusual because it was done sua sponte — without a request from any of the parties involved.

"It's very, very rare," says Miller Baker, a partner with McDermott, Will & Emery who litigates at both the trial and appellate levels and is not involved in either case.

At issue is whether federal lawmakers are shielded from employment discrimination lawsuits because of a constitutional clause that broadly protects lawmakers' speech, debate, and other "legislative activities."

The 1995 Congressional Accountability Act, passed shortly after Republicans won control of Congress, subjects Congress to various employment statutes that apply to the private sector. But it also preserves Congress' immunity under the constitutional speech or debate clause.

The question in the cases is whether the Constitution bars employment suits filed by certain legislative staffers.

Judges David Tatel, Harry Edwards, and Randolph heard arguments in April in an age and race discrimination case against Rep. Eddie Bernice Johnson, a Texas Democrat. But shortly before scheduled arguments were to be heard in former Hill staffer Brad Hanson's suit against Sen. Mark Dayton (D-Minn.), the court announced it would hear both cases en banc instead. Arguments are scheduled for Sept. 29.

DOJ_NMG_0002809

Hanson says that Dayton fired him after learning the aide, who ran a health care help line for constituents, needed heart surgery. Last year, Leon denied Dayton's motion to dismiss the case. The D.C. Circuit denied a request by Hanson's lawyers that the two cases be consolidated.

A group of Republican lawmakers filed a friend of the court brief in support of Johnson and urged the court to shield federal legislators from such lawsuits.

In October, Edwards and Randolph are scheduled to sit on the same panel in another case involving questions of liability and immunity for public officials.

Joined by Judge Karen LeCraft Henderson, they will decide whether D.C. Metropolitan Police Chief Charles Ramsey can be held personally liable for what plaintiffs say were constitutional violations in the arrests of anti-globalism and anti-war protesters. The trial court found the police did not give an order to disperse before ordering the mass arrests in September 2002 in Northwest Washington's Pershing Park.

Ramsey was in command of the police department's operation plan and handling of the demonstrations while Assistant Chief Peter Newsham ordered the Pershing Park arrests.

In September 2004, Judge Emmet Sullivan ruled the two did not have qualified immunity, which shields officials from liability for damages so long as their actions were "objectively reasonable." Ramsey and Newsham, a lawyer and member of the Maryland Bar, filed an emergency appeal.

Mara Verheyden-Hilliard, a lawyer with the Partnership for Civil Justice, which is representing the class, says the question of Ramsey's liability is critical to a wider battle about how police restrain protesters.

"Personal liability is a very important mechanism in making sure that this doesn't happen again," Verheyden-Hilliard says.

LONG HAULS

Key cases in two long-running court battles are also scheduled to come before the court.

Nearly a decade after they started, challenges to the federal government's handling of billions of dollars in assets belonging to Native American heirs and held in trust for more than a century return to the D.C. Circuit.

The main body of the Cobell v. Norton suit, a class action first filed in 1996 against Clinton administration Interior Department Secretary Bruce Babbitt, is pending in federal district court before Judge Royce Lamberth in Washington.

For years, Lamberth has ordered the Interior Department to implement plans to correct past accounting failures and fix the way the agency accounts for the management and dispersal of the trust money in the future.

The case, which is scheduled to be heard by the D.C. Circuit on Sept. 16, is the government's appeal of Lamberth's latest injunction requiring accounting remedies.

Among the disagreements between the government and the class of trust beneficiaries is the scope of the fix. The plaintiffs say that the government needs to remedy its errors reaching as far back as 1887, the year the trust was created. The Department of Justice lawyers handling the case, however, say that the cutoff should be 1938, when another law concerning the management of the accounts was enacted.

In an added twist to an already dizzyingly complex struggle, Justice Department lawyers made the unusual request on Aug. 15 that Lamberth be removed from the case, claiming that the harsh language in Lamberth's rulings creates an appearance of bias. That question could come before the panel, which includes Senior Judges Laurence Silberman and Stephen Williams and Judge Merrick Garland. The plaintiffs have contested the motion.

On Oct. 18, another appeal in the decades-old fight over plans for a permanent repository for the nation's nuclear waste in Yucca Mountain, Nev., comes before Edwards, Henderson, and Randolph.

The latest iteration of litigation that Nevada Senior Deputy Attorney General Marta Adams calls "tortured" involves the state's protest of a proposed railroad that would transport nuclear waste to Yucca Mountain.

"We sue them over pretty much everything," Adams says. "I think the powers-that-be are surprised that Nevada has put up the argument that it has."

The state contends Congress did not entrust the Department of Energy with the authority to construct a railroad for the project and that, among other things, the agency did not do adequate studies of the environmental impact of the project.

DOJ_NMG_0002810

The Nuclear Energy Institute Inc., in an amicus brief filed in support of the government's plans, wrote that Nevada's "dire predictions" about the dangers of transporting the waste by rail through the state do not "square with reality."

Alphabet Soup: New Judges Griffith, Brown To Tackle ADA, FDA Cases (LEGALT)

By Lily Henning, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 5, 2005

Nothing says welcome to Washington to a new judge like a case full of acronyms that only wonkish Beltway dwellers can appreciate.

That's how Janice Rogers Brown and Thomas Griffith will be initiated into the complex but largely nonideologic al work of refereeing federal agencies on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit.

Before Brown this month will be a dispute over a plan that would create a hunting season for the trumpeter swan, and Griffith will hear an appeal involving the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration.

But in other cases, the judges could have the opportunity to place a personal stamp.

In Gregory Thomas v. George Washington University, Brown will hear the case of a man with a paralyzed leg who is appealing a lower court decision that threw out a favorable jury verdict. Gregory Thomas, a medical resident at GW who lost his position, sued the university for race and disability discrimination. The school claims his performance was poor and that he has an impairment, as opposed to a disability covered by the Americans With Disabilities Act.

As a California Supreme Court justice, Brown had been at odds with colleagues on questions of discrimination and disability. In a 2001 case, Brown split from the majority by advocating for a more limited legal recourse for a disabled worker whose employer did not accommodate her disability.

Brown and Griffith are scheduled to hear seven cases together this fall. On Sept. 16 the judges will hear M.K., et al. v. Porter Goss, a class action filed by Central Intelligence Agency staffers who say the government obstructed their efforts to obtain effective counsel in employment cases. According to court records, one appellant claims they were told that "national security was more important than her right to an attorney."

An unusual question at the intersection of government regulation and medical ethics will come before Griffith. The Washington Legal Foundation wants the Food and Drug Administration to allow medicines in early stages of clinical trials that haven't yet been deemed safe by the agency to be made available to terminally ill patients.

But the clearest signs of where Brown and Griffith stand—and the degree of independence they will hold from their colleagues—will likely be in dissents, which have been rare on the D.C. Circuit.

Because of the workload, "writing a dissent on the appeals court takes a lot of effort," says Frank Cross, a professor at the University of Texas School of Law. "So dissents often tell you which judges are really ideologues."

Report: Education Dept.'s PR Funds Need Oversight (USAT)

By Greg Toppo

USA Today, September 6, 2005

Federal investigators probing the Education Department's public relations contracts have found a pattern of deals in which advocacy organizations received grants totaling nearly $4.7 million to promote Bush administration education priorities in newspaper columns and brochures, but didn't disclose that they received taxpayer funds, as required by law.

The department's inspector general says he detected no "covert propaganda," but he told administration officials to consider asking for some of their money back.

The report, released on the Education Department's website Thursday night, said the department needs to do a better job monitoring how millions of dollars in grants are spent. More than $1.7 million, for example, went to outside public relations contracts that officials said resulted in no visible media products.

DOJ_NMG_0002811

The report comes nearly five months after the inspector general criticized the department for its $240,000 contract with commentator Armstrong Williams. That contract called for him to promote President Bush's 2002 No Child Left Behind education reform law in newspaper columns and on his syndicated TV show, and to encourage others to do the same.

After USA TODAY first reported on the Williams deal, several other agencies revealed that freelance commentators wrote pieces promoting Bush administration policies on marriage and on the environment without disclosing they'd received government funds either to write the pieces or to support their interest groups.

In the new report, Inspector General John Higgins found that more than $7.7 million in grants and contracts were either properly notated with government disclaimers or hadn't been disseminated to the public. He also found that Education Department personnel in several instances told groups that the disclaimers were required.

Higgins found that in 10 of 11 cases examined, groups didn't disclose — in print, on radio or in other media, such as brochures or handbooks — that taxpayer funds were used.

"The Department of Education is trying to define itself out of trouble by setting the bar very high for what constitutes covert propaganda," said Rep. George Miller, D-Calif., who requested the probe.

"But this report shows that, in case after case after case, grantees — without disclosing who was paying them — took taxpayers' money and used it to promote controversial policies," Miller said. "Either the department is grossly incompetent when it comes to awarding grants and contracts, or it is misleading investigators and engaging in a coverup of the misuse of taxpayer dollars."

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings' response, filed with the report, agreed with most of the investigators' findings.

U.S. Appears To Have Avoided Massive Oil Supply Problems (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

As Americans began heading home from the Labor Day weekend, gasoline stations today continued to report spot shortages, but the country appeared, at least as of this afternoon, to have avoided the massive supply problems that some had feared.

Throughout the weekend, station attendants and analysts said they saw unrelenting demand from drivers who were worried they would find themselves stranded, were panicked by rumors about service stations closing early, or both.

Officials said they continued to make progress in resuming the production and distribution of gasoline and other fuels, which was severely disrupted by Hurricane Katrina last week. But they noted that most refineries and oil production in and along the Gulf of Mexico remained shut down for the seventh day in a row.

Gasoline demand was heaviest along busy thoroughfares between big population centers and vacation destinations, often knocking out several gasoline stations along heavy traffic routes for hours to days at a time.

"It could three or five stations on one stretch running out, that's a fairly real situation that is happening," said Justin McNaull, a spokesman for AAA, formerly known as the American Automobile Association.

Mr. McNaull added that his group had not received any reports of motorists stranded in tourist destinations unable to return home because they could not refuel. "The challenge that gas station operators are having now is not knowing when the next shipment is coming and how much they will be getting," he said.

Rauf Baber, manager of a BP Amoco station in Coney Island, Brooklyn, said he was able to get a special delivery of gasoline late Sunday night after running out earlier in the day. Though he had 6,000 gallons of gasoline this morning, he was still expecting another load this evening.

"People went crazy to fill up, that's why we ran out," Mr. Baber said. "The BP company, they have plenty of gas."

Another Amoco station in Bronx was not quite so lucky. "We ran out about half an hour ago, and people are still coming in looking for gasoline," an attendant who would only give his first name, Jose, said this morning. "We ran out for a while last week, too. We're hoping to get a delivery today."

DOJ_NMG_0002812

Rumors that service stations were closing at 4 p.m. or 5 p.m. appeared to have needlessly sent many motorists on refueling trips, said John Felmy, chief economist at the American Petroleum Institute. "It wasn't as good as I hoped, but it wasn't as bad as I feared," he said about the weekend.

Another key test may come this afternoon and evening as the biggest crush of vacationers begin their voyage home, Mr. McNaull said.

"There certainly will be another push on the demand side there as people make those return trips and potentially as people gas up cars for the Tuesday back-to-work commute," he said.

Nationally, the average retail price for gasoline was $3.057 a gallon this morning, up from $2.867 on Sunday and $2.307 a month ago, according to AAA.

In the New York region, prices seemed to range from $2.95 a gallon to $3.75 a gallon, according to a spot survey done by the staffs of Senators Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, and John Corzine, Democrat of New Jersey. Both politicians called on the Federal Trade Commission to investigate gasoline price increases and suggested it might help to lift the federal gasoline tax at least temporarily.

Gasoline supplies will likely remain tight through much of the coming week if not longer, industry officials and analysts said, as refiners slowly resume operations in the gulf region. It can take several days to restart those facilities, because of the danger of explosions and other accidents.

Of the 10 refineries that were shut down by the storm initially, eight have not resumed operations, two are restarting and hope to be operational in the coming days, and three still do not have electricity, the Energy Department said on Sunday.

At least four refiners that produce about 5 percent of the nation's gasoline and other oil-based fuels have sustained significant damage and could be out of commission for a month or more for repairs, officials and analysts said. Among them are ConocoPhillips' Belle Chase, La. facility; Exxon Mobil's Chalmette, La. plant; and ChevronTexaco's large refinery in Pascagoula, Miss.

Officials at the largest of the four, ChevronTexaco, said they still do not have power or phone service at their plant, where the company is building temporary housing for up to 1,500 employees and their families. It may be days before the company can say how long it will take to restart the plant, which has a capacity to process 325,000 barrels of oil a day.

"There is a cogeneration unit with Mississippi Electric there that needs to get up and running," said Michael Barrett, a company spokesman. "We need to get natural gas there. We are putting generators in there right now. The truth is we don't have telephone lines" working at the refinery.

Of the two major pipelines that bring gasoline, diesel fuel and jet fuel to the eastern half of the United States from Texas and the gulf, the smaller one, the Plantation pipeline, said it was operating at 100 percent. The other, the Colonial pipeline, was at 73 percent as of Saturday and hoped to be at full capacity by the end of the holiday weekend.

Also, the federal government and members of the International Energy Agency, a 26-nation organization created after the 1970's oil crisis, have started releasing crude oil and some gasoline to energy companies in an effort to ease supply constraints. Those moves helped push down crude oil prices 2.1 percent in London tradingtoday. The New York Mercantile Exchange was closed for the Labor Day holiday.

The United States Department of Energy has already agreed to loan 12.6 million barrels of oil to refiners so they can keep producing gasoline and other fuels as production facilities in the gulf recover. This weekend, the government went even further and said it would sell 30 million barrels or more of oil in addition to the loans, which companies have to replace when conditions improve.

But with so much refining capacity out of service, analysts said gasoline prices would remain high in spite of the crude oil that the federal government and its allies are unleashing.

"Some of these refineries will not be back to full operation perhaps well into next year," said Paul Horsnell, an analyst at Barclays Capital in London.

A spokesman for BP, formerly British Petroleum, Scott Dean, said the company was shipping gasoline from Europe to East Coast port to help alleviate shortages but it may take some time for the current supply crunch to wind its way out of the system.

DOJ_NMG_0002813

"We are making fuels, we are distributing fuels," he said. "Fuels are arriving at the terminals and going out on trucks and arriving stations, but there are still disruptions."

Average Gas Prices Pumped Past $3 (USAT)

By Chris Woodyard, Dennis Cauchon and Sharon Carty

USA Today, September 6, 2005

The national average price for gasoline crossed the $3-a-gallon mark for the first time Monday in the latest AAA survey, tying the record for highest ever on an inflation-adjusted basis.

Although motorists in hurricane-whipped areas along the Gulf of Mexico faced gas lines, some resorts across the nation reported strong Labor Day crowds despite soaring fuel prices.

A gallon of regular-grade gas hit $3.057 a gallon Monday, up 19 cents from $2.867 earlier in the weekend, the AAA said. On an inflation-adjusted basis, that's equal to the peak of $1.417 set in March 1981.

Thirty-five states and the District of Columbia had prices averaging $3 or more for regular. Highest: Maryland, $3.26.

Supply disruptions caused by the hurricane are almost sure to raise prices further before settling down in about two weeks, says Tom Kloza of the Oil Price Information Service, which compiles the AAA survey.

Barring another unforeseen event like a new hurricane, “I think the highest prices you may see until February are over the next 15 days,” Kloza said .

One good sign: Shortages feared in the upper Midwest didn't appear, though open gas stations were scarce in hurricane-ravaged areas. “We avoided a widespread panic,” says Dan Pickering of Pickering Energy Partners. There were “spot shortages but nothing on a broad basis, which is the best we could have hoped for.”

Spot shortages are still possible. Although major pipelines have been restored to service, some gulf-area refineries are still not operating. Tankers full of gasoline from Europe are headed to the USA, but it could take a couple of weeks for their cargoes to make a difference.

“There is probably enough (refinery) capacity in Europe to bail us out for awhile,” says Harry Quarls, a managing director for Booz Allen Hamilton.

About a dozen gas stations were open Monday in two hard-hit cities on the Mississippi coast, Gulfport and Biloxi. Police stood guard.

“People get crazy about gasoline when we're not here,” said Gulfport police officer Travis Sheaffer at a gas station near Interstate 10. “They were cutting in line, pulling guns — all types of insanity.”

A few stations have raised prices above $4 a gallon, but most have kept them at about $2.50 a gallon, the price charged before the hurricane. Stations generally limited customers to 10 gallons of gas.

“Some people pushed their cars here for gas,” said Fallon Demoruell, a gas station worker. “A lot of them haven't been too polite.”

Elsewhere, some gas station owners were nervous about supplies. Dawn Baker, manager of a CITGO station in Illiopolis, Ill., 200 miles southwest of Chicago, says she fears that she might not get a full supply when a new tank of gas arrives today. “More than likely it'll be a half load, and we'll have to make do with that,” she says.

Some commuters are saying that $3 is the breaking point for them. Now they're ready to reduce their driving.

Rodolfo Palma, who lives in Saline, Mich., 50 miles west of Detroit, bought a bicycle at the beginning of the summer and used it to run errands instead of taking his car. He even started driving part way to work and riding his bike the rest of the way. He plans to keep doing both.

“Now, after the hurricane, it's going to be a permanent change,” Palma says.

It Won't Be Cheap, But Gas Is To Be Had (NYT)

By By Vikas Bajaj And Richard Pérez-peña

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0002814

Most American travelers managed to avoid any serious gasoline supply disruptions over the holiday weekend, officials said yesterday, but analysts and industry executives warned that fuel prices were likely to remain high and that the nation's oil supply system might not return to normal operations for several weeks, perhaps longer.

Even as the federal government and other nations started releasing crude oil and gasoline into a thirsting world market and pipelines resumed sending supplies from the Gulf Coast, specialists said there were few quick fixes for the biggest remaining bottleneck: refining.

"Some of these refineries will not be back to full operation, perhaps well into next year," said Paul Horsnell, an analyst at Barclays Capital in London, who also said that it would take longer for refiners to turn their attention to producing heating oil for the winter as they struggled to catch up with lost gasoline output.

As many as four refineries, processing about 4 percent of the nation's oil supplies, might stay out of service for weeks or months. Of the remaining six refineries that shut down last week because of Hurricane Katrina, several were starting to resume production over the long weekend, but it will take them several days to get back to full speed.

Oil prices fell about 2 percent in European and Asian trading, and the New York Mercantile Exchange was closed for the Labor Day holiday. Retail prices for regular gasoline appeared to be settling at an average of roughly $3.20 a gallon yesterday, almost a full dollar above what consumers paid a month ago.

Throughout the weekend, station attendants and analysts said they saw unrelenting demand from drivers who were worried they would find themselves stranded or were panicked by rumors about service stations closing early.

Prices, they said, were being largely determined by suppliers and retailers that were hoping to limit the risk of running out of fuel, and groping to find a balance in various markets between uncertain supplies and skittish demand. Gasoline-buying over the weekend was heaviest along busy highways connecting major population centers with nearby vacation destinations.

"It could be three or five stations on one stretch running out - that's a fairly real situation that is happening," said Justin McNaull, a spokesman for AAA.

Rauf Baber, manager of a BP Amoco station in Coney Island, Brooklyn, said he was able to get a special delivery of gasoline late Sunday night after running out earlier in the day. "People went crazy to fill up, that's why we ran out," he said. "The BP company, they have plenty of gas."

BP indeed has plenty of gasoline but it, like others, could not assure that ample fuel supplies would soon be where they were wanted most. A company spokesman, Scott Dean, said tankers were making their way from Europe to ports along the East Coast. He said that the company's refineries were already processing everything they had on hand.

"We're still working to get the ripples out of the system," he said, "but it's still going to take several days."

On Friday, the Energy Department and the International Energy Agency, a 26-nation consortium established after the 1970's energy crisis, said they would together release 60 million barrels of oil and gasoline reserves at a pace of 2 million barrels a day, helping to bring down soaring prices in futures markets.

But Mr. Horsnell said the oil releases would not be enough to ease gasoline prices or supplies. Among I.E.A. members, only the Europeans have spare gasoline to ship to the United States, and they are already sending all they can. They will struggle to ship more because there are few spare tankers available and East Coast ports are not sitting idle.

"The maximum amount of oil product that can be managed into the U.S. is two million barrels a day," Mr. Horsnell said. "Logistically, it's quite challenging."

About 70 percent of the gulf's offshore crude oil production of 1.5 million barrels a day was still shut down yesterday, as was half of its natural gas production of 10 billion cubic-feet per day.

Most of last week, energy officials focused on restoring power to pumps on two major pipelines that bring gasoline, diesel fuel and jet fuel to the eastern half of the country from Texas and the Gulf of Mexico. Plantation, the smaller of the two, said it was operating at 100 percent capacity yesterday. Colonial, the larger pipeline, was at 73 percent as of Saturday, and its operators said they hoped for it to be at full capacity by the end of the holiday weekend.

Rick Rainey, a spokesman for Kinder Morgan, the energy company that owns Plantation, said the pipeline carried a full load of gasoline and other fuels to the East Coast over the weekend. But volume on the pipeline was beginning to drop off, he said yesterday, "as the backlog has begun to deplete at terminals."

DOJ_NMG_0002815

Exxon Mobil's refinery in Baton Rouge, La., the nation's second-largest, is the only one that has continued to supply fuel to the pipeline since the hurricane, Mr. Rainey said.

According to the Energy Department, three Louisiana refineries still did not have power over the weekend: the ConocoPhillips facility in Belle Chasse; the Exxon Mobil plant in Chalmette and the Murphy Oil refinery in Meraux.

A fourth, ChevronTexaco, said that its large refinery in Pascagoula, Miss., was still without electricity or phone service; the company said it could take days before it could even say when operations could resume. A company spokesman, Mickey Driver, said it was still trying to locate all of its 4,400 employees in the region.

Closer to the retail end of the energy pipeline, politicians across the country were talking about how to deal with consumer complaints. State attorneys general threatened to crack down on price gouging and Congressional leaders asked for federal investigations.

Two senators - Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, and Jon S. Corzine, Democrat of New Jersey - said that their staffs had surveyed gas stations and found prices ranging from $2.95 to $3.75 a gallon at stations within a few miles of one another.

Mr. McNaull of AAA said retail prices swung widely last week and were starting to converge in many cities. But retailers in the same area could still have widely different costs, depending on whether they bought gas on contract from a single major supplier or on the spot market from the cheapest provider that day or week.

"The challenge that gas station operators are having now," he said, "is not knowing when the next shipment is coming and how much they will be getting."

Rising Gas Prices May Force States To Suspend Tax (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

To soften the blow of higher fuel prices and disrupted supplies, the federal government took steps to increase the supply of diesel fuel as some states moved to suspend gasoline excise taxes.

The Internal Revenue Service said it will temporarily allow all vehicles, including commercial trucks, to use dyed diesel fuel without being subject to a penalty. Dyed diesel usually is restricted to farming and government activities that aren't subject to excise taxes. Under the IRS easing, the usual diesel tax still will be owed when dyed diesel is used in nonexempt ways, but an additional penalty will be waived. California and Michigan also lifted state penalties on the use of dyed diesel fuel.

States that suspend gas taxes stand to lose millions of dollars in revenues that are usually used for road and other highway projects. Even states that don't suspend gas taxes could see revenues drop if drivers cut back on gas purchases due to rising pump prices.

Late last week, Georgia suspended its 7.5 cents-a-gallon gas tax and 4% sales tax on gasoline purchases until Oct. 1. State lawmakers in Oklahoma, Connecticut and Massachusetts have proposed measures to suspend gas taxes, which could reduce the cost to consumers by 12 cents to 20 cents per gallon. Meanwhile, Rep. Steve Pearce (R., N.M.) said he plans to introduce legislation to suspend the federal gas tax, which is 18.4 cents a gallon.

The disruption of gas supplies, coupled with panic buying, has pushed prices to an average of about $3.06 per gallon, according to AAA. In some areas, gas prices have nearly doubled, prompting lawmakers to scramble to show voters that they are trying to ease the pain.

"I think it is important because we need to recognize that gas has gone up 70 cents to a dollar in just a matter of days," said Brad Jones, a Republican state legislator in Massachusetts. He wants to suspend his state's 21-cents-per-gallon gas tax for three months.

Georgia's one-month suspension of its gas tax and sales tax on gasoline is expected to cost the state $75 million, according to state officials. If Mr. Jones's bill is passed in Massachusetts, that state would lose an estimated $175 million. Oklahoma would see a $103 million decline in revenues under one state senator's proposal to suspend its 17 cents-per-gallon tax on diesel fuel.

All 50 states levy a flat-rate tax, usually 10 to 20 cents, on each gallon of gas sold. Most states also apply a sales tax, usually 2% to 5%, on gas purchases.

Most money collected from gasoline taxes is earmarked for state and local road projects, and used as matching funds to win federal money. States with lower matching funds could end up with fewer federal highway dollars.

But analysts say states are unlikely to be badly hurt by a decline in gas-tax receipts because many are showing surpluses due to robust local economies. "It's more symbolic," said Nicholas Jenny, senior policy analyst for the Nelson A. Rockefeller Institute of Government, the public policy research unit of the State University of New York.

In the first eight months of the year, Georgia collected $75 million more in revenues than had been expected, due to an increase in sales-tax receipts resulting from climbing gas prices. The extra money will be offset by the one-month tax suspension. "We expect this to be revenue-neutral," said Shane Hix, a spokesman for Georgia's governor.

Generally, the tax on gasoline is an excise tax that is a fixed amount instead of a percentage. Many states haven't raised the gas tax over the past decade. California, for example, has charged motorists the same excise tax -- 18 cents a gallon -- since 1994.

"A lot of these states have seen the money coming from these taxes go down anyway because of inflation," said Mr. Jenny of the Rockefeller Institute.

This isn't the first time that states have weighed suspending gasoline taxes in the face of sharp price increases. In 2000, Indiana suspended its 5% sales tax on gasoline, resulting in a drop of seven cents to 10 cents a gallon and a $12.6 million decline in state receipts.

Katrina And The Gas Pump (NYT)

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

In Katrina's wake, gasoline prices are rising faster than oil prices - an odd, but explicable, phenomenon. Enough crude oil is being produced to meet global demand, but the ability of the Gulf Coast's many refineries to turn the oil into gasoline has been devastated, as has the ability to transport the gasoline that does become available. Those supply bottlenecks are chiefly responsible for this past week's higher prices at the pump.

President Bush's immediate response is to lend oil from the government's Strategic Petroleum Reserve to refineries and to streamline the refining process by temporarily relaxing environmental standards - sound stopgap measures to help ensure a steady supply of gasoline. The International Energy Agency, whose members are 26 rich nations, has also made a big contribution, pledging on Friday to supply world markets with an additional 60 million barrels of oil and gasoline over the next 30 days, half of which would come from the United States' emergency stockpiles.

But it would be wrong to think - and act - as if this crisis is fundamentally a supply shock. Rather, it is a supply shock on top of blatantly excessive demand. The near-term responses from Mr. Bush and the international agency, welcome as they are, will not solve the larger problems laid bare by Katrina. Worse, Mr. Bush's record on energy issues does not suggest that he is up to that task.

Gasoline prices seem destined to stay elevated until at least next spring. Even if the damage in the Gulf Coast is repaired soon - a big if - oil producers and refiners will require a premium to compensate for the risk that another killer storm could further disrupt operations in this hurricane season. Moreover, Katrina is causing refineries to draw down oil stockpiles that would have been used to produce home heating fuel for use this winter. That makes for a very thin supply cushion in the months ahead - not to mention high home-heating bills on top of high gasoline prices.

But even before the hurricane hit, oil producers were pumping all-out to meet demand. Driven mainly by gasoline consumption in the United States and industrialization in China and India, the world's consumption of oil is 85 million barrels a day. That is just short of the maximum that can be pumped, and leaves only about 1 million barrels a day in spare capacity, the lowest level in three decades. As with gasoline, the thinner the cushion, the higher the price.

Mr. Bush, who has a wildly overconfident view of how much oil could be pumped if American drillers were given a freer rein, refuses to see the overarching problem as one of excessive demand. Americans' gas-guzzling ways keep prices up, threatening the nation's economic well-being and creating windfall profits for foreign oil producers, some of which are used to finance terrorism.

So it is up to Congress to grapple with the big picture - now, before another disaster strikes. The Senate energy committee is scheduled to meet today, and much of the attention will naturally be devoted to the current problems in the refining process. Those issues must obviously be addressed, including ways to help municipalities overcome the "not in my backyard" obstacles to building state-of-the-art refineries.

But the focus must be - finally - on reducing oil consumption. The lawmakers should call for a rapid, mandatory increase in automobile mileage standards. And they must resist measures that would encourage only more consumption, like temporarily suspending gasoline taxes.

This is the moment to gather the political will to do what should have already been done. If the lawmakers don't act, they are courting problems that may be even harder to solve later on.

Economy Shows Resilience In Face Of Massive Jolt (WSJ)

By Jon E. Hilsenrath and Grep Ip

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

The U.S. economy's shock absorbers kicked in within days of one of the worst natural disasters in its history, offering hope that the massive jolt to the country's energy and transportation systems won't produce a long-lived, serious economic contraction.

The release of emergency oil and gasoline from global stockpiles, created in the 1970s to counter supply interruptions, sent crude-oil prices down to about pre-hurricane levels in European trading. Long-term interest rates fell despite the prospect of higher inflation, cushioning home buyers and businesses. Temporary-help agencies began to place some workers displaced by the storm. New Orleans's main newspaper, the Times-Picayune, kept publishing on the Internet when printing on paper was impossible. Computerized logistics enabled railroad CSX Corp. to reroute freight normally exchanged with Western railroads at New Orleans to be sent north.

Hurricane Katrina is the biggest test in years of the economy's resilience. But recent history offers encouraging, though by no means definitive evidence of the U.S. economy's ability to bounce back from shocks. Economic growth has become significantly less volatile during the past two decades, a trend some economists dub "the Great Moderation."

The past five years have witnessed a burst stock bubble, terrorist attacks, corporate scandals, wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, and a doubling in crude oil prices. Yet the economy, after a mild recession in 2001, has embarked on a solid expansion with little inflation. Katrina came at a time when the economy was in solid shape. In August, the unemployment rate fell to 4.9%, a four-year low, from 5% in July, and nonfarm payrolls grew a respectable 169,000, the Labor Department said Friday.

"We expect the trend in growth will prove more resilient than is now widely feared," UBS Securities analysts told clients Friday.

Employment and output are likely to take a sizable hit in the next few months; the question is the duration and severity of the blow. Economists surveyed last week by Macroeconomic Advisers LLC, a St. Louis forecasting firm, said the storm would result in growth of only about 3.5%, at an annual rate, in the second half of the year, down from pre-storm expectations of 4%. It grew 3.6% in the first half.

And the economy does have some worrisome vulnerabilities. The storm hit when world oil producers and U.S. refiners were operating near capacity and they remain highly sensitive to any loss of supply. Higher gasoline prices will act like a tax on consumers who are already stretched: In July their saving rate turned negative as spending exceeded income. Spending might be further hurt if consumer confidence erodes.

As a result, some analysts still believe the economic impact might be severe. "What we're witnessing now is going to turn out to be a really huge shock," said Stephen Cecchetti, an economist at Brandeis University. Businesses may also find it hard to adapt to shifts in spending caused by higher energy prices, much as Detroit found it hard to shift to smaller cars in the 1970s.

But there are several factors in the economy's favor. It's more energy-efficient: The gross domestic product has more than doubled since 1979, but petroleum consumption has risen just 9%, according to the Energy Department. Policy makers have reduced, rather than increased, regulatory constraints on supply. In the 1970s, gasoline price caps and other regulations created shortages and waiting lines. Last week, the federal government temporarily eased environmental and transportation regulations so existing gasoline inventories could reach U.S. customers more easily.

The release of oil and gasoline from the U.S. Strategic Petroleum Reserve and similar stockpiles in Europe has helped contain the rise in oil prices. Benchmark Brent crude oil for October delivery fell $1.22 in London yesterday to $64.84, around where it stood before Katrina. U.S. markets were closed for Labor Day. Wholesale gasoline prices fell sharply Friday from midweek peaks though they remain well above pre-storm levels due to Gulf Coast refinery closures.

The growth of the temporary-staffing industry has helped redeploy workers displaced by both economic and weather events. Terri Blue Edwards, 41, stayed behind in New Orleans with a sister who refused to leave. By Thursday, she says, she, her 23-year old son and her sister waded out of a building in chest-high water, wandered along a scorching-hot highway and found their way to an abandoned dairy truck, which they and more than two dozen others, packed shoulder-to-shoulder, and rode to Austin.

Another son raised money to fly her to Huntsville, Ala., she says, to be reunited with her husband, Leon, who had left New Orleans with elderly parents before the storm. Mr. Edwards was a maintenance engineer in a municipal building, earning $13 an hour. Ms. Edwards didn't work. She says she has health problems but she's going to work now to make ends meet.

By Saturday, Mr. and Mrs. Edwards had landed $7-an-hour jobs at a Huntsville manufacturer through Adecco SA, a Swiss-based temporary staffing company. Mr. Edwards says he was making nearly twice as much in New Orleans. But the job "came right on time," he says. "You need a job to survive."

The transportation system is proving to have some flexibility. The storm wiped out large sections of CSX's tracks and bridges along the Gulf Coast. But within a couple of days, the railroad, based in Jacksonville, Fla., was rerouting freight north, thanks to advances in information technology and deregulation that enable it to reroute shipments in a quarter of the time it would have taken two decades ago. Separately, the lower Mississippi's maritime hub continued to recover as the Coast Guard reopened its main shipping channel to ocean-going vessels Saturday.

The development of new financial instruments has ameliorated the risk that regional stresses could trigger local bank failures. In Baton Rouge, American Gateway Bank, a small regional lender, sells about three-quarters of the mortgages it underwrites to larger banks like J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. or Bank of America Corp., who package the loans into larger, diversified pools of credit sold to investors around the world. That has helped keep credit flowing to real estate even after disaster struck less than 80 miles away.

Oil shocks in the 1970s became embedded in wages and prices, eventually requiring the Fed to raise interest rates dramatically, triggering deep recessions. But those drastic actions eventually cemented its credibility, and in recent years workers and companies haven't responded to higher oil prices or easy money by immediately pressing for higher prices and wages. "One of the benefits of having that credibility is it increases [the Fed's] ability to...stabilize the economy and insulate it from major shocks like this," said J. Alfred Broaddus, former president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond, Va.

While the Fed is unlikely to cut rates, it may choose not to raise them at its Sept. 20 meeting as had been previously expected. The Fed has raised its short-term-rate target to 3.5% from 1% in the past 14 months.

Fed officials say it's too soon to assess the storm's impact on interest-rate moves. Even so, long-term interest rates have declined in anticipation that the Fed will raise rates more slowly or not as high. By keeping mortgage rates down, that, in turn, offered support to the still-strong housing market.

Economic Impact Will Be Widespread Katrina's Costs Will Be Shared By Cities Far Beyond Storm's Path (USAT)

By Del Jones, Dan Reed And Jayne O'Donnell

USA Today, September 6, 2005

As New Orleans deals with the storm waters that broke its levees last week, dozens of Southern cities from Baton Rouge to Pensacola are coping with a displaced populace numbering in the hundreds of thousands and awaiting the spillover of billions of dollars in disaster aid.

DOJ_NMG_0002819

Natural disasters whipsaw local economies as they move from devastation and into rebuilding. That's nothing new. But this time, the disaster was a coiled snake that has lashed out at the nation. Gasoline prices soar, transportation snarls. Hurricane Katrina has already influenced most lives in small ways, but it could have a major influence to those along the migration path of a city of evacuees looking for family, friends and 275 stranger-filled shelters in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee and Texas.

How it will play out is anyone's guess. But in the short run, people and their pets are washing up on doorsteps everywhere. New Orleans hotel and spa owners Keith and Andre West-Harrison fled to family in Evansville, Ind., a 16-hour drive, with six dogs and a cat. Distant places such as Evansville might be able to absorb a few evacuees, but an overwhelmed Houston Astrodome is flashing the no-vacancy sign, sending 25,000 to Reunion Arena in Dallas, another 25,000 to a San Antonio warehouse that was once an Air Force base.

Some companies are erecting their own shelters. Chevron this past weekend planned a 500,000-square-foot tent city in Pascagoula, Miss., to house 1,500 employees and their families who were left homeless by the storm.

Katrina and the flooding triggered by levee failures will have a total economic cost of $100 billion, Risk Management Solutions, a catastrophe-risk-modeling firm, said Friday. Most of the damage done by the levee break is likely not insured. Still, bond-rating company Fitch said Friday that the insured portion of losses could go above $25 billion, surpassing the Sept. 11 terror attack ($20.1 billion in 2004 dollars) and Hurricane Andrew ($20.5 billion) as the largest insured loss in history.

The strain is everywhere. New Orleans had 32,400 school-age children in 2004 who will be landing somewhere. The Greater Houston Partnership, the city's primary business advocate, is calling Houston “the city of hope,” and spokesman Charlie Savino says it is bracing for 150,000 temporary residents, comparable to absorbing the population of Chattanooga, Tenn. Providing for them will cost $6 million a day, assuming $40 a day is spent on each person for food, housing, health care and schooling.

Congress has approved $10.5 billion in emergency disaster relief, and much more is likely on the way. Private donations are rolling in. Need gives berth to opportunity, especially when mixed with money, yet little if anything about this disaster smacks of a windfall. There might be tens of thousands arriving in Texas cities, but, “It's certainly not going to be like (hosting) the Super Bowl,” says Bill Gilmer, a senior economist at the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas and an expert on the Gulf Coast economy.

For example, Fiesta Mart is within walking distance of the Astrodome, but it's not stocking up on food and staples, says CEO Louis Katopodis. Everyone will be fed three meals a day plus 24-hour snacks on the Dome's concourses. Papa John's is giving away 10,000 pizzas. Aramark, providing the primary concessions, said it isn't yet certain how it will be paid, but it doesn't seem overly worried.

Near Fiesta Mart is a Target store. But most evacuees are low on cash and are getting comfort kits that include soap, a toothbrush and other toiletries. Target won't get swarmed by displaced children in search of school supplies, either. Houston public schools require uniforms, which will help the evacuees fit in, says Houston Independent School District spokeswoman Adriana Villarreal. Businesses are lining up to donate uniforms, and Wal-Mart has pledged any school supplies necessary, Villarreal says.

Houston charter bus company Sierra Trailways owns 13 of the 650 buses contracted by the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) to transport evacuees from New Orleans to Houston. They get paid a flat fee per mile, says Sierra President Patrick Conner, which will boost revenue during a slow time of year. But it's not about the money, says Conner, who was caught in Hurricane Alicia when it hit Houston in 1983, and there was “never a question” that his company was going to help New Orleans.

“But for the grace of God, this could be us,” Conner said.

La Quinta's hotels from Texas to Arkansas were so filled that last week it phoned those who long ago booked Labor Day reservations and told them not to come because the company will not evict evacuees. Many evacuees can't afford their rooms, and the company is starting to turn to insurance companies, FEMA and the Red Cross for payment. La Quinta also faces losses from eight properties damaged and closed in New Orleans.

DOJ_NMG_0002820

Like many companies, La Quinta doesn't know if it will make money or lose it in the disaster. “It's a wait-and-see thing,” spokeswoman Teresa Ferguson says. “We're more worried at this point about doing what's right. It's right to take care of our employees and our guests.”

La Quinta could well be a microcosm of the area's overall business community. It's difficult to tell which force is greater, the gain or the strain, economist Gilmer says.

Absorbing waves of new and primarily poor people is nothing new to Houston. The city has grown by 1 million people in a decade, 100,000 a year — and 60,000 of those move in from elsewhere, 47,000 from other countries.

“It's an immigration hub from Latin America,” Villarreal says, a regular challenge to the school system.

What is new, however, is Houston's role as New Orleans' knight in shining armor. The two cities have been economic rivals for decades, economist Gilmer says, and since the 1950s, Houston has been the clear winner as the energy industry concentrated into Texas with well-paid engineering jobs. The poverty rate is 28% in New Orleans, vs. 19% in Houston, according to 2000 census data compiled by the Urban Institute. Houston, less than half the size of New Orleans in the 1920s, has grown to become the nation's fourth-largest city, while New Orleans has dropped to 37th.

Gilmer predicts Hurricane Katrina will accelerate Houston's relative dominance over New Orleans as companies that relocate employees to temporary offices decide to make the moves permanent.

When a Popeyes Chicken & Biscuits franchisee in California said it could use a couple of managers and assistant managers, it wasn't long before several who were washed out of New Orleans volunteered to relocate, says CEO Ken Keymer.

Houston already has the NFL's Texans, so New Orleans doesn't have to fear the city stealing the Saints. But the Saints can't play in the Superdome, so they're considering playing home games at Louisiana State University's Tiger Stadium in Baton Rouge or San Antonio's Alamodome.

Vacuum manufacturer Oreck, with headquarters in New Orleans, is moving 100 to 150 people to Dallas, mainly executives, staff and those who process orders, says Oreck CEO Tom Oreck. Another 40, mainly from the call center, are heading for Denver.

Hunter Blanks, head of office space leasing for CB Richard Ellis' Dallas office, has been fielding preliminary inquiries from companies in New Orleans looking for temporary office space. “This is going to have a very wide impact on commercial real estate,” he said.

Gardere Wynne & Sewell, a law firm that specializes in oil and petrochemical law at its Houston office, has been working to find temporary office space and spare computer equipment for New Orleans law firms. Managing partner Steve Good says he doesn't expect to take clients away from New Orleans firms, but demand for legal services related to oil and petrochemical insurance claims will jump, he said.

Low-paid service workers from New Orleans might also stay away as they find opportunity. La Quinta has bused 250 now-homeless employees to Arlington, Texas, where they're staying in a corporate-owned conference center. Corestaff, a temporary employment company with headquarters in Houston, is encouraging those who have dispersed from New Orleans to apply with them or with state unemployment offices.

The headquarters of Popeyes is in Atlanta, but its heart is in New Orleans, where the chain began in 1972, says CEO Keymer. The storm closed 250 company-owned restaurants employing 800, plus many more owned by franchisees. About 150 have reopened, but some in the flooded area might be closed a long time. The company has created a database so a New Orleans employee who surfaces with relatives in Tennessee can see if Popeyes has something available there.

Information is a scarce commodity. Keymer says he has no idea how many Popeyes restaurants are in the flood zone and destined to remain closed. The Port of Houston Authority expects to absorb cargo that will be diverted from the Port of New Orleans and the Port of South Louisiana, the largest and fifth-largest ports by ton in the USA. But Port of Houston Authority Executive Director Thomas Kornegay says he still has no clue how much extra demand to expect, nor how much extra Houston can absorb. The Houston port already handles far more capacity than it was designed for, yet it figures out how to increase volume by 10% a year anyway, Kornegay said.

“The truth of the matter is, nobody knows where it's going to go. It's a big problem,” Kornegay said.

DOJ_NMG_0002821

Houston engineers will be so busy fixing the damage in the gulf, they'll be diverted from oil exploration for some time, Gilmer says. Houston will be overtaxed in more ways than one. But it will emerge stronger, while "New Orleans will be out of the game," he says.

The West-Harrisons were taking in $1,000 a day at their small hotel and spa in the French quarter. In Evansville, they are trying to figure out how to start a new business.

They have no money and one change of clothes. Last week, they stopped off at the local Red Cross office looking for a little money for food and clothing. While they were waiting to see someone, five donors dropped off checks. The West-Harrisons got tired of waiting and left with nothing.

States Gear Up To Provide Jobless Benefits (USAT)

By Stephanie Armour

USA Today, September 6, 2005

Thousands of employees are finding themselves suddenly without paychecks after Hurricane Katrina. Some are rushing to get state aid while others are looking for new jobs.

Some states are reporting an increase in residents requesting benefits.

•In Louisiana, those who are not getting paid because of the hurricane can file for disaster unemployment assistance or unemployment benefits, says Ed Pratt, a spokesman with the Louisiana Department of Labor. They are eligible for up to $256 a week and can find out more at www.laworks.net or by calling 866-783-5567.

"People are applying right now. We're getting thousands," Pratt says. "We're going to go to shelters (to help people) apply."

One challenge: Many applicants no longer have mailing addresses. Between 100,000 and 300,000 people may have to re-establish mailing addresses. Officials are still working out how to handle that, but some applicants are using relatives' addresses.

• Mississippi workers are eligible for unemployment or disaster unemployment assistance of up to $210 a week. Further information is available on its website, mdes.ms.gov, or by calling 888-844-3577.

•Alabama residents are eligible for unemployment or disaster assistance and can apply through call centers. They can get up to $220 a week and can apply toll free at 866-234-5382. Evacuees from Louisiana and Mississippi who are staying in Alabama can also apply through that toll-free number: Their information will be transferred to their home state's unemployment agency.

"We're gearing up for (this) week," says Phyllis Kennedy, director of the state's Department of Industrial Relations.

Although the government reported Friday that the U.S. unemployment rate dipped to a four-year low of 4.9% in August, economists expect employment to drop this month due to jobs lost to Katrina.

"Next month, payrolls will plunge," Ian Shepherdson, chief U.S. Economist at High Frequency Economics said in a recent note to clients.

Adecco, a staffing firm, is seeing a surge in applicants displaced by Katrina looking for short-term work. "We've been inundated," says Tammy Rhodes, the branch manager in Shreveport, La. Many have high-level skills, such as accounting.

Mary Gordon, 54, who left her home in Harahan, La., a suburb of New Orleans, does outside sales for commercial buildings and is now seeking a temporary job. Although still getting paid by her regular employer, she doesn't know how long that will last and has scant savings to fall back on.

"I have to have something to do, but my dream would be to go home," Gordon says.

The Lagging Poor (WP)

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

The poverty level edged up last year, to 12.7 percent -- the fourth straight annual increase. Overall median income remained flat at $44,389, down 3.8 percent from its peak in 1999. This is a robust economic recovery?

The Census Bureau's annual report on income, poverty and health insurance in the United States is not alarming -- but neither is it cheering, or even reassuring. Rather, the numbers underscore the lagging and uneven nature of the economic recovery since the 2001 recession. According to the new data, 4 million more people were living in poverty in 2004 than in 2001, and 4.6 million more people lacked health insurance.

Administration officials counsel patience, pointing to the downturn of the 1990s, when it took several years for the poverty rate to start to fall. "The last, lonely trailing indicator of the business cycle," Commerce Department official Elizabeth Anderson said of the poverty rate.

This has about it more than a whiff of wishful thinking. For one thing, the increase in poverty between 2003 and 2004 is in fact out of the ordinary; such a rise hasn't happened between the second and third years of an economic recovery since the federal government began collecting poverty data in 1960. For another, the poverty rate may be a lagging indicator, but in this case it's not lonely: See, for example, the median income of working-age households, which declined 1.2 percent.

Another ominous signal involves health insurance coverage. Although the percentage of people with coverage remained unchanged from 2003 to 2004, that masked a shift from employer-provided insurance to government coverage. The percentage of people with employer-based health insurance fell for the fourth year in a row. Most of this slack has been taken up by Medicaid, the shared federal-state health program for the poor and disabled. But with state budgets under increasing strain from Medicaid costs and with Congress poised to make cuts in the program, it's not at all certain that states will be willing or able to maintain coverage for working Americans hovering at the edge of poverty.

In the wake of this data and the devastation caused by Hurricane Katrina, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) was wise to postpone this week's planned vote to repeal the estate tax. Lawmakers need to remember in the weeks to come that this is an economic recovery that continues to leave too many Americans behind.

Russia Rejects Reporting Iran To Security Council (FT)

By Stefan Wagstyl And Roula Khalaf

Financial Times, September 6, 2005

Russia on Monday ruled out an early decision to report the Iran nuclear controversy to the United Nations Security Council, undermining US and European efforts to build international consensus for a diplomatic reprimand this month.

A senior Kremlin official said Iran had not violated the rules of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty. Its nuclear programme, he said, should continue to be dealt with at the governing board of the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency, the UN's nuclear watchdog, without involving the Security Council.

Vladimir Putin, the Russian president, adopted a more cautious approach in a meeting with foreign journalists and academics. He did not exclude a future referral to New York, though not at this point, and said it would have be done "in a very precise form".

The international divisions over Iran surfaced as the US and Europe launched a diplomatic campaign to step up the diplomatic pressure on Tehran when the governing board of the IAEA meets on September 19. The IAEA has been investigating Iran's nuclear programme for the past two years without reaching a conclusion on Tehran's intentions.

Until recently European governments had been reluctant to escalate the dispute and involve the Security Council, which would raise the diplomatic stakes. But they joined the US in calling for a referral after talks between Tehran and the so-called EU3 – the UK, France and Germany – broke down last month. The talks were aimed at persuading Tehran to give up all activities related to the enrichment of uranium, which produces the fuel for nuclear reactors or atomic bombs.

The negotiations collapsed after Iran rejected a European proposal and resumed the production of uranium hexafluoride, a nuclear feedstock, at a plant in Isfahan – a process it had agreed to suspend.

European diplomats insist they would not seek economic sanctions against Iran at the UN but are looking for a Security Council statement that would encourage Tehran to resume the suspension of the Isfahan plant.

Diplomats acknowledge they face an uphill battle to win the support of Russia and China. "Both [Russia and China] are reserved and cautious at this stage and seeking to know what will happen in the Council," said a European diplomat.

The US and Europe could secure a vote at the IAEA through a simple majority. But their aim is to win a broad consensus, particularly including the support of Russia and China. The two countries are permanent members of the Security Council, with veto power, so forcing the dispute to New York without their approval could produce deadlock rather than stronger diplomatic action.

Iran Changes Tack In Nuclear Standoff (CSM)

DOJ_NMG_0002823

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, September 6, 2005

ISTANBUL, TURKEY - Iran's first fear about its controversial nuclear program has long been that it could provoke a US or Israeli military strike.

And a close second, until now, has been concern in Tehran that Iran could be referred to the United Nations Security Council for violations of the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT).

But even as Western diplomats begin to step up efforts to go after Iran at the UN - canvassing began in Vienna Monday, in the wake of the latest Iran report by the UN's International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) - Iran appears to be changing tack.

Tehran is minimizing the risk of Security Council sanction, which in turn is undermining the carrot-and-stick approach used by the EU and Washington in recent years to convince Iran to end all nuclear efforts.

"To a certain extent, [Iranian officials] have lost their fear of the Security Council," says Davoud Hermidas Bavand, a professor of international law at Alameh University in Tehran. "Some even say that Iran should take the issue to the Security Council, against the IAEA," he says, because a technical issue has become "politicized."

Shortly after the hard-liner Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was sworn in as president a month ago, Iran took a long-anticipated step of breaking IAEA seals at its Isfahan plant, ending a unilateral suspension of uranium-conversion activities.

The US says those activities - which the IAEA reports have converted seven tons of raw uranium into gas that can be enriched - are aimed at producing nuclear weapons. Iran denies the charge, saying it needs nuclear power, and that its right to master nuclear fuel technology is enshrined in the NPT.

The suspension was part of an earlier deal between Iran and Britain, France, and Germany, which sought to make it permanent in August by offering modest incentives. Iran rejected the proposal, which included no guarantees from the US of safety or waiving of current sanctions, prompting the Europeans to cancel meetings set for late August.

The confidential report, released Friday, found that 2-1/2 years of "intensive inspections and investigation" have not clarified outstanding issues, and that "Iran's full transparency is indispensable and overdue."

Still, the IAEA reported "good progress" in resolving a string of issues since 2003, and confirmed that traces of weapons-grade uranium found on centrifuge parts - held up by some US officials as evidence of a clandestine bomb effort - originated in Pakistan, as Iran has claimed.

Iran's new nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, said IAEA criticism was politically motivated, and that violations were "neither legal or technical."

"The tide of opinion in Tehran seems to have shifted," says Gary Samore, a nonproliferation official during the Clinton administration and vice president of the MacArthur Foundation in Chicago.

"Over the last two years, Iran's policy has been dominated by the desire to avoid referral to the Security Council, and Iran has been prepared to accept limits on its nuclear program in order to achieve that," says Mr. Samore, who is releasing an Iran dossier Tuesday under the auspices of the International Institute of Strategic Studies in London. "It does appear that Iran feels it's in a much stronger position."

High oil prices may give Tehran confidence that the council would not jeopardize the flow of Iran's petroleum into the market, says Samore. Other factors include American preoccupation with Iraq, and the decisive victory of Mr. Ahmadinejad at the polls last June.

Likely allies of Iran on the council include China and Russia, which is building a nuclear-power plant at Bushehr. Over the weekend, Russian officials made clear they saw "no reason" to send Iran to the council. Mr. Larijani is due to arrive in Pakistan Wednesday, after visits to China and India to galvanize non-Western support.

"The belief that [the US and EU] can weaken the will of this great nation with the baton of the Security Council is mistaken logic, and they are only losing their dignity," Larijani told Iranian state TV.

"Gone is the time when they could deny Iran its rights by threatening it," Foreign Ministry spokesman Hamid Reza Asefi, said on Sunday. "It is our legitimate right to have peaceful nuclear technology, and we will not give that up."

Europeans hope for a shift during talks between Ahmadinejad and other world leaders, including Russia, at the UN General Assembly in New York next week. The IAEA board of governors meets on Sept. 19 to consider the case.

"Ahmadinejad, and [Iran] in general, feels less threatened by the possibility of sanctions - they perceive they are stronger, and much more in control," says Hadi Semati, a political scientist from Tehran University, who is currently at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in Washington. "Domestically in Iran, it's going to be very hard for anyone to come out and say: 'OK, we're going to get rid of our [nuclear] fuel cycle' to get a few promises. That is political suicide.

"They know the Europeans are terrified to take Iran to the Security Council, because then the question is: 'What next?' " says Mr. Semati. And "down the line, [they feel] the US is bent on regime change anyway, even if it's not declared policy - so why bother?"

But such conclusions in Tehran are a high-stakes gamble, as is likely to be any Security Council response. Numerous safeguard violations over the past 20 years means that "until Iran restores confidence in its nuclear program, it should accept limits on activities that are dual use, and have military applications," says Samore. "There is a very strong legal case, [but] Council members are going to be very reluctant to impose significant sanctions on Iran."

A tough stance could prompt Iran to relaunch uranium enrichment, kick out inspectors, or - as some hard-liners have demanded - pull Iran out of the NPT.

"I think the council will react very cautiously, very incrementally," adds Samore. "It will take time, but there is no urgency. Iran is still a couple of years from having a nuclear-weapons capability, and there are some pretty significant technical problems."

Palestinian Forces Tour Evacuated Area (USAT)

USA Today, September 6, 2005

Palestinian security forces on Monday got their first look at Jewish settlements razed during Israel's withdrawal from Gaza. They toured the area before the formal hand-over in mid-September. The tour of the settlements in southern Gaza by Palestinian commanders and Israeli military officials was the first time Palestinian officials had been allowed into the communities. Israel removed all 8,500 settlers from Gaza last month.

International mediator James Wolfensohn has been meeting with both sides on unresolved issues, including who will control Gaza's border with Egypt. Israel wants some control over the border to prevent arms from being smuggled into Gaza and used against its people.

9 killed in Austrian ski resort accident

Nine Germans were killed when a helicopter dropped a 1,500-pound chunk of concrete on a cable carrying gondolas at the Soelden ski resort near Innsbruck, Austria.

Police official Edelbert Kohler said the helicopter was carrying material to a mountaintop construction site when it dropped the block, knocking one car off its wires and leaving others swinging so violently that their passengers were thrown out.

Up to 10 people had been seriously injured, according to the Red Cross.

Nuclear sub collides with ship in Gulf

The nuclear submarine USS Philadelphia, traveling on the surface in the Persian Gulf, collided with a Turkish cargo ship, but no one was hurt, and damage was minor, the 5th Fleet headquarters in Bahrain said. It was the U.S. Navy's second collision with a civilian vessel in the Gulf in 14 months.

Cmdr. Jeffrey Breslau said damage to the sub was “superficial.” He said the Turkish ship Yaso Aysen suffered minor damage to its hull. It was not known which vessel was at fault.

Afghan, U.S. forces kill suspected militants

Two hundred Afghan police, supported by U.S.-led coalition forces, killed 13 suspected Taliban fighters and detained 44 in a bid to curb militancy before elections Sept. 18, Kandahar Gov. Asadullah Khalid said. He said coalition and government forces suffered no casualties in the fighting Sunday in Kandahar province.

Congo hosts conference on saving apes

Governments and conservationists opened a week of talks in Congo's capital, Kinshasa, to study ways to save endangered apes from extinction. Great apes — gorillas, chimpanzees and orangutans — are threatened by logging, poaching and conflict worldwide. There are about 400,000 left in Africa and Asia, according to the United Nations. Representatives of 23 governments — most of them in Africa, plus Indonesia and Malaysia — are attending the meeting.

Egypt Vows To Build A Palestinian Gaza (WT)

By John Phillips

The Washington Times, September 6, 2005

CAIRO -- Egyptian Prime Minister Ahmed Nazif has pledged to help make the Gaza Strip the foundation of a Palestinian state "in every sense" and urged other countries to join Cairo in the push for Middle East peace.

"If we want Gaza to be the basis for a new Palestinian state long term, we have to provide [the residents] with homes and jobs, with security," Mr. Nazif told The Washington Times.

"A lot of effort has to go into rebuilding the infrastructure, not just in the political but in the economic sense."

Mr. Nazif said Cairo will make sure that Gaza has access to the outside world through Egyptian seaports and airports "to prevent the strip of territory being a prison" for its residents.

Egypt, which holds a presidential election tomorrow, also will provide technical support to develop the banking structure, the prime minister said Sunday during an interview at the high-rise office he maintains in a booming technology zone on the edge of the capital.

Egypt will use its knowledge of the Gaza Strip, which was once administered by Cairo, to develop economic assistance, he added. At the same time, it will press the Palestinians "to ensure that the Israelis don't see [Gaza] as a place for attacking them."

"Gaza has to be the beginning of a real state in every sense," Mr. Nazif said.

Other nations should support Egypt's efforts in the region, said the prime minister, 52, who has been credited with bringing a more dynamic style to Egypt's government since his appointment by President Hosni Mubarak last year.

"We have been actively seeking the resolution of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict in the past year and a half. We were almost working alone," he said.

"It culminated in the Sharm el Sheik meeting [between Israeli and Palestinian leaders], which had a calming-down role. ... We have been able to build the bridges that were required."

But now, Mr. Nazif said, "this will have to be followed by others to support and sustain these political gains."

Egypt and Israel have agreed that Israel will withdraw its troops from the Gaza-Egypt border -- to be replaced by 750 Egyptian troops charged with preventing arms smuggling into Gaza.

The Israeli Defense Ministry said yesterday that the Egyptians would begin taking up positions along the border in the coming days.

The forces are to patrol along a volatile corridor on the Gaza side of the border, where Israeli-Palestinian fighting has been particularly intense because of the arms smuggling.

Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas said yesterday that he and the Israelis remain at odds over other details of the border arrangement, but he hoped to conclude a deal "very soon."

The crossing into Egypt is the Gazans' most important link to the outside world. The Palestinians say free passage to Egypt will be essential for reviving the territory's economy after a 38-year occupation. But Israel wants to maintain some control over the border, fearing weapons could be smuggled into Gaza.

Mr. Nazif dismissed speculation that Egypt could become involved in a power struggle in Gaza between the Palestinian Authority and the hard-line Hamas movement, which some Egyptian journalists have idolized.

"I believe that if you ask the average Egyptian today he would support the moderate [Palestinian] factions," the prime minister said.

"You can't leave any faction out. It is important that the Palestinian security forces are organized and are not some kind of militia. The Palestinians understand that. We should not underestimate them."

Egyptian security forces, meanwhile, have concluded an investigation into the July 22 bombings at Sharm el Sheik resort, which killed 56 persons, and have excluded outside involvement in the attack.

"We know who did it, and that takes us a long way to knowing how to prevent it happening again," Mr. Nazif said.

Tourism to Egypt's constellation of dazzling Red Sea and Mediterranean resorts will continue to expand notwithstanding sporadic terrorist attacks, he predicted.

DOJ_NMG_0002826

Mr. Nazif said Mr. Mubarak's pledge to achieve 4.5 million jobs over the next six years is feasible given Egypt's oil and gas resources, tourist attractions and economic reforms to encourage investment by cutting taxation and customs duties.

"We have computed that 1 million tourists creates 200,000 jobs a year. We are attracting 1 million more tourists a year. We have started to create a business environment in Egypt [that is] supportive of investment," he said.

Voters Reverse Islamists' Rise In Pakistani Politics (CSM)

By Ashraf Khan

The Christian Science Monitor, September 6, 2005

KARACHI, PAKISTAN - Voters in Pakistan have dealt a surprising blow to religious extremists, bucking the rise in recent years of radical Islam in politics here.

Countrywide elections for local governments, which were held on August 18 and 25 in over 100 districts, reversed the gains made by radical Islamists who came to power in two out of the country's four provinces in 2002. They had played a strong opposition role in the federal parliament and posed a formidable challenge to President Pervez Musharraf's vow to bring "enlightened moderation" to Pakistani society.

The absence of full elections at the federal level has enhanced the importance of Pakistan's local and city government as a political bellwether. Observers here point to a number of reasons for the poor showing for the religious parties, including internal divisions; changes to the ballot; as well as a cooling off of tensions caused by the government's reorientation following Sept. 11, 2001.

"It apparently seems that the establishment has laid their hands off the Islamists and radicals' influence has faded all over the country," says Jaffer Ahmed, chairman of the Pakistan Study Centre at the University of Karachi. "But we can't say that their downfall has started," he hastened to add.

President Musharraf was jubilant the day after the polls closed. "Local body elections have resulted in the victory of moderates and defeat of extremists everywhere in Pakistan," he said.

The unexpected defeat of the Islamists came in the North Western Frontier Province (NWFP), which neighbors Afghanistan. The province had been ruled since 2002 by the Muttahida Majlis-e-Amal (MMA), an umbrella group of six religious parties, including the vanguard radical party Jamaat-e-Islami.

The MMA had emerged as a powerful political force in the October 2002 national elections, riding popular anger at Pakistan's support for the US ouster of the Taliban across the border in Afghanistan. The alliance also used a book as its symbol on the ballot, telling voters that the book represented the Koran, and that a vote for the MMA was a vote for Islam.

Once in office, the religious alliance continued to defy Musharraf's war on terror at home and abroad. Police began waging a Talibanesque antivice drive that included bans on music and attacks on billboard advertisements depicting women.

However, heading into the August vote, differences cropped up in the MMA and the alliance subsequently broke down on the local government level. With some distance from Sept. 11 and without the benefit of the book as its ballot symbol, the religious parties lost their majority to the Awami National Party (ANP), a secular Pashtun party.

"I am more than 100 percent satisfied, says Asfandyar Wali, chief of the ANP, which emerged as the single largest party in the province according to informal results. "We are very much able to head governments in all major cities including Peshawar [the provincial capital]."

When the MMA splintered, intriguing and odd political alliances came to the fore to win over the city governments. Jamaat-e-Islami chose to join hands with ANP, though they have diametrically opposed ideological positions with the ANP, a party formed in 1986 by the merger of several left-leaning parties.

"These are the dynamics of the politics and these are only election alliances not an ideological merger," says Mr. Wali, who pledged to carry on a secular vision of government in the cities.

Waning influence of Islamists, who have given way to secular and moderate parties, makes many believe the wave of fundamentalism could be forestalled effectively in the frontier province and at the polls in the next national elections in 2007.

But the MMA could yet regroup, especially if outside engagement with Pakistan wanes, says Mr. Ahmed. "It would all depend on the US and Western countries' attitude towards Pakistan, whose role seems to be diminishing now for them," he says.

After New Talks, India Says It May Pull Troops From Kashmir (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

NEW DELHI, Sept. 5 - India will pull back troops from the disputed territory of Kashmir if militant infiltration and violence ends, the prime minister's office announced Monday evening after a rare meeting with Kashmiri separatists.

The meeting, between Prime Minister Manmohan Singh and the All Parties Hurriyat Conference, a coalition of moderate separatists from Kashmir, came barely a week before the leaders of India and Pakistan are to meet during a United Nations General Assembly session in New York. Pakistan has expressed growing frustration with what it calls New Delhi's reluctance to tackle the problem of Kashmir.

The region is the only Muslim-majority state in Hindu-dominated India, and it is at the heart of a half-century conflict between the two South Asian neighbors. Since 1989 Kashmir has been roiled by an anti-Indian insurgency that India blames Pakistan for, and that Pakistan says it supports only by moral and political means. The Hurriyat leaders recently met with President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan.

In the statement, the prime minister's office said it would also review the cases of all those held under special preventive detention in Kashmir and take steps to "safeguard against human rights violations."

The most far-reaching pledge was on pulling out troops, whose presence across Kashmir is an enduring source of anger and alienation among many Kashmiris.

"The prime minister said that if there is a cessation of violence and an end to infiltration, conditions will be created for the reduction of armed forces," the statement read. "It was agreed that the only way forward is to ensure that all forms of violence at all levels should come to an end."

In an interview with the private New Delhi television station NDTV, the leader of the separatist coalition, Mirwaiz Umar Farooq, heralded the talks as the start of a credible conversation. "For first time, there seems to be a realization in Delhi that we need to have a solution in Kashmir, an honorable solution," he said. "It was definitely a very good beginning."

Insurgency May Not Be Based On Islamic Militancy (WT)

By Shaikh Azizur Rahman

The Washington Times, September 6, 2005

NEW DELHI -- The killing last month of a Hindu militant and the arrests of two others are raising doubts about the government's assertion that the bloody insurgency in Kashmir is being fought simply in the interests of Islamic militancy.

Indian forces killed Uttam Singh, 23, and three Muslim jihadis on Aug. 19. The night-long gunbattle came during an attempt by a group of militants to kill or abduct an Indian Muslim soldier from his house in the border region of Kashmir. Police later discovered that Mr. Singh, alias Saifullah, was one of two Hindu sector commanders in Hizbul-Kashmir, a rebel group that seeks to include all of Kashmir in Pakistan.

Police said that five years ago, Mr. Singh crossed into Pakistan, where he was trained in the use of arms and explosives. In 2003, he returned to India and was made commander of his group in Kashmir's southern Doda region, leading about 120 militants, including seven Hindus.

Just three days after his death, police announced the capture in New Delhi of Virender Singh, a 25-year-old Hindu. Police said he was a Hizbul operative in charge of supplying arms and funds to his jihadi colleagues on missions across the country.

On Aug. 24, Hindu Hizbul militant Chattar Singh was arrested in Doda while carrying a pistol and grenades.

A senior officer at the Defense Ministry in New Delhi subsequently acknowledged that four other Hindu militants had been killed fighting alongside the Kashmiri jihadis in the past three years.

However, he would not accept the notion they might have been willing combatants.

"We have information that about a dozen Hindu militants are still active in Kashmir. We believe they were all forced to join militancy at gunpoint," the officer said.

"Being Hindus, they could never subscribe to the religious or political faith of the jihadis who are fighting for Kashmir's separation from Hindu-majority India."

DOJ_NMG_0002828

At least 45,000 people have died in a struggle that India's Hindu political leaders say is purely religious in nature, but that many former and present militant leaders describe as political.

"Fifteen years ago -- when we started the movement against Indian occupation in Kashmir -- during curfew, our cadres carried rice and vegetables first to the Hindus in Srinagar, before Muslims got them," said Yasin Malik, chairman of the Jammu and Kashmir Liberation Front, the first militant group to fight New Delhi's rule in the region.

Some 125,000 people have fled the Kashmir Valley since the insurgency began in 1989, but Mr. Malik said that "more than 6,000 Muslim families, too, ran away from the valley fearing the guns of the militants. Falsely, we were branded communal and anti-Hindu."

Shakeel Wani, a former Hizbul militant who lost an eye while training at a camp in Pakistan and now sells fruits in Srinagar, said that at least 100 Hindu Kashmiri boys had fought alongside the Muslim jihadis.

"They embraced Islam and touched the Koran before they touched an AK-47 [rifle]. You cannot call them Hindus anymore. Despite being Hindu, on jihadi missions here often they fight more fiercely than their Muslim counterparts, probably to prove their loyalty," he said.

Suresh Yadav, an Indian Border Security Force battalion commander who served in Kashmir for three years, said poverty -- caused in part by the insurgency itself -- was the key factor behind young Hindus joining the militants.

"Hindu boys from poverty-stricken families in the border districts have joined the Islamic rebel groups who offer good [pay] packages to them while they fight, and also to their families in case of their deaths," he said.

Lebanon's President Facing Growing Pressure To Resign (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Sept. 5 - Pressure has been mounting in recent days for the resignation of President Émile Lahoud, who has clung to office even as his Syrian backers have been forced to withdraw from the country.

Lebanon's recently elected prime minister and his cabinet are avoiding Mr. Lahoud, and his influence is hard to detect in most government offices.

He keeps a low profile, rarely making public appearances or giving interviews. But as hard as he may try to remain out of sight, he has been on many minds here in recent days, as Lebanese have taken to predicting his imminent political demise.

Things appeared to come crashing down on Mr. Lahoud last week, when four senior security men, including his current head of security, Mustafa Hamdan, were cited as suspects by a United Nations investigation into the assassination of a former prime minister, Rafik Hariri.

"It is all but sure now that he will have to step down - the question is when," said Fares Boueiz, a lawyer who is a former minister of foreign affairs and the environment. "The man is no longer able to rule the country, and I don't think this can last another two months."

The suspects - Jamil al-Sayyed, former chief of general security; Ali Hajj, former chief of the Lebanese police; Raymond Azar, a former military intelligence chief; and Mr. Hamdan - were charged with murder, attempted murder and carrying out a terrorist act. The men, once feared as Syria's proxies in Lebanon, faced formal proceedings before a Lebanese investigative judge over the weekend.

Mr. Lahoud is not a formal suspect in the investigation, for which a report is expected to be issued next month, and has been cooperating with investigators, Detlev Mehlis, the chief United Nations investigator, said last week. But Mr. Lahoud's close ties to the suspects and his unusual step of arguing Mr. Hamdan's innocence with the investigators only deepened the suspicion of him.

"They are the president's men, his collaborators, and even though they are not indicted yet, Lahoud is politically isolated," said Nawaf Salam, professor of political science at the American University in Beirut. "The closer we are to the date of the release of Mehlis's report, the more isolated Lahoud will become."

In a defiant statement last week, Mr. Lahoud insisted that he intended to complete his term in office, which ends in 2007. "I will continue to fulfill my responsibilities to safeguard the Constitution, Lebanese laws and the integrity of Lebanese territory," the statement said.

Mr. Lahoud served under the nationalist general Michel Aoun during the final years of the civil war of the 1970's and 80's, then crossed over into Syrian-controlled west Beirut when the war ended, breaking with General Aoun. Mr. Lahoud made his name by uniting and leading the Lebanese Army for almost a decade, then ran for the presidency and won in 1998. His popularity reached a nadir, though, when Syria helped force through a constitutional amendment extending his term last September, which became a touchstone for the political turbulence of the past year.

So far, he has survived thanks to the same force that has kept most other Lebanese bosses in power: sectarianism. He has appealed to fellow Christians who may despise his politics, but would hesitate to bring down one of their own. Earlier pressure to oust him failed because Cardinal Nasrallah Sfeir, the influential Maronite prelate, intervened and because of international pressure on the government not to do anything that would destabilize the country.

But much has changed. The government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora has sought to prove its mettle and build legitimacy, encouraging Lebanon's judiciary to take a leading role in the investigation of Mr. Hariri's killing.

The formal charges placed against the four men on Thursday sent another significant message.

"Pointing to the security chiefs as suspects may have put Lebanon on the track of stability and ended the cycle of assassinations and explosions," said Mr. Salam, the American University professor. "Now people realize that they are held accountable for any act of terror they might commit."

Many government figures have begun publicly demanding Mr. Lahoud's resignation.

"These are the people who worked for Mr. Lahoud," said Nayla Mouawad, minister of social affairs.

Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, the leader of the militant Hezbollah organization and a traditional ally of Mr. Lahoud who had opposed his ouster, acknowledged over the weekend that the president was in an "uncomfortable" position.

Perhaps the biggest factor standing in the way of Mr. Lahoud's ouster is the difficulty of impeaching him. The Lebanese Constitution has little mechanism for impeachment, short of treason. Legal experts say the only way to remove Mr. Lahoud would be through a constitutional amendment.

With a requirement since the settlement at the end of the civil war that the president be a Christian, there is also the problem of a lack of an acceptable alternative to Mr. Lahoud. While many Christian figures have expressed interest in the job, none has the consensus or voting base to take over. Walid Jumblatt and Saad Hariri, son of the assassinated former prime minister, lead the largest voting bloc in Parliament, and are determined to keep General Aoun, who returned from 15 years of exile to a substantial victory in the parliamentary election, out of that position. Christian leaders, meanwhile, are determined that they will not allow the ruling bloc to dictate to them.

"What is keeping him right now is the lack of an agreement between the different powers controlling Lebanon," Nawaf Kabbara, professor of political science at Balamand University in Beirut, said of Mr. Lahoud. "But such an agreement will be reached by the time Mehlis releases his report."

Business Chiefs Give Blunt Warning On Doha Talks (FT)

By Alan Beattie

Financial Times, September 6, 2005

The Doha round of global trade talks may be “on the verge of failure”, an association of global business leaders warns on Tuesday.

A blunt statement from six business associations, including the US Business Roundtable, an association of chief executives of leading corporations, says delay in the agricultural talks is holding up progress in goods and services liberalisation, which is economically far more significant.

“Only a few months remain for World Trade Organisation member governments to save the Doha development agenda,” the statement says. “The great hopes for global economic growth and development promised by this trade round are now at serious risk.”

DOJ_NMG_0002830

The warning comes as the WTO returns to work after its summer break, with four months remaining before December's ministerial meeting in Hong Kong. Progress in the talks has been slow. Pascal Lamy, the WTO's new director-general, said last week the director-general "does not have a magic wand" to conjure up a deal.

Without a significant breakthrough in the agricultural talks and, particularly, a commitment from the EU and US to cut farm tariffs rather than the lesser goal of ending export subsidies, the big emerging markets such as India and Brazil are unlikely to agree radical liberalisation of their goods and services markets.

In August, for example, India announced a more ambitious offer to liberalise its service industries, making it easier for foreign architects and life insurers, among others, to set up in India. But officials stressed the offer would merely legally bind the liberalisation the government had already carried out unilaterally rather than allowing fresh business opportunities.

Tuesday's statement says goods tariffs should be cut to zero in sectors where industry demands it. But that request has been rejected by India, which maintains significant tariffs on many of its manufactured imports.

The statement is signed by the Japanese Nippon Keidanren, the European Round Table of Industrialists and by business associations in Australia, Mexico and Canada. Businesses have been accused of directing too much of their lobbying effort into bilateral and regional trade deals rather than into the WTO talks.

Peter Mandelson, trade commissioner, recently complained of a lack of business support for the Doha round.

Guy Sebban, secretary-general of the International Chamber of Commerce, told the FT last week that governments, not businesses, had led the drive towards bilateral deals. "The sum of all bilaterals is nothing like as good as a far-reaching multilateral deal." Harold McGraw, CEO of publisher McGraw-Hill and chairman of the Business Roundtable's trade task force, said: "It is vital that WTO members not lower expectations."

EU And China Near Textile Deal (FT)

By Ben Hall And George Parker

Financial Times, September 6, 2005

China and the European Commission struck an eleventh-hour agreement on Monday to end their dispute about imports of cheap Chinese textiles, but EU member states have yet to approve it.

After marathon talks in Beijing stretching into the early hours of Monday morning, Peter Mandelson, EU trade commissioner, and Bo Xilai, his Chinese counterpart, agreed to release Chinese garments impounded at Europe's ports "as soon as possible".

Mr Mandelson said the two sides had agreed to "sensible, reasonable, burden-sharing" regarding the fate of 77m Chinese sweaters, trousers and bras impounded at the EU's borders.

The Commission proposes to wave through half of the impounded garments. China accepted that the rest would be deducted either from its 2006 textile quota, or switched to other unfilled-quota categories.

The decision marked a softening of China's stance. Trade officials from the EU's 25 member states will on Tuesday consider whether it goes far enough.

Mr Mandelson hopes the agreement will be approved by EU textile producing countries such as France, Spain and Italy, even though it means allowing into the shops 38m unlicensed Chinese garments, ordered by retailers "in good faith" but which fell foul of quotas agreed on June 10.

The EU has already allowed in 135m Chinese pullovers given import licences in a frenetic period between June 10 and July 12, when the new quotas came into force. The agreed pullover quota for 2005 was 69m.

The textile dispute overshadowed an EU-China summit in Beijing, where Tony Blair, who holds the rotating EU presidency, argued the west should welcome China's economic rise.

After talks with Hu Jintao, China's president, and Wen Jiabao, Chinese premier, Mr Blair said further trade liberalisation was inevitable and that Europe should see China's booming economy as an opportunity not a threat.

"There is of course a case for managing change," the prime minister said. "What there is not a case for is resisting change."

DOJ_NMG_0002831

Mr Blair and his Chinese counterparts characterised the textiles dispute as a minor irritant in a flourishing EU-China relationship.

But it reflects Europe's difficulty in developing deeper political ties with the emerging superpower, notwithstanding an agreement to co-operate more closely on climate change reached yesterday.

Mr Mandelson, who resisted reintroduction of quotas on China in June, said that this time the EU needed to take greater care in managing the textile quotas and would have to step up contact with importers and producers. The measures were aimed at "smoothing a transition to a period when there are no quotas at all". Sir Digby Jones, director general of UK employers organisation the CBI, said borrowing from next year's quota to satisfy consumer demand was no long-term solution.

"The real answer is to allow access to the EU for goods produced in China and for EU producers to adapt to the competitive challenge," he said. "Quotas, agreed or otherwise, are not the way for the developed world to deal with globalisation."

EU Eases Quotas On China Trade, Breaking Logjam (WSJ)

By Andrew Browne, Federica Bianchi, Juliane Von Reppert-Bismarck And Marc Champion

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

China and the European Union reached an agreement to end a trade spat yesterday that had left millions of Chinese-made sweaters, bras and trousers stranded at European ports, threatening to sour a meeting of Chinese and European leaders in Beijing.

Both sides hailed the textile accord, which still needs the approval of EU member countries, as a fair compromise.

Tensions over the textiles have been an embarrassment to the EU, which has been courting China as a trade partner and rising strategic power. The standoff also was a setback for the top EU trade official, Peter Mandelson, after a quota system he championed in June to hold back a surge in Chinese textiles ended up creating chaos at European ports and causing division in the 25-nation EU. European importers had rushed to beat deadlines resulting from the June agreement, and in a matter of weeks the annual allotments filled up, leaving the excess clogging European docks.

Under the June quota system, growth in 10 categories of goods was capped at between 8% and 12.5% until 2008. Now, under yesterday's deal, Europe will ease quotas to admit half of the surplus. China agreed for the remaining half to be deducted from next year's quotas, or from quotas for other types of textiles, said Simon Fraser, a senior aide to Mr. Mandelson. China also agreed not to issue any more export licenses for textiles that have exceeded their European quota, the official said.

EU officials and diplomats expect European governments to approve the agreement today.

"The result was fair and equitable for both sides," Chinese Premier Wen Jiabao said at a news conference after the summit, which focused on issues such as the environment and security as well as trade.

The U.S. also is bogged down in a trade dispute with China over its textile exports, which have rocketed since the demise of a global quota system in January. Just last week, Chinese and U.S. negotiators failed to reach agreement on a comprehensive plan to restrain the overall growth of Chinese textile exports to replace piecemeal U.S. curbs, most recently on bras and synthetic fabric.

Industry analysts said the EU agreement didn't presage a similar breakthrough with the U.S. "They're completely separate," said Paul MacKenzie, head of consumer research at Hong Kong-based CLSA Asia-Pacific Markets. He said the EU deal was aimed at resolving a particular mess that both sides had created by failing to put in place a system to monitor textile trade volumes that is transparent enough to show the rate at which quotas were filling up.

However, Chinese Commerce Minister Bo Xilai, at a separate news conference with Mr. Mandelson after the summit wrapped up, said he expected a textile deal with the U.S. "quite soon." He complimented his EU counterpart, saying that in comparison with U.S. officials, "Mr. Mandelson was more active."

Yesterday's agreement was clinched just in time to lift a cloud over a China-EU summit attended by José Manuel Barroso, president of the European Commission, and Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain, which holds the six-month rotational EU presidency. The textile row had become a test of the strength of the EU-China relationship and the ability of both sides to handle even more contentious issues, like whether to lift a ban on EU arms exports to China.

DOJ_NMG_0002832

As he sought to extricate the EU from its predicament, Mr. Mandelson was caught in the crossfire between retailers in countries like Britain and Sweden, anxious to stock their shelves before winter with Chinese-made warm clothes, and producers in countries like France, Italy and Spain who fear inexpensive Chinese imports will devastate their industry.

Chinese industry players welcomed the EU agreement, which focuses on unblocking 48 million sweaters, 18 million trousers and more than 11 million Chinese-made brassieres.

"It may save losses and mend reputation for both Chinese and European companies," said Cao Xinyu, vice chairman of the China Chamber of Commerce for the Import and Export of Textiles. Mr. Cao said he was confident the standoff was a one-time problem caused by poor implementation of the quota agreement.

European textile producers were less pleased. "This deal has been reached at the expense of industry," said Francesco Marchi, legal adviser at European textile-maker lobby Euratex in Brussels. Admitting half the surplus is "a free gift," he added, "and there is no compensation at all for us."

The EU looks to China as a huge market for its exports. China overtook Japan to become the EU's second largest trading partner in 2003, behind the U.S., and Mr. Blair is just the latest in a string of major European leaders -- including French President Jacques Chirac and German Chancellor Gerhard Schröder last year -- to visit China at the head of a large business delegation in search of contracts.

Unlike Washington, the EU has no significant military presence or ambitions in the Far East or Pacific Ocean, and it has no commitment to aid Taiwan in the event of its attack by Chinese forces. As a result, EU leaders -- and Mr. Chirac in particular -- have seen China as an opportunity to boost job creation in their own high-unemployment economies while at the same time building a strategic partnership not dependent on the U.S.

But this year, the budding EU-China partnership has hit speed bumps. EU leaders had planned in June to lift an embargo on arms sales to China that was imposed after the 1989 Tiananmen Square crackdown, replacing it with a code of conduct that wouldn't be specific to China. But a sharp and ill-timed Chinese declaration on Taiwan, combined with ferocious opposition to lifting the embargo from the U.S. Congress, led the U.K. to force a delay. The EU remains committed in principle to lifting the arms embargo, but with Mr. Blair setting the agenda as the EU's rotating president, the embargo is unlikely to return for debate until next year.

China Oil Firm Refines Kazakh Deal (WSJ)

By Jason Singer and Guy Chazan

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

China National Petroleum Corp., which last month triumphed in a bidding war to buy a strategically important oil company with operations in neighboring Kazakhstan, is in talks to sell as much as half of the $4.18 billion acquisition to Kazakhstan's state-owned oil firm even before the first deal is closed, according to people familiar with the matter.

A deal by CNPC, as China National Petroleum is called, to sell a 33% to 50% stake in PetroKazakhstan Inc., a Canadian company with operations in the oil-rich central-Asian state, to KazMunaiGaz, the state-owned oil company, is expected to be sealed in the next few weeks, these people said. The price tag on such a deal with KMG, as the state firm is known, wasn't clear.

The move would be the latest example of a petroleum-rich country exerting more influence on its natural resources during a period of sky-high oil prices. Other oil-exporting nations, from Venezuela to Nigeria, recently have been seeking to claim a larger share of the wealth extracted from oil buried under their land. Russian authorities, too, have been trying to tighten their grip on the country's energy sector.

Kazakhstan is a nation of 15 million people on China's western border that is strategically important because of its proximity to China.

PetroKazakhstan is based in Calgary, Alberta, and analysts say it has promising stores of reserves. However, it is considered a relatively small player in the industry. Its production is estimated to be equivalent to a little more than 1% of China's daily oil needs.

PetroKazakhstan Vice President and Treasurer Jeffrey Auld said he hadn't heard anything about talks between KMG and CNPC. KazMunaiGaz declined to comment. Wang Hongtao, a spokesman for CNPC, said "there are no such talks happening."

DOJ_NMG_0002833

For CNPC, selling a stake in PetroKazakhstan to the state-run company would smooth its original $4.18 billion agreement to buy the Kazakh oil assets. In the past, other Chinese firms have tried to buy assets in the oil-rich region only to be blocked by the Kazakh government, which said it wanted them.

CNPC won an auction for PetroKazakhstan in August, beating out a competing bid by a joint venture between ONGC Videsh Ltd., the international arm of India's state-controlled Oil & Natural Gas Corp., and an investment company owned by London steel tycoon Lakshmi Mittal. The losing consortium has said it is still considering making a higher counterbid.

By selling a stake in PetroKazakhstan to the state-run Kazakh firm, CNPC would remove a potential legal hurdle to its acquisition. A new Kazakh law gives the state-owned oil company an option to purchase, pre-emptively, any major oil-and-gas venture put up for sale.

Officials are debating whether the law applies to CNPC's efforts to buy PetroKazakhstan. Some argue it does apply because all of PetroKazakhstan's operations are in Kazakhstan. Others argue it doesn't apply because PetroKazakhstan is based in Canada. In either event, selling a stake to the government could appease both sides.

If it is cleared to go through, CNPC's agreement to buy PetroKazakhstan is scheduled to close in October.

It isn't clear if KMG would buy the stake from CNPC after the closing or, if an agreement can be reached earlier, KMG might pay PetroKazakhstan's shareholders directly for the holding.

It's Time To Calm Down About The China 'Threat' (WSJ)

By George Melloan

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

The Katrina disaster offered the White House a plausible reason to postpone tomorrow's planned visit from Chinese President Hu Jintao, but the delay was unfortunate. President George W. Bush needs to discuss some important issues with Mr. Hu.

The U.S. wants Mr. Hu to improve human rights, cool down the cross-strait feuding with Taiwan and do more to persuade North Korea that nuclear blackmail is a dangerous game. Mr. Bush, for his part, could try to stop spurious attacks on China for sins it hasn't committed, like currency manipulation. In America's overheated politics, there are far too many ill-informed attempts to paint China as an economic aggressor.

It would be unfortunate if U.S.-China relations, despite years of nurture, descended into a Cold War. But wars, hot and cold, are often provoked by misjudgments, misinformation or mistrust. There's plenty of all three in the current relationship. The U.S., which even China itself recognizes as the senior partner because of its economic and political power, has a global obligation to behave with sufficient maturity to reduce the danger of mischance.

Mr. Hu had planned a speech at Yale and visits to Microsoft and Boeing in Seattle as part of what was billed as a goodwill tour. These were also postponed at last report. He and Mr. Bush will meet on the sidelines of the United Nations General Assembly summit in New York next week. But that won't be an ideal venue for serious talks, given distractions that will include questions about the future of the scandal-ridden U.N. itself.

The issue that has aroused U.S. politicians is whether China's economic growth and arms buildup pose a threat to U.S. interests. One of Mr. Hu's key advisers, Zheng Bijian, assures us that they don't in the lead article in the latest Foreign Affairs. He writes that China is committed to a "peaceful rise" to great power status.

Mr. Hu, at a ceremony Saturday in the Great Hall of the People commemorating the formal Japanese surrender 60 years ago, declared: "China did not seek hegemony in the past, and it will never seek hegemony in the future." This is the promise Mr. Hu will bring on his first U.S. visit as China's president to Americans fearful of Chinese aggression.

Politicians of course make promises they don't keep and this doesn't denote a fundamental change in Chinese internal politics. The ruling Communist Party Mr. Hu heads is allowing more economic policy debate internally, but it has become more rigid of late on how much political debate it will permit. The party is very much aware of the tensions building up as the greater wealth and privileges of the party elite generate resentments among the broad masses.

Chinese leaders know they can't afford U.S. enmity while they face unrest at home. China has followed the Japanese, South Korean and Taiwanese models of export-led growth, so its continued economic development, and political stability, is heavily dependent on exports. Its foreign trade now totals $851 billion, the highest in the world, Mr. Zheng points out.

Yet he also notes that despite average economic growth of 9.4% a year for the last 27 years, since it opened its doors wide to foreign investment, its economy is only one-seventh the size of the U.S. economy and only one-third the size of Japan's. It is relatively short of arable land, water and natural resources. And ". . . it will take another 45 years -- until 2050 -- before it can be called a modernized, medium-level developed country." Among the problems "is a lack of coordination between economic and social development."

That seemingly anodyne last comment actually carries a world of meaning, especially when you consider that Mr. Zheng may be voicing a major concern of China's leaders. It is quite evident to close observers that a Communist Party that has introduced private capitalism so successfully still is perplexed about how to deal with the social conflicts brought about by increased wealth. Thousands of protests and demonstrations around the country by people demanding their legal rights are broken up by the security police, sending the message that the party is above the law. Falling back on Communist ideology as a unifying force doesn't work.

The U.S. has its own problems. Mr. Bush's political opponents, frustrated by their failures, have resorted to frenzied accusations that he is guilty of everything from Hurricane Katrina to a shortage of condoms in Uganda. This frenzy is feeding on the New Orleans tragedy and what is sure to be a big fight over his Supreme Court nominees.

The self-appointed leader of the China-bashing pack is Democratic Senator Chuck Schumer of New York. He attacked China's trade "unfairness" last month in a paper that among other factual errors claimed that direct investors in China must have Chinese partners. That is no longer true and the report cards of most independent groups say that China has done well in complying with World Trade Organization rules. But in response to such agitation, the U.S. has just reversed itself on the lifting of textile quotas, re-imposing them on some Chinese apparel items.

There is risk inherent in the grandstanding of U.S. politicians on such issues, particularly ones where China is essentially blameless such as currency management or textile exports. The Chinese leadership may fail to manage a transition to more democratic rule, something they clearly aren't handling well at this point. If China falls into chaos, Chinese politicians are just as capable as their American brethren of seeking scapegoats. Given the antipathy towards the American president that has been drummed up from places like Berlin, Paris and the salons of Georgetown, what better scapegoat than George Bush?

That's why Mr. Bush and Mr. Hu need to come to a better understanding, setting aside spurious issues and dwelling on ways the two countries can cooperate to keep China on the course it desires, to become a "modernized, medium-level developed country." Mr. Bush can offer wise counsel: To do that, it will have to become more democratic.

Ukrainian Official Resigns In Protest (WT/AP)

By Natasha Lisova, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 6, 2005

KIEV -- A close aide to President Viktor Yushchenko who was a chief organizer of the "Orange Revolution" protests said yesterday he had resigned from the government because of systemic corruption around the Ukrainian leader.

Oleksandr Zinchenko, who resigned Saturday, said the situation had grown "even worse" than under former President Leonid Kuchma.

Mr. Zinchenko accused Petro Poroshenko, the head of Ukraine's Defense and Security Council, of being one of the most corrupt members of the government. He also criticized Oleksandr Tretyakov, a top aide to Mr. Yushchenko, and Mykola Martynenko, who heads the president's faction in parliament.

Mr. Poroshenko attended the press conference, which was broadcast live, and stood in the back frowning as Mr. Zinchenko spoke. When Mr. Zinchenko completed his prepared statement, lengthy applause broke out in the room.

Mr. Zinchenko's departure as state secretary is the first major resignation since Mr. Yushchenko took office in January, after last year's bitter and prolonged campaign in this former Soviet republic.

DOJ_NMG_0002835

Mr. Zinchenko said he decided to make such a "sharp public announcement" to ensure that Ukrainians and Mr. Yushchenko understood the extent of the problem. He said he had repeatedly called on Mr. Yushchenko to fire Mr. Poroshenko.

"With my resignation, I am trying to sharply convey this danger to the president and his team," Mr. Zinchenko said.

Mr. Poroshenko took the podium and said it was "the hardest day" of his life. Clearly angry, he accused Mr. Zinchenko of trying to "explode [Mr. Yushchenko's] team from the inside" and challenged him to find evidence to back up his charges.

"He didn't look in my eyes the entire time he was reading his statement," Mr. Poroshenko said of his former ally.

Mr. Zinchenko, who had served as deputy speaker of parliament, was initially aligned with Mr. Kuchma. He was a senior party official in the Ukrainian Socialist Party (United), headed by Mr. Kuchma's former chief of staff, Viktor Medvedchuk.

Experts Find Reduced Effects Of Chernobyl (NYT)

By Elisabeth Rosenthal, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

ROME, Sept. 5 - Nearly 20 years after the huge accident at the Chernobyl nuclear power plant in Ukraine, a new scientific report has found that its aftereffects on health and the environment have not proved as dire as scientists had predicted.

The report was prepared by a panel of more than 100 experts convened by United Nations agencies.

It says huge compensation programs for people in the Chernobyl region have become "a major barrier to the region's recovery," both by creating a culture of dependency and by soaking up a high percentage of the region's resources. It recommends that the compensation programs be cut back.

The report, "Chernobyl's Legacy: Health, Environmental and Socio-Economic Impacts," says 4,000 deaths will probably be attributable to the accident ultimately - compared with the tens of thousands predicted at the time of the accident.

Only 50 deaths - all among the reactor staff and emergency workers - can be directly attributed to acute radiation exposure after Chernobyl's Reactor No. 4 exploded in April 1986, the panel found. The rest will be from cancer at a higher rate than would otherwise be expected in people exposed to radiation near Chernobyl in the wake of the accident.

But for millions of people who were subjected to low levels of radioactive particles spread by the wind, health effects have proved generally minimal, the report found.

The powerful explosion that rocked Chernobyl sent chunks of the reactor core into the surrounding fields and clouds of radioactive particles into the air. The fire burned for 10 days and released radioactive particles that were carried by the wind to large rural swaths of what was then the Soviet Union. The particles settled in human bodies and homes and contaminated fields, forests and livestock.

The report acknowledged that there was a core of people, probably 100,000 to 200,000, who continued to be severely affected by the disaster.

But seven million people in what are now Russia, Ukraine and Belarus still receive some kind of Chernobyl benefits, from monthly stipends to university entrance preference to therapeutic annual vacations. In Ukraine, the number of people designated as permanently disabled by the Chernobyl accident (and their children) increased from 200 in 1991 to 64,500 in 1997 and 91,219 in 2001 - even though the effects of radiation decline over time, the report noted. Both Ukraine and Belarus still spend about 5 percent of their annual budgets on Chernobyl victims.

The panel found that contrary to previous forecasts, there had been no observed rise in the incidence of leukemia, a blood cancer widely associated with radiation exposure - except for a small increase among workers who were in the contaminated plant. Nor has there been the expected detectable decrease in fertility or increase in birth defects.

Indeed, the report concludes that "the largest public health problem unleashed by the accident" is "the mental health impact." Residents of the region, who view themselves as victims of a tragedy they poorly understand, are still haunted by anxiety that has prevented many from restarting their lives.

In the immediate aftermath of the disaster, the Soviet Union declared an 18-mile "exclusion zone" around the reactor, which still exists, and resettled hundreds of thousands of people. Agriculture was forbidden in contaminated areas, as was the collection of forest products like berries and mushrooms. A host of compensation schemes were established.

"People have developed a paralyzing fatalism because they think they are at much higher risk than they are, so that leads to things like drug and alcohol use, and unprotected sex and unemployment," said Dr. Fred A. Mettler, leader of the team analyzing health effects for the Chernobyl Forum, a research group comprising United Nations agencies and representatives of affected countries.

The only concrete health impact in the region has been thyroid cancer in people who were young at the time of the accident and drank contaminated milk from cows that ate grass contaminated with radioactive iodine dispersed during by the accident. Radioactive iodine, which is short-lived, concentrates in the thyroid gland. Because the disease is generally treatable, only 9 of the 2,000 who have come down with the disease have died.

Other than the thyroid cancer cases, other cancers and adverse health effects, when they occur, may be particularly difficult to link to the Chernobyl accident, because life expectancy dropped dramatically in the region after the fall of the Soviet Union. "The effect may be difficult to detect against the background noise," Dr. Mettler said.

"Early on, there were all sorts of claims being made because people didn't have much accurate information," said Dr. Mettler, a University of New Mexico expert on the effects of radiation exposure. "Now, at last, we have the eight U.N. agencies and the three governments involved coming to a consensus about the effects and what needs to be done."

Although five million people live in areas still classified as contaminated by Chernobyl, a vast majority are exposed to very low doses of radiation, the study found, with levels no higher than in large areas of China, Brazil or Britain, where naturally occurring background radiation in soil is relatively high.

"People were evacuated from areas that now have dose levels lower than where I live in New Mexico," Dr. Mettler said.

Although there is still a strong stigma against growing or eating agricultural products from anywhere in the area, concentrations of radioactivity "in agricultural food products produced in areas affected by the Chernobyl fallout are generally below national and international action levels," the report found.

Those who continue to be affected by the accident include poor rural dwellers who live in the few severely contaminated areas, those with thyroid cancer and those who were resettled after the disaster but who had never found a new life or employment in their new communities.

"A small but important minority, those caught in the downward spiral, need substantial material assistance to rebuild their lives," the report said. But for the millions of others designated as victims, it said, the priority should be to encourage self-reliance, providing them with realistic information about the minimal risks they face.

Noting that the collapse of the Soviet Union - and the end of Soviet-era benefit programs - worsened the poverty of the region, the researchers said its people should now be provided with incentives to develop small businesses, for example.

"The extensive system of Chernobyl-related benefits has created expectations of long-term direct financial support and entitlement to privileges, and has undermined the capacity of the individuals and communities concerned to tackle their own economic and social problems," the report concluded.

Chernobyl's Harm Was Far Less Than Predicted, U.N. Report Says (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

MOSCOW, Sept. 5 -- The long-term health and environmental impacts of the 1986 accident at the Chernobyl nuclear power plant in Ukraine, while severe, were far less catastrophic than feared, according to a major new report by eight U.N. agencies.

The governments of Ukraine, Belarus and Russia, the three countries most affected by radioactive fallout from Chernobyl, should strive to end the "paralyzing fatalism" of tens of thousands of their citizens who wrongly believe they are still at risk of an early death, according to the study released Monday.

The 600-page report found that as of the middle of this year, the accident had caused fewer than 50 deaths directly attributable to radiation, most of them among emergency workers who died in the first months after the accident. In the wake of the world's largest nuclear disaster, there were numerous predictions of mass fatalities from radiation.

The report said that nine children had died of thyroid cancer, but that the survival rate among the 4,000 children in the region who had developed thyroid cancer has been 99 percent. An expected spike in fertility problems and birth defects also failed to materialize, the study found.

"The health effects of the accident were potentially horrific, but when you add them up using validated conclusions from good science, the public health effects were not nearly as substantial as had at first been feared," Michael Repacholi, manager of the World Health Organization's radiation program, said in a statement.

U.N. scientists predicted about 4,000 eventual radiation-related deaths among 600,000 people in the affected area, including emergency workers and residents. That is consistent with predictions in the aftermath of the accident by scientists in the Soviet Union, of which Ukraine, Russia and Belarus were then a part.

But the vast majority of residents and emergency workers received relatively low doses of radiation, comparable to naturally occurring levels of exposure, the report said.

Officials said that the continued intense medical monitoring of tens of thousands of people in Ukraine, Russia and Belarus is no longer a smart use of limited resources and is, in fact, contributing to mental health problems among many residents nearly 20 years later. In Belarus and Ukraine, 5 percent to 7 percent of government spending is consumed by benefits and programs for Chernobyl victims. And in the three countries, as many as 7 million people are receiving Chernobyl-related social benefits.

"The monitoring of people with incredibly low doses uses huge amounts of resources and does more psychological harm than good," said Fred Mettler, a professor of radiology at the University of New Mexico who chaired one of three health groups in the study, titled "Chernobyl's Legacy: Health, Environmental and Socio-Economic Impacts." The study, involving more than 100 scientists, was compiled by U.N. agencies, including the International Atomic Energy Agency, and representatives of the governments of Ukraine, Russia and Belarus.

Shortly after midnight, on April 26, 1986, after a complex chain of events at the Chernobyl plant, the water coolant vaporized and an explosion destroyed the reactor. The plant caught fire and plumes of radioactive material were released. Soviet authorities at first did not report the accident, but radioactive material was quickly detected in Scandinavian countries. Radioactive material continued to be released for another 10 days, spreading across Europe.

Over the next four years, a massive cleanup operation involving 240,000 workers ensued, and there were fears that many of these workers, called "liquidators," would suffer in subsequent years. But most emergency workers and people living in contaminated areas "received relatively low whole radiation doses, comparable to natural background levels," a report summary noted. "No evidence or likelihood of decreased fertility among the affected population has been found, nor has there been any evidence of congenital malformations."

In fact, the report said, apart from radiation-induced deaths, the "largest public health problem created by the accident" was its effect on the mental health of residents who were traumatized by their rapid relocation and the fear, still lingering, that they would almost certainly contract terminal cancer. The report said that lifestyle diseases, such as alcoholism, among affected residents posed a much greater threat than radiation exposure.

The report said that an immediate priority is to re-secure the reactor. After the disaster, a concrete sarcophagus was built over the plant, but it was hastily constructed and is showing signs of wear. "The main potential hazard of the shelter is a possible collapse of its top structures and release of radioactive dust into the environment," the report said.

David Zhania, emergencies minister in Ukraine, said last week that a new steel shelter for the plant would cost nearly $2 billion and that the country hoped to have it built by 2008 or 2009. About 28 foreign governments have already agreed to contribute more than $750 million to the project.

The report also found that except for a nearly 20-mile exclusion zone around the reactor, radiation levels have returned to acceptable levels in many areas where land had been abandoned for fear of contamination. "By radiological criteria alone a significant part of the abandoned agricultural lands (more than 70 percent) could be returned to economic use," the report said.

The abandonment of large tracts of land, combined with a ban on hunting, has led to a dramatic increase in wild animals and birds, including wolves, elk, wild boars, white-tailed eagles, owls, cranes and black storks.

"Without a permanent residency of humans for 20 years, the ecosystems around the Chernobyl site are now flourishing," the report said. "It looks like the nature park it has become."

U.N. Report Calls Chernobyl Dangers Overstated (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

A team of United Nations researchers said the health dangers from the 1986 Chernobyl nuclear accident were vastly overstated, resulting in a "paralyzing fatalism" among the 350,000 evacuees that proved to be the "largest public health problem."

The team, drawn from eight U.N. agencies, prepared the report in cooperation with the Russian Federation, Belarus and Ukraine, where the accident occurred. The results will be discussed at a special meeting in Vienna, where health experts continue to track medical and mental-health problems caused by the event.

"There are a bunch of lessons in this for the United States, for handling homeland-security events and for terrorism," said Fred Mettler, one of the researchers who prepared the report. He is a professor at the medical school at the University of New Mexico.

The Chernobyl accident spurred a mass evacuation after the nuclear reactor caught fire and began spewing a cloud of radioactive debris. The report notes that the radiation threat was vastly exaggerated and that many evacuees from the area shouldn't have been moved.

While some experts and authorities predicted tens of thousands of deaths, the report notes that so far there have been 59. An additional 3,940 victims, mainly emergency workers and people who lived close to the reactor, are expected to die prematurely as a result of cancers caused by radiation exposure.

"This was still an horrific accident, but one of the messages here is that events like this are not totally devastating and are manageable," said Dr. Mettler. He said the radioactive doses experienced by many victims were relatively harmless, but because they were evacuated and given long-term aid and frequent medical attention, many still fear their lives will be shortened. Over the years, Dr. Mettler said, the evacuees have absorbed a lot of scarce medical resources that could have been used on more-serious public-health problems in the region.

A lot of the report's recommendations, he said, are designed to get managers of future accidents and natural disasters to focus more on "people who really do have problems and to get other people into a mode where they have more self-confidence."

The 600-page report said that almost 99% of children diagnosed with thyroid cancer after the incident survived. It found "no convincing evidence" that the incidence of leukemia rose among the population exposed to radiation in Russia and Ukraine.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Immigration Charge Dropped In Va. Terror Case (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 5, 2005

The scene was emblematic of the war on terror: a government helicopter clattering over a home in Burke as gun-toting agents smashed through the door and handcuffed the owner, a Lebanese immigrant.

Hassan Khalil, 37, was arrested by agents with a local terrorism task force this May and charged with immigration fraud. But now, officials say, the charge has been dropped. The reason: a mistake in Khalil's immigration records.

Khalil, a U.S. citizen and cell phone technician, said the experience has left him frustrated and bewildered. He said his attorney was told in July that the immigration charge was being dropped but that the investigation would continue.

"Overall I'm really angry at this," he said. "Even if they had anything on me, which I doubt, I haven't seen it. They didn't show it to me. They did all this, then dropped the case and walked away. And nothing."

Khalil's case was featured in a June article in The Washington Post about the government's increased use of immigration laws against people who have come under scrutiny in terrorism cases.

U.S. officials say that such charges sometimes are the easiest way to detain someone who could be a threat and that there is nothing wrong with prosecuting people who have broken immigration laws.

Authorities have declined to comment on what brought Khalil to their attention or whether he could face further accusations. He was charged in May with lying on his citizenship application by failing to note an arrest by U.S. officials in the early 1990s for being in the country illegally.

Khalil has said he is innocent. He acknowledges that he overstayed a student visa but said he later obtained temporary legal papers under a program for people affected by the Lebanese civil war. He then married a U.S. citizen in 1994 and was granted citizenship in 2000.

Frank Shults, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Alexandria, said that after an investigation, authorities discovered that Khalil in fact had not been arrested. Instead, Khalil had agreed with authorities to voluntarily leave the country after overstaying his visa in the early 1990s, Shults said. Khalil never left the United States, he said.

"The statements he made on the application about not being arrested were deemed accurate," Shults said. "So they dropped the charges."

Kareem Shora, of the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, said the case appeared to be part of what he called a pattern of dramatic anti-terrorism arrests that resulted in immigration allegations or other charges that were later dropped.

"The use of these high-profile raids, when it's not warranted, is a waste of my taxpayer money," he said. He said they also damage relations between the government and Muslim and Arab communities.

Dean Boyd, a spokesman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, said the agency used a helicopter during the raid to ensure the safety of the agents and Khalil. He said authorities believed that Khalil had military training and a black belt in martial arts. Khalil also had told the FBI that he knew members of Hezbollah, the armed Shiite Muslim movement that the U.S. government considers a terrorist group, Boyd said.

Khalil said in an interview that he did not know any Hezbollah members in the United States but that he did in his native south Lebanon, where it is a political party.

Janice Kephart, a former counsel to the 9/11 commission, said it was important for the government to use any kind of valid civil or criminal charges -- including immigration violations -- to protect homeland security. She emphasized that U.S. officials didn't act lightly in pressing such charges.

"Prosecutors don't like to lose cases," she said. "That doesn't mean the government doesn't sometimes make mistakes."

For Khalil, though, the mistake has had painful consequences. He said his 7-year-old daughter was so frightened by the dawn raid that she refuses to sleep alone. He and his wife jump at sudden noises. And he hasn't figured out how to retrieve his passport and other documents seized in the raid.

"I just don't feel secure, up to today," he said. "People come up to me and say, 'Congratulations,' and I'm like, 'Yeah, right.' I don't feel it's done."

Al Qaeda: A Link To London? (NSWK)

Newsweek

Newsweek, September 5, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0002843

American and British investigators say a new video featuring a July 7 London subway bomber and Qaeda chief deputy Ayman al-Zawahiri is authentic. These counterterror officials, who asked not to be named because of the sensitive subject matter, say the tape, aired last Thursday by Al-Jazeera, appears to affirm a link between Al Qaeda and the July 7 attacks—but it doesn't prove Zawahiri or Qaeda head Osama bin Laden ordered them.

In the slick video, which the officials think was assembled from two separately shot tapes, suicide bomber Mohammed Sidique Khan says he is a "soldier" intent on "protecting and avenging my Muslim brothers and sisters." He asks Allah to "raise me amongst those I love," a group that includes bin Laden, Zawahiri and Abu Mussab al-Zarqawi, the Jordanian-born leader of the Iraqi insurgency. Khan does not say that the Iraq war was a motivation for the attacks. But Zawahiri does praise them as a "slap in the face" to Tony Blair's British government for its alleged collaboration with Washington in oppressing Muslims in countries including Iraq. The British official says authorities believe the tape may have been put together up to three months ago; they don't know if the video, in which Khan spoke in the soft accent of his native Yorkshire, was taped in Britain or Pakistan, which he reportedly visited several months before the London bombings.

The British investigation into the terror acts—four incidents on July 7 that killed more than 50, and another four attempted attacks on July 21 in which the bombs didn't explode—appears to have bogged down in past weeks. Though numerous suspects, including the would-be bombers themselves, were picked up and charged for the July 21 attacks, nobody has been arrested for the July 7 bombings. This lack of progress led some British investigators to claim recently that the July 7 bombers may have been a self-generated cell.

Justice Department Under Fire (WT)

By Nat Hentoff

The Washington Times, September 5, 2005

I thought I was inured to learning about further evidence of this administration's disregard for our system of justice as it abuses international law and our statutes in the CIA's kidnapping of terrorism suspects to be sent to other nations. But an Aug. 9 statement in Brooklyn federal court by Mary Mason of the Justice Department's Constitutional Torts Section astonished me by its breadth of disregard for what we prize as our rule of law.

The case was the first civil lawsuit to challenge the CIA's "extraordinary renditions," sending terrorist suspects to countries known for torturing their prisoners. Maher Arar, a naturalized Canadian citizen, is suing for damages in Maher Arar v. John Ashcroft, Acting Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson, et al. He was seized by American agents and shipped to his native Syria, where he was tortured for nearly a year after being picked up at Kennedy International Airport on Sept. 26, 2002, when he was changing planes to return to his home in Canada from a beach vacation in Tunisia.

As reported in the Aug. 10 New York Times (and confirmed to me by Georgetown University law professor David Cole, Mr. Arar's attorney on behalf of the Center for Constitutional rights) this is what Mrs. Mason, speaking for the U.S. government, said in federal court: "Foreign citizens who change planes at airports in the United States can legally be seized, detained without charges, deprived of access to a lawyer or the courts, and even denied basic necessities like food." Asked U.S. District Judge David Trager: "Would not such treatment of a detainee in any context, criminal, civil, immigration or otherwise violate both the Constitution and clearly established case law?" Mrs. Mason said it would not. All the government has to do is declare the seized passenger an "inadmissible alien" beyond the reach of the Constitution.

It's important to note at this point that Mr. Arar has not been charged with any crime despite his horrifying ordeal in a 3-by-6-by-7-foot cell, described by him as "like a grave," where he heard the screams of other tortured prisoners. After Syria finally released him, that government declared Mr. Arar completely innocent, said Imad Moustapha, Syria's high-ranking diplomat in Washington, on the Jan. 21, 2004, CBS "60 Minutes II." Mr. Arar did falsely confess after ongoing, savage bouts of torture that he had been to an al Qaeda trainingcampin Afgh-anistan. But he has neverbeenin Afghanistan. He confessed, he says, because he was ready to "do anything to stop the torture." Syria's Mr. Moustapha admits:"Wetraced links. We traced relations. We tried to find anything. We couldn't." Now back in Canada, Mr. Arar is a free man. In addition to suffering continual nightmares about his torture, and other resultant difficulties, he is afraid that he can never clear his name. Mr. Arar is suing Messrs. Ashcroft and Thompson, and other officials for compensatory and punitive damages.

In court papers, his attorneys note that the U.S. government removed him chained and shackled to Syria "with the full knowledge of the existence of state-sponsored torture in that country." Our own State Departmenthasrepeatedly confirmed the torture in that country. Moreover, as his attorneys add, this official kidnapping was committed "in direct contravention of the U.N. Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, a treaty ratified by the United States in 1994" and in violation of this country's subsequent Torture Victim Protection Act of 1991.

As usual, the Justice Department, as often stated by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, maintains that no suspect is sent to a country known for torture unless "assurances" are given that the prisoner, uncharged with any crime, will not be tortured. As I and other reporters, along with human-rights organizations, have documented, these "assurances" are a farce, and the Bush administration knows it, despite the president's frequent pledges that "we do not engage in torture." This government's papers in Mr. Arar's lawsuit actually say, as the New York Times reported, that when foreign citizens are seized and abused on our soil and then sent away to be tortured, "even if they are wrongly or illegally designated inadmissible... such aliens have at most a right against 'gross physical abuse.' " And, of course, no American official, up to and including the attorney general, is responsible for any "illegalities" resulting in that innocent victim being tortured.

The government claims it has classified information that Mr. Arar is an al Qaeda member, but it has invoked its "state secrets" privilege to refuse to release that "evidence," so that Mr. Arar can refute it. It's no longer a secret that, in these "extraordinary renditions," this administration has repeatedly and cynically been flagrantly lawless while Congress keeps abdicating its constitutional investigative responsibilities under the separation of powers.

PATRIOT ACT:

Patriot Act Meets With Opposition (LBPT)

By Jason Gewirtz, Staff writer

Long Beach (CA) Press-Telegram, September 5, 2005

LONG BEACH — The City Council will be asked Tuesday to oppose provisions of the controversial USA PATRIOT Act that a citizens' group says will threaten civil liberty protections.

Councilwomen Bonnie Lowenthal and Tonia Reyes Uranga will make the request, asking the council to support a recently adopted resolution in the State Senate that urges Congress to amend the act.

The Patriot Act was adopted after 9/11 to provide government officials with more ways to investigate potential terrorist leads. A number of the act's provisions are set to expire at the end of the year unless Congress renews them.

Several of those provisions allow the FBI to seize records from financial companies, libraries, doctors' offices and other businesses with limited approval.

Several cities, including Los Angeles, San Jose and San Francisco, have adopted similar measures in recent months regarding civil liberty aspects of the act. But whether the council will tackle the issue is unclear.

In the past, council members have had contentious debates over whether they should weigh in on various issues in front of the federal government. In March 2003, the council withdrew two contested resolutions after a debate over how, or whether, to address the war in Iraq. In June 2004, the council split 4-4 on a resolution to oppose the Federal Marriage Amendment.

Councilman Frank Colonna, who has opposed several past council efforts at intervention beyond the city's authority, said Tuesday's item falls into that category.

"I really don't think that this is the proper time to start to analyze the pros and cons of the Patriot Act," he said.

But Edith Pollach with the Long Beach Civil Liberties Defense Coalition said the council should take up the issue. She said nearly two dozen local groups will urge support for the measure Tuesday.

"What's the oath of office that the council members take?" she asked. "Aren't they supposed to take an oath that they're going to carry out and obey the Constitution of the United States and the state of California?"

Budget time

At a budget hearing during the council meeting, the council's Budget Oversight Committee will present its recommendations to the council regarding the proposed 2006 city budget. The city's fiscal year begins Oct. 1.

The city manager has proposed more than $20 million in cuts in the proposed budget.

The council is also expected to hear a report from Police Chief Anthony Batts on a plan to hire more police officers. Batts has said he will recommend that the city increase its police force by a minimum of 37 officers to a maximum of 309 officers.

Although a funding source for those officers has not been identified, the city is considering a potential ballot measure in April that could pay for the personnel.

Cap removed?

Also Tuesday, the council will consider rescinding an earlier action to approve all Redevelopment Agency spending of $1 million or more.

Over the past year, council members have been at battle with each other over who should control redevelopment.

RDA Board members have argued that the proposed cap effectively places another level of bureaucracy in the redevelopment process, further slowing a process that many complain is already burdensome.

Report bonanza

Meanwhile, city staffers could be busy in coming weeks if the council approves a slew of proposed reports on Tuesday.

Those requests include:

* A report on installing and operating downtown surveillance cameras to prevent and fight crime. The Redevelopment Agency recently approved $400,000 to purchase cameras, contingent on the city agreeing to operate and monitor the devices. The Downtown Long Beach Associates has also agreed to contribute $75,000 toward the effort. Lowenthal, Uranga and Councilwoman Rae Gabelich will request the report;

* A survey listing all buildings or structures in Long Beach that might be considered culturally or historically significant. Lowenthal, who is requesting the review, will also request that the Planning and Building Department develop a process to identify such properties before issuing permits for projects to replace them; and

* A survey listing all solar-powered buildings and projects in the city and a report on solar energy grants that the city has or is pursuing. Colonna will request the item to explore ways that the city can expand its solar energy use.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Anti-terrorism Program's Shortfalls May Hurt Safety (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, September 6, 2005

An airline anti-terrorism screening plan may not be able to tell the Department of Homeland Security how many passenger records are being screened or project the number of terrorist-watch-list "hits" to be sent to the nation's Terrorist Screening Center (TSC), according to a report.

The Justice Department's Office of Inspector General said the program shortfalls, found in a lengthy audit, have hurt the TSC's ability to plan its role in the government's new "Secure Flight" program, an initiative to let the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) compare the names of commercial airline passengers with TSC's consolidated terrorist watch list.

Secure Flight has been described as a critical part of Homeland Security's overall layered strategy to secure the nation's commercial air transportation system.

The system will compare data provided to airlines with information provided by companies that collect personal data for marketing and credit scoring, and then match it with terrorist watch lists.

Privacy advocates have challenged the program, criticizing attempts to use personal information to determine who can board aircraft. Some lawmakers questioned its effectiveness after high-profile colleagues were flagged for secondary screening, including Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat.

TSC is a multiagency effort administered by the FBI whose mission is to consolidate terrorist watch lists and provide available 24/7 responses for screening people against the list.

Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said that while the TSC had made "significant progress" in preparing for Secure Flight, neither it nor the TSA knows how many passenger records will be screened and cannot project how many watch-list "hits" it will forward.

Mr. Fine said the Secure Flight program likely would affect the TSC's space, staffing and funding needs and had delayed other TSC projects. But, he said, the TSC could not adequately estimate the cost of new programs that increase its range of operations, such as Secure Flight.

"Implementing the Secure Flight program requires substantial, cross-cutting modifications and enhancements to the TSC's infrastructure," Mr. Fine said, adding that TSC officials could not easily distinguish Secure Flight funding needs from those needed for unrelated system enhancements.

"We found that the TSC is attempting to plan for a program that has several major undefined parameters," Mr. Fine said.

"Specifically, the TSC does not know when Secure Flight will start, the volume of inquiries expected and the resulting number of resources required to respond, the quality of data it will have to analyze," he said.

The Inspector General's Office made five recommendations to the TSC to help it support the Secure Flight program, including enhancing the organization's budget formulation and execution capabilities and re-examining the Secure Flight resource estimates as soon as the program is implemented and workload figures established.

Mr. Fine said the TSC agreed with the report's findings and recommendations and would take the necessary action.

U.S. Muslims Craft Outreach Programs (WSJ)

By Suzanne Sataline

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

Calling the terrorist attacks on London a wake-up call, Muslim-American organizations have launched a number of programs that are designed, in part, to prevent or root out disgruntled Muslims who might be tempted to use their religion to justify violence.

The Islamic Society of North America plans to distribute tens of thousands of pamphlets at mosques and cultural centers that spell out the Quran's injunctions against violence.

Another broad-based organization, the Muslim Public Affairs Council, is expanding its program to teach local mosques to partner with local communities and law enforcement.

Muslim groups announced or publicized their efforts at the Islamic Society's annual convention, which drew an estimated 40,000 people to Rosemont, Ill., this weekend. The groups stressed ways for Muslims to gain more acceptance and to combat suspicion in the U.S.

"It really was the profile of the bombers in England that shocked everyone and made all of us really disturbed," said Ingrid Mattson, the Islamic Society's vice president. The British bombers were mostly the sons of immigrants isolated in poor enclaves. Though their lives were different from the middle-class world of most Muslim Americans, "it made a lot of people afraid," Ms. Mattson added.

Muslim leaders at the convention were quick to say the campaigns don't reflect philosophical changes, nor are they meant as apologies for terrorist acts. The conference carried a theme that U.S. Muslims must become more transparent and emphatic about their beliefs and intentions if they are to melt domestic distrust.

The London attacks also prompted a number of U.S. Muslim organizations to issue a fatwa -- an Islamic legal ruling -- in July, denouncing the violence.

"As Muslims, we must face up to our responsibility to clarify and advocate a faith-based, righteous and moral position with regard to this problem, especially when terrorist acts are perpetrated in the name of Islam," according to the pamphlet set for distribution by the Islamic Society.

Last month, the Muslim Public Affairs Council started the Muslim-American Project on 37 college campuses. It is an effort to teach Muslim college students that they are part of U.S. society and to guide them in participating in civic activities, such as elections, said Ahmed Younis, national director of the council, which has offices in Los Angeles and Washington. The council plans to add 20 mosques to the project, which is designed to teach mosque leaders transparency and the benefits of civic involvement.

Since May 2004, council officials have traveled to Muslim centers across the country, prompting Muslim leaders to work with local police and federal investigators who may be watching for terrorist cells.

Maha ElGenaidi, founder of Islamic Networks Group, a nonprofit education effort in San Jose, Calif., told those who attended the conference of many ways they could become more welcome Americans, such as "attend your children's school events. It's good for other parents to see you there, as well," she said.

Pentagon Pressed For 9/11 Answers (WT)

By Shaun Waterman, United Press International

The Washington Times, September 5, 2005

Members of the September 11 commission think they have been left swinging in the wind by the growing revelations about a secret Pentagon program that may have identified the ringleader of the hijackings as an al Qaeda operative more than a year before the attacks.

"Other people have questions they need to answer," said Al Felzenberg, spokesman for the commission's embattled successor body, the 9/11 Public Discourse Project.

"The American people deserve answers," Mr. Felzenberg said, adding that both the White House and the Pentagon had left questions about the issue unresolved for weeks -- something other commission sources say has exposed them to a fierce backlash.

"They are sitting on their hands and we are swinging in the wind," one former commission official said.

Others, including Rep. Peter Hoekstra, Michigan Republican and chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, say the commission is merely getting "a little bit of its own medicine," being second-guessed in hindsight, as it judged the actions of officials before September 11.

DOJ_NMG_0002847

"In hindsight it is always easy to see people's mistakes," he said. "You have to be sympathetic to people in hindsight. More sympathetic than they were."

At the center of the controversy are claims that the secret project, code-named Able Danger, in 2000 produced a chart bearing the names -- and in some people's recollections, photographs -- of about 60 people thought linked to al Qaeda. Among the names was that of Mohamed Atta, the ringleader of the attacks.

If the claims turn out to be true, it will entail a major rewrite of the commission's accounts of the missed opportunities to thwart the attacks.

Rep. Curt Weldon, Pennsylvania Republican and a passionate advocate of data-mining technology, and the man who first publicized the claims about Able Danger, has said repeatedly that he gave a copy of the chart to Stephen J. Hadley, now the national security adviser, at the White House on Sept. 25, 2001, and that Mr. Hadley said he would show it to the president.

The White House has refused to comment on the claims or provide Mr. Hadley for an interview with reporters.

"It would be helpful if Mr. Hadley would answer those questions," Mr. Felzenberg said. "He could make this whole thing go away."

Two persons associated with the project have come forward to say they told commission staff about the project and its identification of Atta -- touching off a firestorm of criticism of the commission, including accusations from some victims' relatives of a cover-up.

Commission staff say that, in the absence of any corroboration, they did not believe the accounts they received.

"We had 2½ million pieces of paper we'd crowbarred out of the administration," said Mr. Felzenberg. "We'd interviewed 1,200 people. ... It was [their] story stacked up against these mountains of material -- none of which mentioned Atta before September 11 or this famous chart."

The Pentagon said last week that it had searched millions of documents, including many not turned over to the commission, but had found neither the chart nor any reference to it.

Covering All The Bases (LEGALT)

By Vanessa Blum, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 5, 2005

If any lawyer knows the Department of Homeland Security inside and out, it's Philip Perry.

Three years ago, as a senior White House lawyer, Perry helped create the new department. Later, as a partner at Washington's Latham & Watkins, he actively lobbied the DHS on behalf of two Fortune 500 companies. Then, about three months ago, the 41-year-old completed the circle, joining the agency as its general counsel.

In many ways, Perry is following Washington's most common career path. Lawyers in the capital have always swung between the federal government and law firms. But if you want to get off on the right foot with Perry, you better not refer to that flight pattern as the "revolving door."

"The term 'revolving door' implies people going in and out of government in order to obtain monetary gain," Perry says. "The reason people go into government is to serve their country. It's not appropriate to describe that as a revolving door."

Perry, who is married to Vice President Dick Cheney's oldest daughter, Elizabeth, has held three jobs in the Bush administration. In his current post—the first to require Senate confirmation—Perry oversees roughly 1,500 lawyers. In addition to its usual portfolio, his office is now handling legal aspects of the government's response to the devastation caused by Hurricane Katrina. And, in fact, Perry canceled a planned Labor Day weekend fishing excursion with his father-in-law to deal with the crisis.

Perry's work ethic seems to match that of his notoriously intense boss, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. During August, when much of official Washington tends to dawdle, Perry pushed his staff to complete work on 30 separate regulations.

Whether it matters to him or not, mastering the workings of the DHS is almost certain to open doors for Perry when he returns to the private sector. But Perry can also catalog the sacrifices involved in government service. As a partner at Latham, he pulled in more than $700,000. At the DHS, he makes about $140,000—a salary cut of at least 80 percent.

Perry first met Chertoff roughly 10 years ago, when both worked at Latham. DHS Chief of Staff John Wood says that the two lawyers have a similar temperament. "They're both extremely bright and have very quick minds that can focus intensely on a problem until they come up with a solution."

Perry's wife, Elizabeth Cheney Perry, is the State Department's No. 2 diplomat in the Middle East. The couple have four children: 11-year-old Katherine, 7-year-old Elizabeth, 5-year-old Grace, and 1-year-old Philip. In both the 2000 and 2004 campaigns, the couple led Cheney's preparation for the vice presidential debate, with Perry sometimes playing the part of the moderator.

Republican political consultant Mary Matalin was part of Cheney's debate prep team. She describes Perry as "very, very, very strategic."

"Asking questions is as hard and as important as coming up with answers," Matalin says. "You could tell he was always thinking on multiple levels."

PUBLIC PLATFORM

Perry's progression through the private and public sectors has a similarly strategic feel.

After George W. Bush took office in January 2001, Perry went almost overnight from being a junior partner at Latham to taking the No. 3 post at the Justice Department. Lawyers who worked with Perry at Main Justice say he was known for his dry sense of humor, which would come out when he briefed the group on important civil cases.

After the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Perry worked with a small team of lawyers who were developing a framework for the September 11th Victim Compensation Fund, overseen by mediator Kenneth Feinberg. In his new book, What Is Life Worth?, Feinberg calls Perry an "unsung hero."

According to Feinberg, it was Perry who settled the issue of which family members would be able to receive compensation from the fund—a detail not addressed by Congress. Perry suggested that in the 80 percent of cases where the victim left no will, the proper beneficiaries should be determined under the inheritance laws of the victim's state.

"The solution was brilliant in its simplicity," Feinberg says. "Any other approach would have had us acting as family counselors trying to determine who should receive compensation."

In early 2002, Perry left the Justice Department to become general counsel of the highly influential White House Office of Management and Budget. The appointment, which requires no Senate approval, placed Perry at the hub of executive branch rule-making. It allowed him to get deeply involved in a broad range of policy issues and to ensure that agencies developed regulations consistent with the views of the White House. "Industry knows they can knock on OMB's door and effectively lobby the White House," says Robert Shull, who monitors the agency at OMB Watch.

One of Perry's projects at the OMB was to work on the president's proposal for a new Department of Homeland Security and to lay the groundwork for implementation of the Safety Act—a measure that protects government contractors from being sued in the event of a terrorist attack.

"Phil was one of those can-do lawyers," says General Electric Co. top lobbyist Nancy Dorn, the OMB's former deputy director. "As opposed to giving you 150 reasons you can't do something, he would tell you how you can do it. And how to do it right. And usually how to do it quickly."

PRIVATE LESSONS

When Perry returned to Latham in September 2003, he brought with him an enhanced understanding of how government regulations are developed and written, and how they can be most effectively defended in court. On the flip side, he also knew how corporate clients could most effectively attack such regulations through lobbying and litigation.

"When Phil came back, he wasn't the junior partner anymore," says Everett "Kip" Johnson Jr., a partner in Latham's Washington office. "He came back with a much broader perspective of how government works, how government views things and approaches cases."

While at Latham, Perry lobbied the DHS on behalf of government contractors General Electric and Lockheed Martin Corp. As a result of that work, Perry says he has recused himself from all specific matters involving the two companies. According to Senate lobby registrations, Lockheed paid Latham roughly $140,000 for Perry's work. The firm did not file a disclosure form for Perry's representation of General Electric, indicating that lobbying work constituted less than 20 percent of his services to the company.

But Perry says that nothing in the government ethics laws bars him from working on DHS regulations that might affect his former clients, because regulations involve issues of general policy, not particular cases or controversies.

Perry's lobbying work for GE and Lockheed involved applications for liability protection filed under the Safety Act. Perry has made no secret of the fact that he would like to adjust that application process to make it less burdensome on business.

He says encouraging private industry to develop counterterrorism technologies by cutting red tape makes sense for the country.

"We shouldn't just be sitting back and taking applications from people," Perry says. "We should be using it as a tool to encourage industry to come up with the technologies that will help protect the country."

FAMILY FOCUS

Perry was born in 1964, in San Diego, Calif. His family moved to Palo Alto when his father, a naval officer, went to Stanford University to earn an advanced degree in economics. After graduating from high school in the San Francisco suburb of Orinda, Perry attended Colorado College.

DOJ_NMG_0002849

Colorado College was also the alma mater of Dick Cheney's wife, Lynne, and daughters Elizabeth and Mary, but Perry didn't meet Elizabeth until 1991, at an alumni happy hour in Washington, D.C. By that time he had a law degree from Cornell University and was working as an associate in the D.C. office of Squire, Sanders & Dempsey. The couple were married in 1993.

While his new wife attended law school at the University of Chicago, Perry spent three years in the Chicago office of Latham & Watkins. The couple moved back to Washington in 1996, and Perry transferred into Latham's D.C. office. In 1997, Perry took a year off to work on the Senate probe into campaign finance abuses during the 1996 campaign.

At the time, Perry's father-in-law was the chief executive officer of Halliburton Inc. and a former secretary of defense. Still, it was not a subject Perry spoke about, says friend Gus Puryear IV, who met Perry while working on the investigation.

"For the longest time I didn't know the Cheneys were his in-laws," says Puryear, now general counsel of Nashville's Corrections Corp. of America. "I don't think it ever came up until I actually met Liz."

No matter how Perry handles his relationship with Cheney, he will probably always face critics who believe he got where he is because of his father-in-law. After Perry was nominated to the DHS post in April 2005, the Toledo Blade ran an editorial blasting the pick as "a pure form of nepotism."

While Perry concedes that he has had opportunities because of the family he married into, he says he has succeeded through hard work. Friends like Puryear maintain that any suggestion to the contrary is unfair to Perry.

"He's all substance," Puryear says. "If you look at the roles he's taken on, they're not glamour roles. He's taking on get-in-the-trenches, do-the-work roles."

Shull of OMB Watch says nepotism is beside the point. He says the Bush administration demands such loyalty from political appointees that they all seem to form one collective brood: "You almost don't even need family ties in this administration."

WAR NEWS:

U.S. Troops Cordon Part Of Iraqi Town To Trap Insurgents (WP)

By Jonathan Finer, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, September 5, 2005

TALL AFAR, Iraq, Sept. 4 -- Under the cover of a moonless night, U.S. soldiers on Sunday strung nearly a mile of razor-sharp concertina wire across the northern edge of a neighborhood dominated by insurgents to prevent them from fleeing without a showdown.

Several small teams of five or six troops quickly uncoiled spools of wire and fastened it along the deserted sidewalk of a broad thoroughfare. The cordon was intended to prevent insurgents from blending in with the hundreds of people who fled the city during heavy clashes Sunday.

"The idea is to trap them in Sarai or force them toward our checkpoints to the south," said Col. H.R. McMaster, commander of the Army's 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment, referring to the neighborhood that U.S. forces believe has served as a launching point for many attacks in the city. "We don't want them to slip out."

More than 5,000 U.S. and Iraqi soldiers entered Tall Afar on Friday in a broad sweep for insurgents who have held sway in the northern city since a previous U.S. invasion, and subsequent withdrawal, last September. In three days of fighting, as many as 200 insurgents have been killed, McMaster said. Two U.S. and four Iraqi soldiers have been wounded, none seriously.

The assault in Tall Afar, considered a transit point and logistics hub for insurgents operating across northern Iraq, is the largest on an Iraqi city since the invasion of Fallujah in November. Commanders say they believe that perhaps a few hundred insurgents remain in the city, but acknowledge that they do not know the exact number. Other than in Fallujah, where entrenched fighters battled advancing U.S. troops, most assaults on Iraqi cities have met little resistance, as insurgents have fled to surrounding areas or blended into the local population.

Soldiers here are hoping to prevent that from happening by converging from all directions on Sarai, the commanders say. Weeks before the invasion, the troops set up checkpoints on the roads to town and built an 80-mile berm around the city to stop vehicles from leaving.

About 500 people attempted to leave the city this weekend through the U.S.-manned checkpoints. At least one man suspected of kidnapping and beheading several residents in recent weeks was apprehended when he tried to leave the city with a group of children, McMaster said. When soldiers interviewed the children, they said they did not know the man but went with him because they had been threatened.

A cacophony of gunfire and explosions filled the air around Tall Afar on Sunday, the heaviest day of fighting since the invasion began. Soldiers continued methodically searching homes and questioning residents, frequently coming under small-arms fire that whistled overhead as they passed from house to house or leapt across gaps between rooftops.

Much of the shooting came from a series of deep, grooved valleys that divide the city. The valleys, dipping as low as 40 feet below street level, allow insurgents to stash weapons and move undetected. Soldiers have found large caches of explosives in the valleys and begun firing warning shots when they spot men of military age descending into them.

"With the geography and the buildings so close together, it's a complex terrain to fight in," said Capt. Noah Hanners, 26, of Chillicothe, Ohio, commander of the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment's Blue Platoon, Eagle Troop, 2nd Squadron, which cleared several homes along the edge of a valley northeast of downtown Sunday.

Just after 9 a.m., Hanners's platoon used a sledgehammer to knock down the door of a two-story house made of large stone blocks. A woman wearing a purple abaya , or full-length cloak, and holding a baby ran toward them. "Already my husband is dead and you are breaking my house!" she shouted.

When shots rang out in the streets, she clutched her baby close to her chest. As a series of explosions grew closer, she sat down, rocked her baby and began to cry.

"Um, that's close. Very close," said Pfc. Hector Rodriguez, 20, of Buffalo, after an explosion rattled the windows.

Soldiers scrambled to set up shooting positions on the roof.

"We are receiving sniper fire," a voice over the platoon's radio said.

"Where from?" someone answered. No one knew. The platoon's machine gunner began shooting staccato bursts into the valley from the next roof.

"Who is that shooting?" Hanners asked over the radio.

"Blue saw team, we saw muzzle flashes from the south," came the response.

Another call over the radio said a Tall Afar resident working with the Army had identified an arms dealer in a house across the street. The soldiers gave the woman with the baby a voucher for $300 to repair her gate, redeemable at a nearby military base, and dashed next door.

By the time they reached that house, the suspected arms dealer and two other men had already been handcuffed and blindfolded by other members of the platoon.

"This is my nephew. He does not even live here," a woman in the house said as the men were led away.

"He was identified. That's what you get for selling weapons," a soldier said.

The soldiers continued to the last house on the block. They herded a family of nine into a living room and searched their belongings. A drawer of silverware crashed to the floor, startling the children.

"I am scared. We are all scared, but what are we supposed to do?" said the father, Shimsdain Muhammed, 40, an electrician, according to an account of his remarks provided by a military interpreter traveling with the unit. Muhammed told his children to wave and smile at the soldiers, who responded in kind. "I cannot tell them to leave, so we will do the best we can."

Suddenly, an explosion outside shattered the windows of the house, eliciting screams and confusion. It turned out to be a passing U.S. M1-A1 Abrams tank firing its main gun into the valley.

"This place is too much," another soldier said later, recounting the story to a friend.

Elsewhere Sunday in Tall Afar, an Iraqi army unit freed 35 hostages held in a house south of downtown, according to Maj. Gen. Khorsheed Salim, commander of the army's 3rd Division, which is heavily involved in the operation.

Soldiers in the western part of the city found a laboratory rigged with explosives, McMaster said. The lab also contained a chemical that burned the troops' throats and eyes when they entered. The Army is trying to identify the substance.

[Early Monday, as many as 30 gunmen in 10 cars opened fire on Iraq's Interior Ministry, killing two policemen and wounding five, the Reuters news agency reported.

An Interior Ministry official said gunmen used rocket-propelled grenades, mortars and automatic rifles in the attack.]

Iraq Sets Date For Saddam Trial Next Month (FT)

By Steve Negus, Iraq Correspondent

Financial Times, September 5, 2005

Saddam Hussein, the former Iraqi president, would go on trial on October 19 on charges related to the repression of Shia in a central Iraqi town in 1982, an Iraqi government spokesman said on Sunday.

The spokesman was subsequently quoted as saying that Mr Hussein could be executed shortly after his trial - possibly raising objections from the Kurds and other groups anxious to see crimes against their communities brought to trial.

DOJ_NMG_0002851

"In view of recent leaks to the press and in the absence of an official spokesman for the tribunal, I have been authorised to announce that the trial of Saddam Hussein will begin on October 19," Laith Kubba, the prime ministerial spokesman, told a news conference.

The deposed leader's co-defendants would include Barzan Ibrahim, his half-brother and then-chief of intelligence, Taha Yassin Ramadan, former vice-president, former top judge Awad Badar Al-Bandar, and four former local members of the ruling Ba'ath party, Mr Kubba said.

The trial will open four days after an October 15 referendum on >Iraq's newly drafted constitution, although Mr Kubba said there was no relation between the two dates.

The charges relate to the aftermath of a 1982 attempt to assassinate the former president in the predominantly Shia town of Dujail, after which Mr Hussein's followers are said to have embarked on a campaign of collective punishment against the town in which hundreds were executed.

The defendants could receive the recently reinstated death penalty for their role in the repression.

The Iraqi special tribunal in charge of trying former regime officials has divided the charges against Mr Hussein and his associates into a dozen cases covering specific places and periods of time.

Iraqi officials have indicated that the Dujail case would be among the first as the scale is relatively limited and the case less complex than larger-scale killings such as the 1987-88 Anfal campaign against the Kurds and the repression of the 1991 intifada.

Mr Kubba was quoted by AFP as saying the sentence "will be implemented immediately . . . He could be executed after the first round."

This raises a possible conflict of interest between Shia parties, many of which want quick justice, and Kurds, many of whom want a drawn-out process to publicise the extent of their persecution under the former regime. Many Kurds cite waves of persecution such as the Anfal campaign, in which they claim some 182,000 people were killed, as a key argument behind their demands for independence.

Mr Hussein's defence team is expected to contest the tribunal's competence to try a former head of state in a case likely to last about a month.

The news came as Iraqi hospital sources announced a third day of fighting in the north-western town of Tal Afar, an alleged transit route for insurgents near Syria.

Hussein Trial In '82 Deaths Set To Begin Next Month (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, September 5, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Sept. 4 - The trial of Saddam Hussein will begin in six weeks, the government said Sunday, when he and seven aides face a special tribunal on charges of massacring almost 150 residents from the town of Dujail, the scene of a failed assassination attempt against Mr. Hussein 23 years ago.

Laith Kubba, a spokesman for the prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, said the trial would begin Oct. 19, four days after a national vote on a proposed new constitution. The trial raises the possibility that Mr. Hussein, who faces the death penalty if convicted, could be hanged within months.

Four days ago, Iraq carried out its first court-ordered execution since the fall of Mr. Hussein's government, hanging three people convicted in May in the southern city of Kut of rapes and killings.

Great efforts will be made to "ensure the transparency of the trial" of Mr. Hussein, Mr. Kubba said at a news conference.

"We should view this trial as a national event, and not just as a trial for Saddam on the killings he committed," he said.

Mr. Kubba said Mr. Hussein would be tried with seven associates, including Barzan Ibrahim, a half-brother of Mr. Hussein and a former top official of the Mukhabarat secret police, and Taha Yassin, who was vice chairman of the Baath Party's Revolutionary Command Council. The charges stem from the killing of 143 people and the imprisonment of hundreds of families after the assassination attempt in Dujail on July 8, 1982, he said.

After the failed attack on Mr. Hussein, Iraqi officials executed men and boys from Dujail, a largely Shiite town 35 miles north of Baghdad. Investigators for the special tribunal that will try Mr. Hussein have said another 1,500 Dujail residents were later ordered incarcerated in a prison in a desolate stretch of desert near the Saudi Arabian border.

One of the lawyers for Mr. Hussein's family contended Sunday that a trial so soon would give too little time to prepare an adequate defense, and he said he doubted that the trial would start by Oct. 19.

In an interview with The Associated Press, the lawyer, Abdel Haq Alani, said the trial date was the "wish of the ruling group in the Green Zone, but certainly not the court" - an allusion to the Iraqi government leaders who live in the heavily fortified compound in central Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0002852

"We haven't been served an official notice about the date of trial," Mr. Alani told The A.P. "It was only a statement made by an Iraqi government official to the media, which absolutely has no value in the law."

The United States military said 13 insurgents were killed in heavy fighting on Sunday in the city of Tal Afar in northwestern Iraq, as troops from the Third Armored Cavalry Regiment continued efforts begun in May to take control of the city, where insurgents have controlled many neighborhoods since late last year.

Seven of the insurgents were killed by American helicopter fire after American troops were attacked with rocket-propelled grenades and machine guns fired from a mosque in Tal Afar, the military said.

Iraq to Reopen Embassy in Kuwait

CAIRO, Sept. 4 (AP) - Iraq plans to reopen its embassy in Kuwait within weeks, for the first time since it closed after Saddam Hussein ordered the invasion of Kuwait in 1990, Hoshyar Zebari, the Iraqi foreign minister, said Sunday.

"We reached the final agreement with the Kuwaiti government to resume our diplomatic activities and we will reopen our embassy within the few coming weeks," he said by telephone from Baghdad.

Asked if Kuwait would reopen its embassy in Baghdad in return, Mr. Zebari said the issue "is left to the Kuwaiti government itself and its estimation about the situation in Iraq."

Iraq and Kuwait have been working to normalize ties since the American-led invasion in 2003 that toppled Saddam Hussein.

Iraq May Forgo Multiple Trials If Hussein Is Convicted In First (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, September 5, 2005

BAGHDAD, Sept. 4 -- The Iraqi government is considering waiving further proceedings against former president Saddam Hussein if he is convicted at his trial on charges stemming from the massacre of 143 Shiite Muslims in 1982, a senior spokesman said Sunday.

Hussein could face execution in that case. The trial is scheduled to begin Oct. 19.

The former president had been expected to face a dozen or more proceedings for alleged crimes committed by his government. But Laith Kubba, spokesman for interim Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari, said Sunday that if Hussein is convicted in the first case, any sentence is likely to be carried out as swiftly as possible.

"My guess is if the court passes judgment, it should be implemented without further delay," Kubba said. He added that it was not possible to forecast how long the trial would last.

The case concerns the aftermath of an attempt to assassinate Hussein in the northern town of Dujail in 1982. The government retaliated for the plot by killing at least 143 people and razing much of the town, the interim government says.

The Shiite-led interim government is believed to have chosen the case in part because of its narrow focus and the possibility of tracing the killings back to Hussein. Other accusations against him, including state-orchestrated massacres of thousands of Kurds and Shiites, are much broader.

"The charges against Saddam are so many. Regardless of how many years he is going to live, the charges and trials would not end," Kubba told reporters at a news conference.

Kubba said seven members of Hussein's government would face trial with him. They include Barazan Ibrahim, a former intelligence chief and Hussein's half brother; former vice president Taha Yassin Ramadan; and Awad Hamed Bandar, a former Baath Party official in Dujail.

Iraq's U.S.-led interim administration suspended capital punishment in 2003. But the country's interim leaders made reinstating it a priority and recently carried out the country's first executions in the post-Hussein era by hanging three men convicted of murder, kidnapping and rape.

Also Sunday, members of the Shiite-dominated interim National Assembly criticized Arab governments for what they said was a lackluster response to a stampede Wednesday in Baghdad that left hundreds of Shiite pilgrims dead.

The pilgrims were headed to a shrine and had crowded a bridge over the Tigris River when panic broke out. The official death toll from the incident stands at 1,005, the Reuters news service reported Sunday.

Shiite lawmakers contrasted the Arab world's response to the stampede with its offers of aid for victims of Hurricane Katrina in the United States.

"Why would Spain and other countries send us their condolences while these so-called Arab countries did not even say a word?" said Jalaladeen Sagheer, a cleric and leading lawmaker. He added that, in any case, words of sympathy from Arab states would be hollow.

DOJ_NMG_0002853

Relations between Iraq and the Arab world have been edgy recently, particularly since the 22-member Arab League faulted the interim government for failing to specifically refer to Iraq as part of the Arab world in the country's draft constitution, which was submitted last month.

On Sunday, negotiators continued to work on a compromise over that designation.

Separately, Iraq's interim foreign minister, Hoshyar Zebari, told the Associated Press that Iraq intended to open its embassy in Kuwait in coming weeks for the first time since Hussein ordered the 1990 Kuwait invasion.

Asked whether Kuwait would reopen its embassy in Baghdad, Zebari said that decision would be "left to the Kuwaiti government itself and its estimation about the situation in Iraq."

Insurgents Assert Control Over Town Near Syrian Border (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And Jonathan Finer

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

BAGHDAD, Sept. 5 -- Fighters loyal to militant leader Abu Musab Zarqawi asserted control over the key Iraqi border town of Qaim on Monday, killing U.S. collaborators and enforcing strict Islamic law, according to tribal members, officials, residents and others in the town and nearby villages.

Residents said the foreign-led fighters controlled by Zarqawi, a Jordanian, apparently had been exerting authority in the town, within two miles of the Syrian border, since at least the start of the weekend. A sign posted at an entrance to the town declared, "Welcome to the Islamic Republic of Qaim."

In other developments Monday, the U.S. Army warned noncombatants to leave a portion of the northeastern city of Tall Afar ahead of an expected assault on an insurgent stronghold there. Car bombs and other political violence around Iraq killed at least 33 Iraqi civilians and security force members. A U.S. soldier and two British troops also were killed, officials said.

The report from Qaim, about 200 miles west of Baghdad, marked one of insurgents' boldest moves in their cat-and-mouse duels with U.S. Marines along the Euphrates River. U.S. forces have described border towns in the area as a funnel for foreign fighters, arms and money into Iraq from Syria.

Insurgents have occasionally made similar shows of force, such as the takeover of a Baghdad neighborhood for a few hours late last month by dozens of gunmen. They then slipped away, having made the point that they can muster men as well as plant bombs. The weekend takeover of Qaim extended already heavy insurgent pressure on the people there and came after the U.S. military said it had inflicted heavy bombing losses on foreign-led fighters.

Marines conducted heavy airstrikes in the past week on suspected insurgent safe houses in the area. Ground fighting has also been reported between Zarqawi's group and Sunni Arab tribes more open to the Iraqi government and U.S. military.

Capt. Jeffrey Pool, a Marine spokesman in Ramadi, capital of the western province that includes Qaim, said he had no word of unusual activity in Qaim. Marines are stationed just outside the town, and no Iraqi government forces are posted inside, Pool said.

Witnesses in Qaim said Zarqawi's fighters were killing officials and civilians whom they consider to be allied with the Iraqi and U.S. governments or anti-Islamic. On Sunday, the bullet-riddled body of a young woman dressed in her nightclothes lay in a street of Qaim. A sign left on her corpse declared, "A prostitute who was punished."

Zarqawi's fighters have shot and killed nine men in public executions in the city center since the start of the weekend, accusing the men of being collaborators with U.S. forces, said Sheik Nawaf Mahallawi, a leader of the Albu Mahal, a Sunni Arab tribe that had clashed earlier with the foreign fighters.

Dozens of families were fleeing Qaim every day, Mahallawi said.

For local fighters now, "it would be insane to attack Zarqawi's people, even to shoot one bullet at them," the tribal leader said. "We hope the U.S. forces end this in the coming days. We want the city to go back to its normal situation."

Many of the towns along the river have been subject to domination by foreign-led fighters, despite repeated Marine offensives in the area since May. Residents and Marines have described insurgents escaping ahead of such drives, and returning when the offensives end.

The U.S. attacks are credited with helping disrupt insurgent networks and reducing the number of car bombings and suicide attacks in the rest of Iraq.

U.S. and Iraqi officials in recent weeks have welcomed reports of local Sunni Arabs challenging the presence of foreign fighters. But the accounts from Qaim indicated a setback.

The Albu Mahal tribe remained in control of its village outside Qaim, residents said. However, a car bomb placed by Zarqawi's fighters killed a tribal leader, Dhyad Ahmed, and his son on Sunday, said a resident, Mijbil Saied.

DOJ_NMG_0002854

Fighters loyal to Zarqawi openly patrolled the streets of Qaim with AK-47 assault rifles and grenade launchers. The fighters included both Iraqis and foreigners, including Afghans. They draped rooftops with Zarqawi's al Qaeda in Iraq banner of a yellow sun against a black background.

Residents said insurgents in recent weeks had begun enforcing strict Islamic law, burning shops that sold CDs and a beauty parlor, and lashing men accused of drinking alcohol. They said Zarqawi's fighters were killing government workers but had spared doctors and teachers.

Karim Hammad Karbouli, 46, said he had stood among small crowds of nervous residents watching the insurgents, waiting Sunday for his brother to come with a pickup truck so they could load up his household and leave. Karbouli said he feared both Zarqawi's fighters and U.S. bombs.

The director of the town's hospital has ordered patients to leave the facility, said Muhammed Ismail, a physician at the hospital. Zarqawi's fighters had taken control of the hospital, and the director feared it would come under U.S. attack, Ismail said.

In Tall Afar, U.S. and Iraqi soldiers entered the fourth day of an offensive against insurgents who have controlled large sections of the city for nearly a year. On Monday night, soldiers dropped leaflets from helicopters in the eastern neighborhood of Sarai, where commanders believe insurgents are entrenched, warning noncombatants to evacuate the area.

About 5,000 soldiers from the Army's 3rd Armored Reconnaissance Regiment and the Iraqi army's 3rd Division continued advancing toward Sarai from all directions, searching homes, confiscating weapons and interrogating residents.

Early Monday morning, six members of an elite U.S. special operations unit were wounded in what was to have been a raid on the home of a suspected insurgent leader, according to U.S. commanders. Members of the unit, which is charged with searching for high-level insurgents, and the Army in Tall Afar would not provide details.

Tall Afar, a city of more than 200,000 about 40 miles from the Syrian border, is considered a logistical hub for insurgents operating across the country.

A roadside bomb killed one soldier in the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment in Tall Afar on Monday, and two British troops were reported killed by another roadside bomb in southern Iraq.

In Baghdad, insurgents launched a dawn attack on the Interior Ministry, killing two police officers, officials said. Other political violence Monday in Baghdad killed at least 13 civilians, the Associated Press reported.

A roadside bomb and other attacks killed four oil workers associated with a northern oil company in Kirkuk. Insurgents have mounted frequent attacks to disrupt Iraq's oil exports.

Mortar fire hit a residential neighborhood in the central city of Baqubah, killing six civilians, said Ahmed Fouad, a hospital physician. Eight other civilians were killed by a car bomb in the western town of Hit, the AP said.

In ongoing political negotiations, President Jalal Talabani said in a statement that he and the other top Kurdish leader, Massoud Barzani, had agreed to changes in the draft constitution. The changes would ease concerns among Arab countries that the wording of the draft loosened Iraqi ties to the Arab world.

The language at issue describes Iraq as an Islamic -- but not Arab -- country, a concession to non-Arab Kurds, who form about 15 percent of the Iraqi population.

USA Today, September 6, 2005

BAGHDAD — Insurgents launched a daylight assault Monday on Iraq's Interior Ministry. Two police officers were killed and five were injured.

Thunderous explosions and volleys of heavy gunfire rattled downtown Baghdad soon after sunrise as about four carloads of insurgents staged a raid on the Interior Ministry, which is responsible for police and paramilitary units nationwide.

The insurgents, who fired automatic weapons and rocket-propelled grenades, withdrew after about 15 minutes. There was no report of insurgent casualties.

A statement posted Monday on an Islamic website claimed responsibility for the attack in the name of al-Qaeda in Iraq, led by Jordanian Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

Sunday, al-Qaeda's Iraq wing launched multiple attacks against U.S. and Iraqi targets in Hit, 85 miles west of Baghdad. The U.S. military and Iraqi government said Monday that 12 people, including eight civilians and three suicide bombers, died in Hit.

In Doha, Qatar, U.S. Central Command said U.S. jets launched airstrikes Sunday on insurgent positions near Balad, 50 miles north of Baghdad, dropping two bombs on a suspected insurgent staging area. The statement also said that an Air Force Predator aircraft fired two Hellfire missiles against a mortar firing position near Balad.

DOJ_NMG_0002855

In southern Iraq, two British soldiers died when their armored Land Rover was destroyed by a bomb near Zubeir, a Sunni Arab enclave about 12 miles west of Basra. The deaths brought to 95 the number of British military personnel killed in Iraq.

U.S. and Iraqi officials had hoped Iraq's new constitution, which goes to voters in a referendum Oct. 15, would help lure Sunni Arabs away from the insurgency.

However, Sunni negotiators rejected the draft constitution and vowed to defeat it in the referendum. About 1,500 people, mostly Sunnis, rallied Monday near the Sunni city of Ramadi to protest the document.

Iraq's president said Monday that he and Massood Barzani, head of the Kurdistan Democratic Party, had agreed to changes in the draft constitution to address concerns that wording loosened Iraqi ties to the Arab world. The language at issue describes Iraq as an Islamic — but not Arab country — a concession to the non-Arab Kurds who form about 15% of the Iraqi population.

President Jalal Talabani said he and Barzani agreed "to accept some amendments deemed vital for the Islamic and Arab worlds concerning the Arab League because Iraq is a founding member in the Arab League." Talabani did not specify the changes.

Talabani also expressed frustration that no Arab government has designated an ambassador to Iraq.

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- Insurgents launched a daring daylight assault Monday against the Interior Ministry in Baghdad, killing two police in a surge of attacks by al-Qaida's arm in Iraq. Two British soldiers died in a roadside bombing in the south.

U.S. Marines said Monday that al-Qaida in Iraq launched multiple attacks the day before against U.S. and Iraqi targets in Hit, 85 miles west of Baghdad. Eight civilians, an Iraqi soldier and three suicide bombers died in the Hit attacks

Elsewhere, at least eight Iraqi civilians _ including five children _ were killed in fighting Monday in Tal Afar, said Dr. Abdul-Aal Kamal of the northern city's hospital.

There was no report of casualties among the combatants, including the U.S. 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment, which is trying to wrest control of Tal Afar, 260 miles north of Baghdad, from insurgents and foreign fighters.

However, Iraqi authorities said the bodies of three community leaders who had refused insurgent demands for help were found Monday in the city. Iraqi officers said gunmen swept through the victims' districts over the weekend as fighting around the city escalated.

In Baghdad, thunderous explosions and volleys of heavy gunfire rattled the downtown area soon after sunrise Monday as about four carloads of insurgents staged a lightning raid on the Interior Ministry, which is responsible for police and paramilitary units nationwide.

The insurgents, who fired automatic weapons and rocket-propelled grenades, withdrew after about 15 minutes, leaving two policemen dead and five wounded. There was no report of insurgent casualties.

A statement posted Monday on an Islamic Web site claimed responsibility for the attack in the name of al-Qaida in Iraq, led by Jordanian terror mastermind Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

U.S. Apache and Black Hawk helicopters flew over central Baghdad after the firefight, and U.S. Army patrols in armored vehicles combed the streets looking for the attackers.

The two British soldiers died when their armored Land Rover was destroyed by a bomb near Zubeir, a Sunni Arab enclave about 12 miles west of Basra.

Elsewhere, Iraqi officials said that al-Qaida-linked foreign fighters had taken control of large areas of a strategic city on the Syrian border after weeks of fighting between an Iraqi tribe that supports the insurgents and one that opposes them.

The officials, speaking on condition of anonymity for fear of reprisal, said much of Qaim, 200 miles west of Baghdad, had been abandoned after weeks of tribal fighting.

U.S. Marines operate around Qaim but have privately complained they don't have enough American or Iraqi forces to secure the area properly.

The attacks in the Hit area began Sunday morning when two suicide car bombs exploded at security barricades on the northwest side of town, a Marine statement said.

Shortly afterward, a vehicle car bomb exploded on the Hit bridge across the Euphrates River, rendering it impassable, the Marines said.

The Marine statement said three insurgents and one Iraqi soldier died in the Sunday attacks. The government in Baghdad said eight civilians also died.

DOJ_NMG_0002856

In Doha, Qatar, the U.S. Central Command said U.S. jets launched airstrikes Sunday on insurgent positions near Balad, 50 miles north of Baghdad, dropping two 500-pound bombs against an insurgent staging area.

The statement also said an Air Force Predator aircraft fired two Hellfire missiles against a mortar firing position near Balad.

Also Monday, gunmen seized one of the sons of the governor of insurgent infested Anbar province, Mamoun Sami Rashid al-Alwani, officials said on condition of anonymity for fear of insurgent reprisal. The abduction occurred in the provincial capital of Ramadi west of Baghdad.

U.S. and Iraqi officials had hoped the new constitution, which goes to the voters in a referendum Oct. 15, would in time help pacify the insurgency by luring Sunni Arabs from the movement.

However, Sunni negotiators rejected the constitution and vowed to defeat it in the referendum. The bitter, protracted negotiations appeared to have raised tensions among the country's ethnic and religious communities.

About 1,500 people, mostly Sunnis, rallied Monday near the Sunni city of Ramadi to protest the draft charter.

On Monday, Iraq's president said he and the other top Kurdish leader had agreed to changes in the draft constitution to mollify concerns among Arab countries that the wording in the charter loosened Iraqi ties to the Arab world.

The language at issue describes Iraq as an Islamic _ but not Arab country _ a concession to the non-Arab Kurds who form about 15 percent of the Iraqi population.

In a statement released by his office, Jalal Talabani said he and Massood Barzani agreed "to accept some amendments deemed vital for the Islamic and Arab worlds concerning the Arab League because Iraq is a founding member in the Arab League."

Talabani did not specify what changes in the language had been agreed to by him and Barzani, head of the Kurdistan Democratic Party.

Some Iraqi officials said last week that the changes could keep the description of Iraq as an Islamic state but add wording about Iraq having been a founding member of the Arab League. Sunni Arab negotiators said at the time that such language might satisfy the Arab League but not them.

As U.S. Tries To Secure An Iraqi Town, Insurgents Respond (NYT)

By Michael Moss

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

FARIS, Iraq - The American military recently moved into this small town 10 miles south of Falluja, one of the most violent locales in Iraq, to secure it for the coming elections, and the insurgents took all of a day to respond. They fired a rocket that missed the Americans and landed instead in a nearby playground, killing a 12-year-old boy and wounding eight other children.

"We were playing football," Ahmed Hamad Ali, also 12, said from his hospital bed the next day. "They made a big bombing."

Some residents are directing their anger not at the insurgents but at the marines, whose arrival, they say, drew the attack.

"They are like two people chasing each other," Baha Abbod, 28, a teacher.

It is hardly an unknown reaction in Iraq, where many civilians have been killed and wounded in cross-fire. But the military is bracing for a surge of situations like this one as American and Iraqi forces race to establish security for the referendum on the new Iraqi constitution to be held on Oct. 15.

"Security preparations in support of the referendum are under way throughout Iraq," said Brig. Gen. Donald Alston, a military spokesman in Baghdad.

The Marine operation was created to re-establish the presence of the Iraqi police in this town and a nearby village, Ameriya, which sits on the Euphrates River south of Falluja. The area is dominated by Sunni Arabs, who have balked at joining the Kurds and most Shiite factions in accepting the proposed constitution.

Faris and Ameriya have been without police officers since February, when the police force collapsed in the face of withering attacks by insurgents, who then used the communities as safe havens from which to mount their attacks, Marine officers said, and to intimidate civilians.

The roads from Falluja to Faris are pockmarked by craters left by makeshift bombs - improvised explosive devices, in military jargon - and on the wall at one checkpoint a scrawl in black paint urges American troops to stay alert: "Someone out there wants to kill you. Are you going to give them the chance?"

A few minutes after driving past the sign, Sgt. Tim Lawson, 24, from Shaver Lake, Calif., swerved his armored Humvee onto the shoulder as he pointed across the road to an upturned chunk of asphalt. "There's a possible I.E.D. there," he said.

Faris started out as a planned community built in the 1980's to house 30,000 engineers and others who worked in nearby munitions factories; those have been converted to construction facilities.

The marines set up headquarters in an abandoned building here and in a new house in Ameriya. For a few days they worked with no air-conditioning in 115-degree heat, with little running water and exposure to higher buildings nearby. They surrounded their buildings with giant dirt-filled wire mesh containers called Hescos and posted lookouts on the roofs.

A contingent of newly trained Iraqi troops is with the marines, building patrol experience, and they appeared poised and enthusiastic in their new uniforms and American-made body armor.

"Psst," Mustafa Kamil, 24, one of the Iraqi team leaders, said to another soldier as they moved through Ameriya in a staggered formation. "Replace me here, quickly."

He was a soldier in Saddam Hussein's army, earning about $2 a month in dinars, and after a spell cleaning streets during the start of the war, he joined the new Iraqi Army in April of last year. As an officer, he earns more than $300 a month.

He said he worried that the 24 Iraqi soldiers who had arrived in Ameriya would not be able to hold the area when the marines left. Ultimately, the marines say, they want to turn these communities over to the Iraqi police, who may face the greatest danger. Perhaps as a warning, insurgents bombed the empty police station in Ameriya.

The marines say they feel welcome in Faris and Ameriya, compared with the hostility they sensed in some other Iraqi locales where they established camps. Cpl. Brian Andrews, 24, from Austin, Tex., said the townsfolk were "very accepting of the coalition forces, at least to the naked eye."

But the rocket attack, which struck on the last weekend of August, devastated many in Faris.

Younis H. Johan, assistant director of the town's hospital, said the rocket had killed Omar Muaid, 12, whose chest and abdomen had been ripped open by the blast. He died 10 minutes after arriving at the hospital. Eight others were wounded, four of them significantly, Mr. Johan said.

"We had casualties before, but during the last month, when U.S. troops came to the area, there has started to be more," he said. "I expect a rise, pressure on the hospital."

Mr. Abbod, the teacher, says that residents who have family elsewhere will leave until the situation improves, and that even some grim places now seem attractive. His neighbor, he said, has gone to Falluja.

At the town's hospital on Aug. 29 , a Marine captain visited one of the boys wounded in the attack and vowed to find the insurgents who had fired the rocket. But as the boy's father, Qutaiba Fajir, 42, a officer in the Iraqi Army, watched the Marine officer walk from the room, he said, "We hope they leave."

Leader Says Other Arabs Are Insensitive To Iraq's Plight (NYT)

By Robert F. Worth

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Sept. 5 - In an unusual public rebuke, President Jalal Talabani angrily criticized other Arab states on Monday, saying they had insulted Iraq by not sending diplomats to Baghdad and had not sent condolence letters about the stampede last week in which almost 1,000 Shiite pilgrims were killed.

Mr. Talabani spoke just after two dozen insurgents staged a brazen dawn raid on the heavily guarded offices of the Interior Ministry in Baghdad, killing two police officers and wounding five. Two British soldiers were also killed by a roadside bomb in southern Iraq.

Speaking at a news conference, Mr. Talabani, a Kurd, amplified complaints by other Iraqi leaders about the Arab states' failure to recognize the stampede, which caused the highest one-day death toll since the American-led invasion. The complaints, aimed at mostly Sunni leaders, hinted at a sectarian bias against Iraq, where Shiites are about 60 percent of the population.

"We stood with our Arab brothers in their hard times," Mr. Talabani said. "For instance, we sent a letter expressing our condolences on the terrorist attack which claimed a lot of innocent lives in Sharm el Sheik," an Egyptian resort.

Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, a Shiite, hinted at similar criticism on Monday when asked about the emir of Qatar, Sheik Hamad bin Khalifa al-Thani, who donated $100 million to the American victims of Hurricane Katrina but nothing to the victims of the stampede. "I'm not condemning what he did, but he should think of Iraq," Mr. Jaafari said.

The comments by Mr. Talabani and Mr. Jaafari came at a time of heightened tension with other Arab nations. Last week Amr Moussa, the secretary general of the Arab League, issued a public criticism of Iraq's new constitution - largely written by Shiites and Kurds - in which he echoed the criticisms by some Sunni Arabs in Iraq. The Sunnis have opposed two provisions in particular: one that would form largely autonomous federal regions, and one that describes Iraq as an Islamic country but not an Arab one.

Some Iraqi leaders asked why Mr. Moussa was willing to denounce the new draft constitution now, after the Arab League had been notably silent about Iraq's lack of a constitution under Saddam Hussein.

DOJ_NMG_0002858

Mr. Talabani also said the two major Kurdish political parties had agreed to support Sunni demands for language in the constitution declaring Iraq an Arab nation. Although the charter was presented to the legislature last week, there have been recent talks aimed at making final revisions that might win Sunni support.

If the document is not modified, some leading Sunni Arabs have said, they will organize a campaign to defeat it in a national referendum, planned for Oct. 15.

A delegation of Sunni Arab leaders visited the Kurdish region on Monday to discuss the constitution and the Kurds' role in future elections, Mr. Talabani said.

Mr. Talabani also complained about the lack of Arabic diplomatic representation in Baghdad, calling it "an insulting issue for the country." Iraq and the United States have urged other Arab countries to send diplomats here, in hopes that the gesture would bolster the Iraqi government's legitimacy and undermine support for the insurgency.

But risk is also clearly an issue. In July, two Algerian diplomats and an Egyptian diplomat were abducted and killed by insurgents. Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, the terrorist group led by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, claimed responsibility , and has threatened to kill any Arab diplomat in Baghdad.

The attack in Baghdad on Monday began at 6:30 a.m., when four black BMW sedans raced up to a checkpoint outside the Interior Ministry, officials said. Firing belt-fed machine guns and rocket-propelled grenades, the group of about two dozen insurgents fought the ministry guards for 15 minutes before driving away. American Black Hawk and Apache helicopters could be seen flying over central Baghdad for hours afterward as American foot patrols hunted for the attackers.

Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia took responsibility for the attack in a statement posted on Islamist Web sites.

The two British soldiers were killed when a bomb detonated near their patrol in southern Iraq, British officials said. The bombing took place in Zubayr, a town just south of Basra that is a stronghold for Sunni Arab militants and was the site of many earlier attacks.

Fighting continued near Tal Afar, in the north, where American and Iraqi troops had begun a sweep for insurgents on Friday. Residents said mortar attacks could be heard on the city's outskirts.

Mohsin Qabagh, 40, a car mechanic from Tal Afar, described it as "a city of ghosts, where all signs of life have stopped and the residents have fled to other towns."

In other violence, gunmen driving through a Shiite neighborhood in western Baghdad opened fire on a group of bystanders on Monday evening, killing three and wounding three, Interior Ministry officials said. The motive for the attack was not clear.

West of the capital, in Falluja, Iraq's finance minister was attacked by insurgents armed with grenades as he drove through the center of town in a convoy. An Iraqi police officer was wounded, but the minister escaped unscathed.

United States military officials also announced Monday that they had captured Ayad Adnan Away Samir, a Falluja-based fighter and senior aide to the insurgent leader Sheik Abdullah al-Janabi.

Annan: War Spread Terrorism (WT)

By From combined dispatches

The Washington Times, September 6, 2005

LONDON -- The U.S.-led invasion of Iraq has turned the country into a new hub of terrorism worse than Afghanistan under the Taliban, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said yesterday.

Mr. Annan also said in an interview with the British Broadcasting Corp. that he expected to face blame over the Iraqi oil-for-food program when investigators deliver a report this week.

Hours before he spoke, carloads of Iraqi insurgents staged an audacious daylight assault against the Interior Ministry in Baghdad, killing two policemen before escaping.

Mr. Annan told BBC World Service radio that the war was contributing to Muslim anger throughout the world.

"I think there are many Muslims that are extremely unhappy today. Unhappy because they feel victimized, they feel isolated, they feel victimized in their own society, they feel victimized in the West, and they feel this profiling against them. And the Iraqi situation has not helped matters," he said.

"In fact, one used to be worried about Afghanistan being the center of terrorist activities. My sense is that Iraq has become a major problem, and in fact, it's worse than Afghanistan," he said.

Regarding the oil-for-food investigation, Mr. Annan said he believed chief investigator Paul Volcker would criticize him and others involved in the $64 billion program.

"I suspect that there will be lots of criticism [for] myself as chief admin officer, probably something on the [supervisory] committee, the Security Council, the government of Iraq," he said. "When it comes to Iraq, on this issue, no one is entirely covered in glory."

Mr. Volcker, a former U.S. Federal Reserve chairman is expected to deliver a major report on the program tomorrow.

DOJ_NMG_0002859

"Oil for food was an extra program we were asked to undertake. Honestly, I wish we were never given that program, and I wish the U.N. would never be asked to take that kind of a program again," Mr. Annan said.

In Baghdad yesterday, thunderous explosions and volleys of heavy gunfire rattled the downtown area soon after sunrise as about four carloads of insurgents staged a raid on the Interior Ministry, which is responsible for police and paramilitary units nationwide.

The insurgents, who fired automatic weapons and rocket-propelled grenades, withdrew after about 15 minutes, leaving two policemen dead and five wounded. There was no report of insurgent casualties.

A statement posted on an Islamic Web site claimed responsibility for the attack in the name of al Qaeda in Iraq, led by a Jordanian terrorist Abu Musab Zarqawi.

U.S. Marines said the same group had conducted multiple attacks the day before against U.S. and Iraqi targets in Hit, 85 miles west of Baghdad. Eight civilians, an Iraqi soldier and three suicide bombers died in the Hit attacks

Elsewhere, at least eight Iraqi civilians -- including five children -- were killed in fighting yesterday in Tal Afar, said Abdul-Aal Kamal of the northern city's hospital.

Bush Makes Better Case For Iraq War, But Needs Troops (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, September 6, 2005

President Bush has made an important shift as he tries to bolster public support for the Iraq war, moving from idealism to a hard national security argument. He needs to stress the new message more.

Unpopular though the idea may be, he may also have to increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq in order to have any hope of defeating the insurgency.

And, for sure, he has to get the Pentagon to stop talking about drawing down U.S. troop levels next year and get with Bush's own program: The United States stays until Iraq is secure.

Bush's new public case for Iraq was unveiled Aug. 24 in Idaho and repeated in his V-J Day anniversary speech six days later in San Diego.

Both speeches contained the familiar assertions that Iraq is a key front in the war on terrorism and that the best way to fight terrorism is to bring democracy to that country and the rest of the Middle East.

In the past, those arguments — plus optimistic reports on training of Iraqi security forces and political progress — have failed to arrest a sharp drop-off in public support for the war.

As a writer for National Review Online, Andrew C. McCarthy correctly puts it: "The American people did not go to war for the goal of advancing freedom. ... [They] went to war to protect the national security of the United States from current and gathering threats which they understood after Sept. 11, 2001, could no longer responsibly be waited out.

"What the American people care about is defeating militant Islam. ... They know that leaving when terrorism runs rampant would be a victory for militant Islam. It would encourage our enemies toward more terrorism."

That's essentially the case Bush made in the recent speeches, emphasizing the stakes involved for the United States and what will happen if the insurgency succeeds in Iraq.

"During the last few decades, the terrorists grew to believe that if they hit America hard, as in Lebanon and Somalia, America would retreat and back down," he said in Idaho.

"Before Sept. 11, Osama Bin Laden said that an attack could make America run in less than 24 hours. So now they are trying to break our will with acts of violence. They'll kill women and children, knowing that the images of their brutality will horrify civilized people."

He should have added, "And they and the followers of Saddam Hussein are killing American soldiers in hopes that the death toll will undermine support for the war here at home."

But he did say, "Their goal is to force us to retreat. See, they have a strategy. They want us to retreat so they can topple governments in the Middle East and turn that region into a safe haven for terrorism."

In San Diego, he said that "if Zarqawi and Bin Laden gain control of Iraq, they would create a new training ground for future terrorist attacks. They'd seize oil fields to fund their ambitions, they could recruit more terrorists by claiming a historic victory over the United States and our coalition."

Bush might have added — and should add in future speeches — that "if the United States is driven out of Iraq, our leadership role in the world will be sorely shaken. Adversaries will be emboldened. Friends will be discouraged. Our ability to persuade fence-sitters will be impaired on a broad range of issues."

It's doubtful that the new message has taken hold in the public's mind yet, but polls indicate that public disapproval of the war and Bush's policy in Iraq may have bottomed out.

DOJ_NMG_0002860

Despite increased U.S. casualties and the massive publicity garnered by war protester Cindy Sheehan, the latest Gallup poll shows that support for her position — an immediate U.S. pullout — has fallen from 33 percent to 26 percent.

The Washington Post/ABC News poll showed that only 13 percent hold that position and that a majority of 56 percent supports increasing U.S. forces (21 percent) or keeping current levels (35 percent).

Support for Bush could get a boost if Iraqi voters approve the country's new constitution Oct. 15, but it's likely to be as temporary as it was after the Jan. 30 elections.

What Bush policy needs is progress in defeating the insurgency — and to get that, he may well need to increase U.S. forces.

A Bush supporter I trust who has made multiple visits to Iraq is convinced that Iraqi security forces are unlikely to be able to contain the insurgency for the foreseeable future and, as matters now stand, the United States is losing ground to the insurgents.

This official says that combined U.S. and Iraqi forces are capable of driving insurgents out of cities such as Fallujah or Ramadi, but don't have the manpower to hold them — so Saddamists and jihadists return and kill or intimidate those who "collaborated" with us.

This point of view has been compellingly confirmed on the ground by Knight-Ridder correspondent Tom Lasseter, who has been embedded with U.S. Marines and Army units in Sunni-dominated Anbar province.

On Aug. 25, Lasseter reported that "in Fallujah, a city that Marines and soldiers retook from insurgents last November in the heaviest urban combat since Vietnam, [insurgent] fighters have begun to return and renew their intimidation campaign."

He quoted one Marine colonel as saying, "I don't think of this in terms of winning" and another as saying, "if you go into an area and you don't stay in that area, the insurgents will return and intimidate the local population."

Lasseter quoted one platoon commander who said, "There's no way I can control this area with the men I have." American officers said it would take "years of preparation" for Iraqi forces to take over.

But there's total confusion, based on statements from various top commanders, about whether American troop levels will increase, decrease or stay the same. For a time, the Pentagon even tried to abandon Bush's declaration of a "global war on terror" and replace it with "global struggle against violent extremism."

Bush put the kibosh on that. He continues to make it clear that America is at war. What he must do now is make it unmistakable to the American people what the stakes of the war are and provide adequate forces to win it.

An Uncertain Dawn On A Scarred Street (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

BAGHDAD Last of three parts

On June 23, 2005, a war more than two years old arrived at the busy commercial district of Karrada, where Amal Salman, now 16, lived with her family.

For months, hardly a day had passed without a car bomb somewhere in Iraq; the scenes unleashed in Karrada by the explosion at 7 a.m. were so familiar as to have become routine. Twisted wreckage smoldered, its acrid smoke mingling with the stench of seared flesh. Water cascaded over the fires, then, turning black, mixed with pools of blood. Shattered glass danced along the buckling asphalt like a hailstorm.

Left in the bomb's wake were the ruins of the Abdel-Rasul Ali Mosque, a neighborhood place of worship entered through wooden doors graced by a blue, floral-tiled portico and decorated by calligraphy invoking God, Muhammad and Imam Ali. In quieter months, under lazy fans and chandeliers, Amal, her mother and sisters had gathered there to celebrate the religious holidays of Shiite Muslims.

"I woke up terrorized by the powerful explosion, with my heart beating fast, fearing that someone might have died or been wounded," Amal wrote in her journal that day.

With her sisters and mother, she clambered onto the balcony of their three-room apartment. Surprisingly quickly, police had arrived, vainly trying to direct dazed bystanders, some of their faces frozen in the blank stares of shock. From the third floor, Amal heard the shouts of others -- cries of anger and, more frequently, helplessness.

Minutes later, in a tactic that had become more and more common those days, another car bomb detonated, then another, all along her street as Amal watched. Before the spasm ended, four in all exploded, killing 17 people and hurting many more.

"For a moment, I thought I had died," Amal wrote in a long entry. "Then I realized I was not dead, but I was so scared. In a moment the police car was burned and those inside it were dead, burned. A young man who had only recently announced his engagement died, along with a good old man who lives in the neighborhood, named Abu Karrar, and Khalil the Kurd, who owns a shop in one of the small shopping centers here."

Since she had begun keeping her diary in 2003, Amal had witnessed the events of a lifetime: an invasion and the only government she knew toppled in a few weeks; an occupation; promises of prosperity and the disappointment that followed; an insurgency and the specter of civil war. That Thursday morning was the first time she had seen death.

"It was a true disaster which I will never forget as long as I live. Total destruction, not only in the Karrada district, but inside me, my family and among our neighbors," she wrote. "I was really in pain over this scene which I hope no one would ever have to see."

Residents sometimes remark that Baghdad is cursed by how little is ordinary. It is a city that Karima, Amal's mother, calls forsaken, tempered perhaps only by its resilience -- the city's best and, in these days, most valuable trait. On a hot summer day, as a sandstorm cast the capital in a sickly glow, Amal recovered from the latest disaster. She helped care for her sister, Hibba, whose right arm was torn by flying debris. She traded gossip with neighbors about who lived and who died. She watched police clear the streets, then saw the Americans arrive. A military truck brought bottles of water; people lined up to receive them.

"It was a scene that was hard to describe, as if the Iraqis were beggars standing in line in a humiliating way," she wrote. "During the dispensing of the water bottles, the American woman soldier gave a camera to the translator to take a few pictures."

By nightfall, the dead were buried, carried to their graves in funeral processions.

"Women were crying," Amal wrote, "and many people with grief on their face seemed bewildered and unable to understand why so many people have to die."Coping With Hardship

Amal had turned 16 on March 23, her hair still pulled back in a ponytail. But she looked older, having passed abruptly to adulthood from an abbreviated adolescence.

Her sisters, too, wore the years of hardship. The twins, Hibba and Duaa, were now 14. Hibba wore a hijab over her hair, while Duaa braided hers. During the invasion, they had been friendly, even effervescent, eager to show off their Koranic recitation, chants for Saddam Hussein and snippets of elementary school English. With their faces and bodies no longer boyish, tradition now dictated that they keep a distance from men.

Fatima, at 18 the oldest, had long ago left school to help Karima, a widow, raise the children. In the time since then, her literacy had faded, as had some of her confidence.

Zainab, the quietest and most beautiful of the girls, had married in the spring at 17. Her husband, Ali, had been a police officer, earning $300 a month. In July, though, he received the leaflet that so many of his colleagues dreaded: a death threat from shadowy insurgents. "They told him either you quit or we'll kill your wife," Amal recalled. He quit.

A year before, Karima had finally found work as a maid at the Palm Hotel, since renamed the Rawabi, cleaning eight rooms from 8 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. In a racket of sorts, the local employment agency took a third of her wages. That left her with about $33 a month.

Ali, 22, a former soldier and Karima's oldest son, had secured a job, too. He was now serving tea in a nearby real estate office, working from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. He made about a dollar a day, "depending on the baksheesh ," or tips. His younger brother, Mohammed, 20, was long without work. A ne'er-do-well, he spent most of his time prowling the streets; even his family suspected he was up to no good. Mahmoud, at 11 the youngest, sold soft drinks in the street during summer. At his best, he could bring in nearly $2 a day. Already, the time outside had given him a precocious street sense.

With the exception of Mohammed, their trials had brought them closer; as their city collapsed, they looked inward, their isolation a source for their strength.

"My family is my country," Amal said.

The words that danced that summer across Baghdad's landscape, a panorama washed of color by the sun and time, were almost always confusing.

Billboards along highways with heaps of trash marketed the mobile phones of Asia Cell. "Now your voice is heard," they declared. Another pictured a fingerprint, the hoped-for symbol of the January election, when voters dipped their index fingers in dye to certify they cast ballots. "Iraq," it intoned. Those faded posters were now dusty, some of them torn. Graffiti on a dirty wall in the capital's Sadr City slum spoke to the present: "You traitors, we don't want elections, we want electricity." In Amal's neighborhood, another poster, its meaning ambiguous, suggested the past: "Today is the same as yesterday."

"Today was quiet, and no one spoke about anything except electricity, which comes only for short times," Amal wrote in her entry on July 4. "Water is not available because the terrorists are targeting water pumping plants every day. The rich can live outside Iraq very comfortably, but the poor who can't have to stay suffering."

As they had during the war, Amal and her sisters still filled buckets of water each day from a leaky faucet in the courtyard, then lugged them up two flights of stairs. The summer before, her family sometimes had as many as 12 hours a day of electricity -- cycles of two on, two off. For an entire week in June this year, they had just two hours. It was one hour a day for stretches in July. In August, it had doubled to two hours.

As they sat in the dark on one sweltering day, the lights flickered on. "God's prayers on Muhammad and the family of Muhammad!" they shouted, with weary smiles. In 10 minutes, the lights dimmed again. "Is this real?" Karima asked, shaking her head.

In one of the bedrooms, a visiting Zainab was gathering blankets from the floor, where Karima's five daughters had slept together. From the kitchen, Amal brought in tea and a single fried egg. The others shared this, along with Iraqi bread known as samoun .

Their conversation that morning turned to money, then to their lack of it. Neighbors had purchased a small generator, but a share of its power was expensive: $10 a month, along with $1.50 a day for the fuel. The Karrada bombing had damaged the nerves in Hibba's right forearm; she could no longer grip a pencil. A doctor's appointment cost $5, and physical therapy ran $2 a day. Given the family's budget, they would let her try to heal on her own. The money would go instead to put the youngest daughters through school.'Death Is All We Hear'

Like many in Iraq over nearly three years, Amal's family was locked in a cycle of moments of optimism, followed by long months of brutality and dejection. There were turning points -- Hussein's fall, the formal end of the U.S. occupation in 2004 -- and Iraqis often greeted them with anticipation and hope. Disappointment typically followed. One of those turning points was the election in January, when Karima, Ali, Mohammed and Fatima defied insurgent threats and walked cheerfully to the polling station.

"I regret that I went to the elections and voted," Karima said seven months later, as she sat with Amal and her sisters over breakfast. "What did we elect? Nothing."

"If we voted or didn't vote, it's still the same thing," said Fatima, her oldest daughter and most pessimistic. "If the Americans want to do something, they'll do it."

Karima nodded, her veiled head cast to the ground. It was a gesture that seemed to mean: What more can be said? Her city was mahjura -- forsaken or abandoned.

"I feel sorry for Baghdad," she said softly.

In the worst days of the invasion, Karima once said something as Amal and her sisters sat around her. "It's like we're part of a play on a stage," she said, her voice reflective. "Life's not good, it's not bad. It's just a play."

As Iraq entered a third year of war, those words acknowledging her powerlessness seemed to take on new meaning. The script was already written. People like Karima sat as spectators, watching a performance.

Violence, now mundane, was reshaping their lives. Its pervasiveness was breeding distrust and fear as amorphous as Hussein's repression was pervasive.

"While I was downstairs, my brother Mahmoud came and said the road was blocked. Everyone was asking why and some said they had arrested terrorists," Amal wrote on July 5. "The truth however was that police had found a bag, and at first thought there was a bomb inside it, but in fact they found a girl of 16 years -- dead, beheaded, and naked. She was thrown on the street, inside a bag, raped by someone unknown."

"Death is all we hear in the news everyday," she wrote in another entry, a few pages later. "Death, slaughter, murder, kidnappings and robberies. Nobody knows why."

At times in the summer, Amal's street would assume a veneer of normalcy. Lines of cars still stretched miles from gas stations. But markets along the sun-soaked sidewalk overflowed with goods piled on rickety stands: socks imported from China and T-shirts from Syria. Down the street were children's toys. There was a "Super Mega Heavy Metal Fighter" action figure and a doll that, when squeezed, played "It's a Small World."

In the family's apartment, though, the daily mayhem cast a long shadow. Weeks after the Karrada bombing, Amal and her siblings recalled its scenes in almost photographic detail.

"The dead have become cheap," Mahmoud, the 11-year-old, said dispassionately.

He recalled one piece of burning shrapnel that sliced through five people. Abu Karrar, he remembered, stumbled across the street, his shirt bloodied. Then he died. A bone of Abbas Rubaie's leg flared through his pants. The flesh of another neighbor's arm was seared off. A car's engine, the boy said, fell on top of a corpse.

"Only the best people die," Mahmoud said. "They always pick the best fruit."

In her diary, Amal recounted the police raids that followed, as officers forced their way into apartments and searched for suspects. She and her sisters watched passively, in silence. Two people were arrested; neighbors said they were innocent, "poor laborers at a soap factory." More raids ensued that summer, sometimes every few days.

"God knows who is telling the truth or not these days," Amal wrote in July. "No one has trust in anybody else, whether the police, the National Guard or even our own folks."Liberation and Contradiction

DOJ_NMG_0002863

In 2004, a year after the invasion, Amal had sat with her mother, confused about occupation and liberation, unsure about the fortunes of her country. Some blamed the Americans for their plight, she said then; others blamed Hussein, or even the Iraqis themselves.

At the time, Amal shook her head. "I don't know what to say," she confessed.

Another year on, though, Amal was no longer the young girl who parroted the hollow slogans of Hussein's state and, as it crumbled, directed prayers to God. She no longer deferred to her sisters, formulating her tentative opinions but often too shy to deliver them. The conflict around her had become more than a simple struggle to survive. Karima, her mother, now listened to her, as did her sisters. They might disagree with her, but they witnessed in Amal liberation measured in the most personal of terms: She saw for herself.

"All the government officials say, 'What do I want,' " her sister Fatima said one afternoon in August. "They don't care about the people. They don't care about the nation."

Amal interrupted her. "I feel like it's going to change," she countered.

The girls sat together in the apartment, where iconography had proliferated over the months. More posters had gone up of Shiite saints, placid portraits. A blue porcelain plate still hung. "God," it read simply. The electricity was on, and the dank stairwell was lit. Inside, enough sun filtered through the window, and the girls left the lights off.

"The intervention of the Americans in Iraq has brought about the biggest revolution the world has ever seen," Amal insisted.

"It's an occupation," her older sister answered.

"Did the Americans change the regime or not?" Amal said.

She was speaking neither in support nor opposition; she was simply reflecting fact. She didn't try to reconcile contradictions; she understood there were ambiguities.

"It's an occupation," Fatima answered again. "When the Americans move, we have to stop in the streets. We have to pull over. If we don't stop, they'll hit us. It's our country. Why do we have to stop for them? We should be giving the orders."

"It's going to get better and better," Amal countered confidently. "This is just my opinion," she said, "and I'll say my opinion freely."

"The people who died, did it get better for them?" Fatima asked, a little frustrated.

Amal turned her palms up and smiled.

She talked about the insurgency. Guerrillas fighting American troops in the western province of Anbar were honorable, she said. "I respect them, but it's not resistance to kill someone working for the Americans. That's not what we call resistance."

"The American presence has positives and negatives, but it was a revolution," she said. Amal pointed her finger at her older sister. "It changed the regime. We don't say it's all good now. We don't say it's all positive. But we hope, we hope."

Occasionally in her diary and more often in conversations, Amal speaks of what she calls the contradiction -- pessimism and hope, sentiments seemingly irreconcilable.

In that contradiction is perhaps one of the truths of her city: Baghdad, its residents often say, deserves better, and they mourn the perpetual loss of the most fabled Arab capital. Resilience, a truly Iraqi quality in its defiance, somehow propels it forward.

"There's no answer to our problems. If you look for one, there is none," Amal said. Her family had turned quiet, listening. "The situation is bad. It's true, it's really bad. It's true that every day is worse than the one before. But we don't ever want to be hopeless.

"I always want to leave something for tomorrow," she went on. "The sun will set today, but it always rises again. Everything rises again. Even without life, there is hope."

She stopped for a moment and smiled at the attention the others were paying her.

"I don't know how to express it," she said softly, "but I understand it."

WHEN his world feels torn apart, José Díaz puts words together.

He writes a line about the night in Iraq when his captain lay wounded on the ground with no life in his eyes: "No answer could be given; the shrapnel could not tell us why we bleed."

By describing his reality, his descriptions affirm it somehow. War, he writes, "is easy enough to leave physically, but almost impossible to depart emotionally."

DOJ_NMG_0002864

Mr. Díaz , 35, who came to the United States from Cuba on the Mariel boatlift in 1980, has written a poem included in "Voices in Wartime" (Whit Press, 2005), an anthology that explores the experience of war through literature.

Mr. Díaz , an information technology manager for a New Jersey chemical company, lives in Rutherford, N.J., and writes wherever and whenever: using a notebook in a bouncy Humvee in a convoy in Iraq, using a recorder in a car on the Garden State Parkway, punching poem fragments into his cellphone when he was floored by the differences between New York and Abu Ghraib, where he was stationed for nine months in 2004.

"Before, the city always meant joy, fun and laughter," he said of New York. "But I couldn't tear myself away from that little patch of land very far away, and that night." He has memories of hearing his captain asking another friend to take care of his children.

Of the memories, he said, "Writing poetry is a way of making them safer and not letting them run away with you."

He said he came back from Iraq more cynical, aggressive and on edge.

"On the one hand you're disturbed by the very things that make you stronger, unique, different and insightful about this world."

Mr. Díaz began writing poetry with a club that met at Havana Bay Coffee in North Bergen, N.J., starting with love poems. "I can't do that anymore," he said, recalling children in Iraq living off the garbage of Americans stationed there. "Love seems like a trivial subject to write about."

He shows fragments that will become his next poem, "Had We Known."

He has changed the word "inhale" to "hum" in this line about the call to prayer, which often preceded mortar attacks: "Once more, it was our fate to hum the call of the muezzin."

In the final version, he looks at his friend's eye, and sees it move.

It's green, thank God! Exhale! Inhale!

And forget what lies beyond the line of sight.

Confine it now and then to the realm of our repose.

U.S. And Afghan Forces Kill 25 Suspected Taliban In Two Raids (LAT)

By Paul Watson

The Los Angeles Times, September 6, 2005

KABUL, Afghanistan — U.S. and Afghan forces killed 25 suspected Taliban fighters and captured dozens more in operations in two southern provinces over two days, Afghan and U.S. officials said.

On Monday, U.S. and Afghan forces killed 12 suspected militants and detained nine others in a raid in Zabol province, the U.S. military said. Soldiers were brought by helicopter into a remote area where militants were believed to be gathering before launching attacks. No casualties were reported among the Afghan and U.S. forces.

The operation in Zabol followed a raid in neighboring Kandahar province in which U.S. and Afghan forces killed 13 suspected Taliban fighters, and captured dozens more, in a remote area where a political candidate was kidnapped and executed last week, a provincial official said.

U.S. and Afghan troops dropped by parachute from American aircraft in the operation, which began Sunday, Kandahar Gov. Asadullah Khalid said by telephone from Kandahar city, the provincial capital. None of the coalition troops was injured.

The assault targeted insurgents suspected of killing Khan Mohammed, a candidate for Kandahar's provincial council in the country's Sept. 18 election who was abducted Friday, the governor added. A district commissioner and three policemen were killed along with Mohammed.

At least four other candidates have been killed in the weeks before the election for the lower house of Afghanistan's parliament and provincial councils. It is Afghanistan's first parliamentary election since U.S.-led forces toppled the Taliban's hard-line Islamic regime in late 2001.

Backed by U.S. attack helicopters, the American and Afghan troops, and local police, landed Sunday in the Lal valley, about 50 miles northwest of Kandahar, the governor said. More than 40 suspected insurgents were detained. They are being interrogated, U.S. Col. Jim Yonts, spokesman for the coalition forces, told reporters in Kabul, the Afghan capital.

Khalid said some of them might be released soon, while the rest would be put on trial as Taliban militants.

"I think this was a group that was hiding and getting ready to conduct operations to bring chaos to the process of the elections in Afghanistan, so this [assault] will decrease the danger of the Taliban insurgency," the governor added.

Yonts denied there was any link between the offensive, which was still underway Monday, and Friday's kidnappings and executions.

"What you have here is when coalition forces are notified, through intelligence means, that there are enemy forces in an area, we will quickly and aggressively take the fight to them," Yonts said.

DOJ_NMG_0002865

Taliban and allied guerrillas have killed at least 51 U.S. troops in Afghanistan this year, the heaviest combat losses for American forces since the war against the Taliban and its allies in the Al Qaeda terrorist network began in 2001. More than 1,000 Afghans, many of them civilian victims of insurgent attacks, have died.

But the international security force led by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in the country considers the militants' attack rate similar to that for the period before last year's presidential election, said Maj. Andrew Elmes, a British spokesman.

Millions of Afghans defied Taliban threats and turned out to vote in an election won by President Hamid Karzai, a strong U.S. ally.

United Nations organizers say that with more than 5,800 candidates from 72 parties running in the upcoming election, their task is several times more complicated than last year's vote.

In other recent attacks in southern Afghanistan, insurgents killed five Afghan police officers in an ambush Sunday. The previous day, guerrillas killed three Afghan police officers guarding a supply convoy headed to a U.S. military base.

Despite daily attacks by guerrillas across large swaths of southern and eastern Afghanistan, Yonts said the U.S. military saw the attacks as local or regional operations without any national coordination.

"In our assessment, it is not connected to any kind of a network," he said. "You will see an individual attack here, you may see an individual attack in this [other] province over here. But there is nothing that we see that fuses that together from any sort of an infrastructure, or coordinated program."

The insurgents mainly operate in cells of one to five fighters, Yonts said.

13 Insurgents Killed As U.S. And Afghans Mount Drive (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 5 - Afghan and American forces have mounted an operation in recent days in a remote mountainous district of southern Afghanistan in pursuit of a group of insurgents, Afghan and American officials said Monday.

They said that 13 insurgents suspected of ties to the country's former Taliban rulers had been killed and more than 40 people had been detained.

The area of combat is the same district, Ghorak, where suspected Taliban insurgents kidnapped, and claimed to have killed, five people on Saturday - a local election candidate, a government official and three police officers. An American spokesman, Col. James Yonts, said the operation was not directly linked to their abduction, but was based on intelligence about enemy activity.

The governor of Kandahar province, Asadullah Khalid, said the 13 insurgents had been killed Sunday in American-led airstrikes on the area.

One Afghan soldier was wounded in the operation as troops were brought in by Chinook helicopters, said the Afghan Army spokesman, Gen. Muhammad Zaher Azimi.

The fighting came after several days of increased violence that left two candidates for the Sept. 18 parliamentary elections dead, as well as 16 other people. The dead include a British engineer, two Japanese tourists, a government official and his son, a cleric and six police officers. Afghan officials blamed Taliban insurgents for the violence, saying the Taliban are trying to disrupt Afghanistan's parliamentary elections.

Pakistan Builds Its Forces on Border

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Sept. 5 (Reuters) - Pakistan has sent thousands of troop reinforcements to its western border to help choke off the Taliban-led insurgency in the weeks before Afghanistan's parliamentary elections, a military spokesman said Monday.

About 5,000 more troops have been sent to North-West Frontier Province and 4,500 more to Baluchistan Province, bringing the total of troops near the border to almost 80,000, Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan said.

Last year, the Taliban were unable to mount a credible threat to the election for president because of a squeeze put on the border areas by the Pakistani Army, American-led forces and the Afghan Army.

But since March, the Taliban and their allies have intensified their campaign of violence. The insurgents have suffered the heaviest casualties, officials contend, but dozens of civilians, Afghan security personnel and American troops have been among the hundreds of people killed.

After The Fall, Amal Surrenders Her Illusions (WP)

BAGHDAD Second of three parts

DOJ_NMG_0002866

On April 10, 2003, the day after the fall of President Saddam Hussein, the veil had been lifted but no one was sure what it revealed.

Conquered no less than 15 times in its history, Baghdad was called free, but the city was a furious storm set down. Emotions -- euphoria, vindictiveness, desperation, confusion -- surged up from the people after years of silence and restraint. The city seemed like a dazed inmate stumbling out of his cell and squinting into the harsh sunlight. Some spoke of anarchy: Armed civilians had begun to crack the monopoly on violence held only weeks earlier by Hussein's government and the American military forces now occupying Iraq. Thousands of residents hurried to plunder everything from trucks and wooden carts to the urinals, copper pipes and electrical wiring of public buildings. Hospitals and embassies fell prey, along with ministries, government offices, Baath Party headquarters and the stone mansions, faced in onyx, of Hussein's lieutenants.

"The hospitals are being looted and no one is protesting! Why does the St. Rafael Hospital have an American tank protecting it? Is it because it is a Christian hospital? What about the Alwiya Maternity Hospital? What about the pregnant women there?" 14-year-old Amal Salman wrote in her journal on April 11. "Why has it befallen Iraqis? Wasn't it enough to loot government offices? Now the hospitals and even homes?"

She asked a question heard often in Baghdad in those days: "What are the Americans going to do with us?" The entry ended succinctly: "God, have mercy on us."

Like others, Amal, her sisters and her mother confronted a city that was collapsing as living conditions worsened. Few parents let their daughters walk alone in the streets, and the members of Amal's family spent most of their time in their apartment, huddled in a stuffy living room, sweating. In time, power was restored, but it remained intermittent, sorely inadequate as temperatures climbed. Phones were still not working, the networks shattered by bombing. Money, each denomination bearing Hussein's portrait, was scarce. Prices soared further, and shortages were everywhere. Overnight, tens of thousands lost their jobs as the bureaucracy disintegrated, some offices in flames.

There was an attitude in Iraq in those months, shared by Amal and her family, that seemed to condemn the occupation from the start. Many in Baghdad had been in awe at American technology during the war. Especially during the conflict's first days, the U.S. assault was as devastating as it was precise. Hussein had ruled for 35 years; the Americans had toppled him in less than three weeks, and relatively few of their soldiers had died in the task. How could these same Americans be so feeble in the aftermath?

"Where is the help that Bush spoke about?" Amal wrote. "No one knows."

Through those days, she stayed far from the gear-laden U.S. soldiers now in the streets, peering at them from her balcony and even returning waves, but reluctant to speak. Her effervescent twin sisters, Duaa and Hibba, were more curious. On a Saturday in the occupation's first month, a tank was parked on the street, and the girls went to say hello to the soldiers, who gave them chocolates. A few minutes later was the crack of gunfire.

"Hibba tried to ask the soldier what was happening. He told her, 'Go! Go!' But Hibba didn't understand the American language. Out of fear for Hibba, he carried her to our building. They are nice, but they are misled by Bush, the dangerous one," she wrote.

Two days later, the twins saw another group of U.S. soldiers in the streets, their desert camouflage melting into the city's palette of browns. "They wrote their names on the children's palms. Hibba's hand had names of Americans soldiers on it. Hibba and Duaa were very happy. They said the soldiers were very friendly and they were delighted with them. Is it true they are good?" she asked.Reconciling With Reality

Ever so slightly, Amal's writing began to change in those turbulent months. During the war, infused with the government's propaganda, she had spoken with the force of a loyalist. Precocious, the smartest of Karima Salman's daughters and an enthusiastic inductee in her school's Baath Party group, she had competed with her sisters in pledges of fealty to Hussein, even if her diary was more reflective. In April, a week after his fall, as her fellow Shiite Muslims celebrated his demise, Amal still held tenaciously to received views. Hussein was all she knew. "Until now," she said as she sat with her family, "we still say his excellency, the president."

But privately Amal seemed baffled, and she gave voice to her confusion in the diary. A war she dreaded was over and a revolution she did not understand just beginning; she tried to reconcile her experience with reality, as churning, unpredictable and menacing as it was.

"We used to have trust in President Saddam Hussein," she wrote on April 11, two days after his fall, "but now we don't know whom we trust."

Hussein still cast many shadows in Iraq; he would do so for months and years to follow. Almost immediately, the mass graves of those he had persecuted began to be unearthed, the victims numbering in the tens of thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands. With their discovery came an accounting of the dead. Days after Hussein's fall, photocopied pictures of men missing or executed and now celebrated as martyrs began to crowd for space in markets, offices and mosques. Their dark eyes, lonesome, stared ahead.

Quieter was the process of demystifying Hussein. His name was still whispered; who knew if danger remained, if somehow he might still be listening, waiting? "No one knows where President Saddam Hussein's whereabouts are, or when he will appear with his army," Amal wrote in an entry on April 16. "They say Saddam Hussein is in Baghdad with a big army, built for the final battle between Iraq and America. No one knows if this is true or not. They are just rumors, true or not."

Secrets soon poured out, and Amal digested the horrors of the government she had once seen as indestructible. Weeks after Hussein's fall, she and her family watched some of the 50-cent videos that flooded the market. They detailed the ornate palaces in a style of kitschy Arabesque that Hussein built -- "all with gold and silver," she wrote -- the gassing of 5,000 Kurds in 1988 in the northern Iraqi city of Halabja, and Uday Hussein's notorious abduction of women whom he fancied.

"Saddam's eldest son, Uday, is the biggest corrupt person on earth," she wrote after watching the videos over two days, their viewing interrupted by blackouts. "Any girl he liked, he would take. No one could say anything because he is the son of President Saddam Hussein. His other son, Qusay, is also cruel, like his father and brother."

The same, she wrote, went for Hussein's other relatives.

"No one realizes they are gone, all of them, forever," she wrote.An Open-Ended Collapse

The U.S. invasion that toppled Hussein and brought the occupation never had a real name. The Bush administration called it Operation Iraqi Freedom. Predictably, Hussein's own name for the invasion, Marakat al-Hawasim, Defining Battle, was similarly grandiose.

Like many in Iraq, Amal and her family simply called the war the suqut -- "the collapse" or "the fall," a name that probably made more sense than any other. It designated the end of 35 years of pitiless Baath Party rule. In a way, it suggested, too, that another beginning had yet to be inaugurated. Through 2003 and 2004, Marakat al-Hawasim lingered in the wreckage of the government's fall. It remained open-ended, its muddled aftermath as inconclusive as Hussein's fall seemed climactic. For Iraqis, suqut meant an end without renewal, a seemingly endless interim. It was a life imposed, not chosen.

"Everybody is asking about the future, the future of Iraq," Amal wrote in the summer of 2003. "Some are asking where is the future. Others say Iraq has no future anymore. These are all opinions, but no one knows what the truth is."

Amal's diary was becoming more and more tattered. The writing itself was filled with highs, the glimmers of hope that had passed, and the more enduring lows that always seemed to return.

"God is greatest! Praise to God!" Amal wrote in one entry when occasional electricity flickered through their apartment. "There was rejoicing in the whole building, people saying to each other, 'Electricity is back, thanks be to God.' We slept, feeling happy because of the electricity."

And then, a few pages later: "We are now sitting, waiting for electricity to come back. What happened to the promises?"

In Amal's building, the water remained off for months, so the children took turns lugging buckets from a faucet that still worked in the entryway downstairs, near a pool of black, brackish water. For days at a time, the family had no kerosene for cooking. On the occasions it was available, it would sometimes sell for 20 times its prewar rate. Prices for food skyrocketed: Karima groused that cucumbers had tripled in price since the war's end and tomatoes had more than doubled. The family staved off hunger only by way of monthly food rations that were still distributed to each family. Rent was always two months or more late, and the landlord was stopping by the apartment every few days, angrily demanding money.

The pressure was taking its toll on Karima, a widow who was just 36. Her oldest son, Ali, had survived the war, deserting the army before the conflict ended and making his way to Baghdad. But he was jobless. She looked for work at the city's main hotels -- the Meridien and the Sheraton -- but could not make her way through security. She spoke no English; often the U.S. soldiers manning the entrance spoke no Arabic. Their interpreters dismissed her as more riffraff from the street.

As her family's circumstances spiraled downward, Karima, in desperation, went to the family of her late husband's sister along Abu Nawas Street. Karima needed help -- money for rent and food. After fighting and humiliating Karima, the relatives tried to get U.S. soldiers stationed down the street to arrest her, but the interpreter with the troops was a neighbor of Karima's and sided with her. Karima returned home.

"Why would my aunt do that?" Amal asked. "She is our aunt and we are like her children. But the times have changed. Life has no mercy on anyone in this world. Even the same family won't have mercy on each other. Why? Why? I think of this every day. She is the sister of my father. Why did she do all that? Because of money? She is a teacher and she is in no need, but we are. If my aunt has no compassion to us, who will?"'What Else Can We Do?'

In Amal's writings, the meaning of liberation was personal. Her mind was flowering, her raw intelligence exercised by her consideration of her country's experience. Amal's hard-won wisdom seemed the quietest of triumphs in the long months after Hussein's fall.

In a society that equated wisdom with age, the once-impressionable girl had begun thinking critically, first about Hussein and then the invasion, the occupation and the ambitions that drove the Americans forward. There was an irony in her awakening: She was free to speak, but it was her liberators whom she criticized with her new candor.

"People are exhausted and conditions are harsh. We are now living on false dreams and in a failed democracy," she wrote. "Satellites were banned in the past, and they are now permitted, but who can buy a satellite? Those who have money can buy, but those who don't can't buy anything. This is democracy."

Well-intentioned U.S. officials would often remark that they were there to throw open the gate to a democratic, pluralistic future, but stressed that the Iraqis themselves would have to walk through it, on their own. Time and again -- often oblivious to history and unmindful of the consequences an occupation inspired -- the Americans were frustrated when Iraqis, battered and beaten down by wars and dictatorship, didn't start to walk through the gate.

But the Americans had to take, or at least share, responsibility for raising the people's expectations in the first place. Iraqis might forget the date, perhaps even the person who spoke the words, but they always remembered the pledge uttered on March 6, 2003, by President Bush when he promised that "the life of the Iraqi citizen is going to dramatically improve."

One of those who remembered was young Amal:

"Please, tell us, when are we going to live a life of security and stability? Listen to us, hear us, you people out there, we have cried and shouted. What else can we do?"

Although her entries became less frequent through the year, Amal's writing became clearer, her sentences longer and more complex, her vocabulary more sophisticated. She gained confidence in her ideas as she observed life around her. "They talk about democracy. Where is democracy? Is it that people die of hunger and deprivation and fear? Is that democracy?"

When the damp, sometimes gusty cold of winter arrived, Amal's family sat on mattresses and shabby brown blankets around a kettle of tea, brewed by eldest sister Fatima, and a plate of cheese called Abu Thufira served on a dented metal tray. Pictures of Arabic pop stars lined the walls, along with the usual religious portraits and invocations.

The twins attached stickers of soccer players to their school notebooks. The other children traded copies of leaflets that were circulating in the streets at the time. "An American soldier cries in Baghdad," one of them declared over a picture of an American fighter with his hand held to his eyes. The leaflet was from one of the numerous insurgent groups, and it catalogued the opposition's latest, if fictional, triumphs: three planes and 14 U.S. tanks destroyed on a single day. Another, handed out by the U.S. military, featured a picture of a fighter clad in black with a ski mask, carrying a rocket-propelled grenade. It implored Iraqis "not to permit terrorists or loyalists of the previous regime to take away your new freedom."

Amal's family believed one, not the other. They talked about the fear they had seen in the eyes of U.S. soldiers near their home. They exchanged rumors of desertions in the U.S. military. Conspiracies ran rife.

"All the explosions are their fault," Karima said of the U.S. officials ensconced in the Green Zone. "They are the reasons for the bombing."

"It's apparent," Ali said, as an Egyptian serial, "Alexandria," its volume loud, played on the television. "Only Iraqis die in the explosions. No Americans ever die."

Karima shook her head. "Saddam did not do good things," she said. "He made the people suffer. But there was fear. And with fear, there was security. He was strong."

Ali called civil war a prospect. "It's possible," he said. "It might happen."

Amal interrupted, raising her voice for the first time that day.

"I don't think it will happen," she countered.

Growing ever more confident, Amal, approaching 15, volunteered her own view of the country's confusion. "If I say the Americans are better, someone asks what have the Americans done. What have they done for us? All the Americans have done is bring the tanks," she said. "If I said the time of Saddam was better, they say, what? If he didn't like you, he would cut off your head. He was a tyrant.

"I don't know what to say," she admitted.

A few days later, as she sat near a space heater casting a yellow glow over the room, Amal had thought about the previous conversation.

"People must be optimistic," she said. Sometimes her dark brown eyes were cast to the floor. At moments, though, she looked up, her voice clearer, her ideas more insistent. "There must be hope. Even the Koran says we should be optimistic."

She looked down to the floor again. There was a suggestion of defiance in her words. "If not for my generation," she said, "then the generation that's coming."

Karima sat next to her. She spoke softly, though Amal seemed to hear her. "They're still young," she said, shaking her head. "They don't know what's ahead."

Return Of Former Communists Stirs Up Afghan Elections (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, September 5, 2005

KHOST, Afghanistan, Aug. 31 - The outriders decorated their motorbikes with sunflowers, and at every stop people tossed flowers at their convoy and offered prayers.

The former Communist general Shahnawaz Tanai was returning to his home district after 32 years to make a political comeback, and the Tanai tribe accorded him the traditional greeting.

The political return of dozens of former Communists, among them General Tanai, 54, who was Afghan chief of staff, then defense minister in the brutal Soviet occupation in the 1980's, is one of the most contentious issues of this election campaign.

General Tanai is perhaps most infamous for leading a coup in 1990, with the renegade mujahedeen commander Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, against President Muhammad Najibullah. The coup failed and he fled to Pakistan, where he lived in exile until Aug. 7.

The general is not running in Afghanistan's parliamentary and provincial elections on Sept. 18, but he is calculating on winning a sizable bloc in Parliament with candidates from his Afghanistan Peace Movement Party and two other parties of former Communists who have joined him in a coalition. They are fielding 200 candidates around the country, most of them former Communists and some Soviet-era ministers and participants in the half a dozen coups of the last three decades.

"Our party is a national political party based on Islam and national unity," General Tanai said in an interview. "Above all we want the rule of law." He denied plotting the 1990 coup and said Mr. Najibullah had planned it against his own ministers.

President Hamid Karzai has encouraged many of the rogues of Afghanistan's recent history to take part in the elections in an effort to unite the country and foster political stability. A senior security official, who asked not to be identified to avoid angering the political factions, said that he saw little threat from the former Communists because they had no military power, but that the jihadi leaders were still a menace. Yet the return of the Communists to public life is reopening the violent struggle between Communists and Islamists that tore this country apart in the 1980's, and made it the arena for the last proxy conflict of the cold war.

The mujahedeen, who were backed by the United States in their struggle against the Communists, are watching with anger and some confusion as their enemies regain positions in the government and may win a sizable bloc in Parliament in American-supported elections.

Nevertheless, the mujahedeen are also entering the political race, to fight their old foes at the ballot box. A week into the election campaign in this unruly eastern province, Khost's voters have been presented with a bewildering array of candidates. In all, 214 have registered, with 91 competing for just five seats from Khost in the Wolesi Jirga or lower house of Parliament, 121 competing for the nine-seat provincial council, and 2 Kuchis, nomads who have a separate seat allocation in Parliament.

Afghans here are expected to vote along tribal lines, many say, but within each tribe they have a choice between the former Communists on one side and the traditional tribal leaders and mujahedeen commanders on the other. Added to the mix are Westernized candidates who have returned from two decades in exile in the United States or Western Europe, and members of the local educated elite, who offer a complete break from the political and military figures of the last two decades.

Campaigning in Khost is far from the Western experience, with most candidates dealing directly with the tribal elders, knowing that they will tell their communities how to vote.

One candidate, Shir Khosti, who returned from 20 years in the United States, where he ran cellphone shops with his brother, to work for the governor of Khost, is running a relatively Western-style campaign, focusing on younger voters. He is visiting high schools, where he urges 18- to 20-year-olds, who are still in school making up lost years of education, to make their own choice, rather than follow the decision of their elders, as tradition dictates.

Mr. Khosti, the son of a former parliamentarian who was executed by the Communists, dislikes the Communists and the Islamic fundamentalists among the mujahedeen.

"The trouble here is the people don't know what they need," he said. "It's not enough just being a good guy. A representative has to have the mental capacity to deliver a lot of goods."

One of the leading female candidates, Sahera Sharif, knows better than to tell tribal elders what to think. When meeting villagers in Bak, Ms. Sharif, a teacher and development worker, vows to work for Islam, and to help women "within the parameters of Islam."

Another former Communist, Maj. Gen. Sayed Muhammad Gulabzoi, 54, who is widely expected to win a parliamentary seat, was receiving supporters in a rented house in Khost, the provincial capital, a few days ago. "Lots of tribal people are coming to see me here," he said. "I have no plans to go out. If you are not at home, that is considered very bad here."

DOJ_NMG_0002870

General Gulabzoi took part in the overthrow of King Zaher Shah in 1973 - and virtually every coup since - and was aide de camp to the ruthless Communist leader Nur Muhammad Taraki and then interior minister for all of the Soviet occupation. He returned to Afghanistan 16 months ago after 17 years in exile in Russia.

"People died and were wounded, and I am very sad for that," he said of his years in power. "But I did not do anything bad to the people of Khost."

He spoke with a district leader, a former mujahid, who pledged his vote and those of his district to General Gulabzoi. "We will vote for an educated person, a good person, who will do something for the people," said the district leader, Shahazar Khan. "In all his life, he has not owned a house or a car, so that means he is honest."

Many of the mujahedeen have been branded warlords, especially in Kabul, and accused by human rights groups of abuses in the civil war of the 1990's and of graft and land grabbing since they returned to power in 2001 after the fall of the Taliban. Yet in Khost, some voters voiced hatred for the Communists and enthusiastic support for local mujahedeen leaders, saying many had served the people honestly.

The communists "put me in prison for five and a half months," said Hajji Mazub, the elder of a village in Yakubi district of Khost Province. "They were the reason we all had to live as refugees in Pakistan for 20 years. We will never vote for the Communists." Hajji Mir Dil Spin-Zadran, a well-known mujahedeen commander and tribal leader who is running for the Wolesi Jirga, said: "Khost is the home of the mujahedeen, and the people are the supporters of the mujahedeen. Most people in the cities were Communists and in the villages the people support the mujahedeen."

"They should not have taken this opportunity to seek power," he said of General Gulabzoi, who is from his own village, and General Tanai. "They should just sit at home and live quietly."

Hajji Spin-Zadran gathered more than 200 tribal elders on a hilltop outside his home on Wednesday to seek their support for him in the elections. "May God give our country back into our hands. During the jihad we had to win our country back; now we have to rebuild it," a cleric said in introducing him.

"I did not plan to run for Parliament, but I am running because of the jihad and for Islam," Hajji Spin-Zadran told the gathering. "I am not thinking about money, or having a good time, only about my people, my nation and my tribe."

As he spoke, tribesmen stood and called him to stop, assuring him of their support. "Inshallah," said Hajji Sherzad, a tribesman from a nearby village. "He is the one. We have put our hands on him."

Attackers Kill 9, Including Candidate

By The New York Times

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 4 - Another election candidate and eight other people were killed in Afghanistan in several attacks, officials said Sunday, blaming Taliban militants. It was the second day of attacks and raised fears the Taliban were continuing to step up violence in an effort to disrupt elections on Sept. 18.

Habibullah Khan, a candidate from the Garmser district in Helmand Province, was killed when his car hit a land mine, said the deputy police chief of Helmand, Col. Muhammad Ayub. "He lost his leg, and we brought him to the Emergency Hospital in the capital and he died at noon," Colonel Ayub said.

Mr. Khan was the fifth candidate to be killed. An additional candidate was abducted Saturday in Kandahar Province and is thought to have been killed, a police officer in Kandahar said. The Taliban claimed responsibility for abducting and killing five people on Saturday, including the candidate and a local district chief.

In Helmand on Sunday morning, a district police chief, Amanullah Khan, his son and two bodyguards were killed in an ambush by men suspected of being Taliban insurgents in Doshi, Colonel Ayub said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Tip-Line Bind: Follow The Law In U.S. Or EU? (WSJ)

By David Reilly And Sarah Nassauer

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

In the wake of scandals at Enron and WorldCom, the Sarbanes-Oxley Act directed companies listed in the U.S. to set up so-called whistle-blower hot lines for employees everywhere to confidentially report potential corporate abuses.

But those anonymous tip lines now pose unforeseen problems in Europe, where data-protection laws make it difficult to accuse someone of impropriety anonymously. These laws go beyond basic privacy concerns: They hold that citizens have a right to know who is collecting data about them, and they also may include restrictions on revealing corporate information to outsiders.

DOJ_NMG_0002871

A French agency, for example, has ruled that anonymous whistle-blower tip lines don't guarantee adequate protection for people accused of wrongdoing.

As a result, many U.S. and European companies are in a legal bind: If they set up whistle-blower hot lines in subsidiaries in France, and possibly elsewhere in Europe, they might run afoul of local laws. If they don't, they might violate Sarbanes-Oxley, the 2002 corporate-governance law enforced by the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Companies are being told "I have to either chop off my left hand or my right hand," said Christopher Kuner, a partner at law firm Hunton & Williams in Brussels who specializes in international privacy and data-protection law.

The impasse underscores the far-reaching, and often unanticipated, impact of Sarbanes-Oxley, which executives on both sides of the Atlantic have complained is overly restrictive and has even led some European firms to seek to "deregister" their U.S. stocks.

Two U.S. companies -- McDonald's Corp. and Exide Technologies -- are the first test cases of the potential whistle-blower impasse. In late May, both companies were told by France's Data Protection Authority, known as the CNIL, that planned ethics hot lines at units they operate in France were illegal. Both companies declined to offer specific detail about how they are addressing the decision.

"We're studying our options and the French ruling," said Alan Chapple, a spokesman for Exide, which makes automotive and industrial batteries.

"Like many other public companies [McDonald's] is working to ensure compliance with Sarbanes-Oxley as it relates to operations outside the United States," the hamburger chain said in a statement.

Regulators in France and the U.S. have yet to find a way out of the conflict. The CNIL has twice written to the SEC notifying it of the problem and asking that U.S. regulators delay taking action against companies that haven't set up hot lines in France, according to copies of the letters provided by the CNIL.

In a July 29 letter to the SEC, CNIL Chairman Alex Türk also said his agency was talking with companies to see whether there was a way to devise a system that would preserve the anonymity of a whistle-blower while also "preserving the right of the denounced persons to the protection of their personal data."

In a reply sent Aug. 10, Ethiopis Tafara, the SEC's director of international affairs, said the rule requiring "integrity lines" is "drafted broadly so that companies can implement it as best suits their needs and/or local legal requirements," according to a copy of the letter provided by the CNIL. Mr. Tafara also suggested that the SEC and the CNIL discuss the matter. The regulators have yet to hold talks but are expected to in coming weeks, CNIL officials said.

"For the time being, it's probably impossible for a company that is subject to both laws to be 100% sure that it's in compliance on both sides of the Atlantic," said Fabrice Baumgartner, a partner in the Paris office of Cleary Gottlieb Steen & Hamilton LLP.

That is clearly a source of corporate anxiety: The CNIL receives up to 10 phone calls, letters or emails a day asking for guidance on whistle-blower lines.

Although France's rules are based on EU data-protection laws, regulators in each of the trade bloc's 25 member countries interpret and enforce the laws, meaning they can play out differently in different countries.

In the United Kingdom, which has more companies with U.S. stock-market listings than any other EU country, the Information Commissioner's Office doesn't "see anything wrong with these hot lines," a spokeswoman said. As long as companies conduct a proper investigation into any whistle-blower allegation and the accused is informed and has due-process rights, such hot lines shouldn't pose problems, she added. But British laws could be breached if a company took an anonymous tip "at face value" without conducting an impartial investigation.

But waiting until regulators sort out the conflicting directives could carry significant risks for companies. Hunton & Williams's Mr. Kuner said he knows of firms that turned off their hot lines in France in the wake of the CNIL decision.

"Obviously if you then had a big corporate scandal occur in France and it turned out later you could have prevented it through a hot line, that could be a potential liability," he said. "But no one really knows how the SEC or the courts would interpret an excuse saying, 'We didn't have a system there because it's illegal.'"

CRIMINAL LAW:

Cuban Spy Case Poses Dilemma For U.S. (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 5, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0002872

MIAMI — They're known in Cuba as the Five Heroes and their faces, names and the details of their seven-year legal drama are familiar to schoolchildren and sugar cane cutters across the Communist island.

The Cuban Five, as they are known in the U.S., were convicted four years ago here in Miami of spying for President Fidel Castro and sentenced to maximum-security prisons for terms of 15 years to life. Cubans' reaction to the case rivals the collective fury that mobilized them to demand the return of castaway Elian Gonzalez in 2000.

Since a federal appeals court overturned the quintet's espionage convictions last month on grounds that their trial venue was tainted by fierce anti-Castro sentiments, the U.S. government must decide whether to request a retrial.

The case has been one of the most divisive issues between Washington and Havana since the five were arrested in 1998. The men admitted to being Cuban agents but have insisted throughout that they were only gathering intelligence on radical and sometimes violent exile groups to protect Castro and their Cuban homeland.

U.S. prosecutors, who contended the five were spreading disinformation, posing a threat to exiles and trying to steal military secrets because one of the men worked as a laborer at a Key West naval air station, won convictions in June 2001. The Miami federal court also found alleged ringleader Gerardo Hernandez guilty of murder conspiracy, based on allegations that he provided intelligence to Havana that led to the deaths of four Cuban exiles shot down by Cuban MIGs in international airspace in 1996.

Deemed amateurs even by some of Castro's harshest critics here, the five, if not retried, could instead be expelled to Havana or swapped for U.S. fugitives long sheltered in Cuba, according to their attorneys and foreign policy analysts.

The 11th Circuit Court of Appeals' reversal of the convictions of Hernandez, Antonio Guerrero, Fernando Gonzalez, Ramon Labanino and Rene Gonzalez, can also be appealed to the same court, said Alicia Valle, spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in Miami. She declined to say how the prosecution would proceed.

Last week, a group of Nobel laureates and intellectuals including Desmond Tutu and Noam Chomsky, released a letter to the U.S. government calling for the release of the five men.

Castro used the occasion of his 79th birthday on Aug. 13 to visit the family of Hernandez, who coincidentally called his wife from custody in a U.S. prison while Castro was at his Havana apartment.

"The best they could do would be to free you," Castro told the prisoner, according to Cuban reporters who were present. Castro also warned that a retrial could prove embarrassing to the U.S. because it would allow defense lawyers to present evidence of American support for terrorism against Cuba, alluding to the case of Luis Posada Carriles, a radical anti-Castro exile accused of blowing up a Cuban airliner.

U.S. immigration authorities arrested Posada in May and charged him with entering the country illegally two months earlier. He remains detained at an El Paso facility pending a court decision on whether to extradite him to Venezuela to face trial in the airliner bombing, allegedly planned in Caracas.

Castro calls the months of indecision on extradition evidence of hypocrisy by Washington in its global war on terrorism. The 77-year-old Posada was convicted by a jury in Panama in connection with a plot to assassinate Castro in 2000 but was freed a year ago by outgoing Panamanian President Mireya Moscoso, an action that Castro claims was orchestrated by the White House.

Some Cuba analysts predict that the United States probably won't use the appellate decision as an opportunity to advance relations with Havana. Since Washington pulled out of twice-yearly migration talks with Cuba two years ago, there are no remaining forums for official contact or dialogue between the two countries.

FBI media liaison Judy Orihuela said the agency does not maintain a formal list of wanted fugitives believed to be living in Cuba, nor has it made any requests for extraditions.

Civil rights attorney Leonard Weinglass, who represents Guerrero, one of the men sentenced to life, said the Justice Department had asked for a 30-day extension of the usual 21-day period for requesting that the appellate court reconsider its decision.

Noting that no classified documents were involved in the case brought against the five for being unregistered agents, Weinglass said he is convinced the federal prosecutors "recognize privately" the weakness of their case and that convictions would be unlikely in a more neutral venue.

"There's never been a 93-page decision on venue," Weinglass said of the appellate decision. "Any lawyer would say you don't retry this case."

Cuba-watchers at the Council on Hemispheric Affairs contend that the Bush administration is bent on maintaining the status quo of total disengagement in hopes of undermining Castro, who has held power for nearly half a century.

Larry Birns, director of the Washington-based think tank, said he has met with three Cuban diplomats since the Aug. 9 appeals court decision and "the subject came up about a political settlement or a joint release of people. They are extremely prone to negotiate a solution to this problem."

Among the longtime U.S. fugitives in Cuba are financier Robert Vesco, convicted cop-killer and Black Power figure Joanne Chesimard and one of the FBI's 10 Most Wanted, Victor Gerena, sought in connection with a $7-million armed robbery and hostage-taking in Connecticut in 1983. At least 70 suspected criminals are believed to be taking refuge in Cuba.

But Birns doubts any such resolution will emerge.

"This thing is so churned up by ideology and domestic politics that even though there is a compellingly rational path to a solution, the United States doesn't want to do anything that would portray Cuba as anything but a nation of beasts," said the director of the left-leaning think tank.

Longtime Castro critic Joe Garcia, former head of the right-wing Cuban-American National Foundation, predicts that the U.S. government will pursue a new conviction, even though the Cuban Five represent no threat to U.S. security and are of limited symbolic value because most Americans outside Cuban exile-heavy Miami know nothing about them.

"It's impossible at this stage to just deport them," said Garcia, now a Democratic Party advisor. "The return of these people would be a victory for Fidel."

The Bush administration could also seek to exchange the Cuban Five for Castro's promise to release dozens of dissidents and independent journalists jailed in Cuba, Garcia said. But that action would backfire on the Cuban opposition by linking it with the U.S. government, he added, validating Castro's claims that his domestic critics are paid lackeys of Washington.

Moreover, Castro is not likely to give up a prominent U.S. fugitive, Garcia said. Vesco is jailed in Cuba on conspiracy charges and knows too much about Cuban government dealings to be trusted, Garcia said, and it would be politically difficult to turn over Chesimard or other Black Power radicals wanted in the United States for murder.

"Joanne Chesimard is a symbol in Cuba. To turn her over would be a betrayal of the left, and Fidel is the last leftist. It's tough for him to give up symbols," said Garcia.

Damian Fernandez, director of Florida International University's Cuban Research Institute, sees little hope of the Cuban Five prompting either Havana or Washington to change their adversarial postures.

"I don't sense either the United States or the Cuban government having the will to change the status quo. They like it the way it is," he said. "The five are a cause celebre for Castro. For the United States, they're a symbolic repudiation of Castro's Cuba."

The National Committee to Free the Cuban Five objects to the idea of using the men as political trade goods. The private support group instead has lobbied for their release without conditions.

"We feel the Cuban Five have already suffered enough," said the group's New York spokeswoman, Teresa Gutierrez. "As for a swap between prisoners, we don't think that's fair at all. It's apples and oranges."

PARANOIA RUNS DEEP AT CITY HALL AS FBI CORRUPTION PROBE WIDENS (NFR)

By Mike Hudson

Niagara Falls (NY) Reporter, September 5, 2005

The widening federal corruption probe of Mayor Vincenzo V. Anello has City Hall employees edgy as more grand jury subpoenas draw an increasing number of civil servants into the tawdry case.

On Aug. 25, city Law Department Clerk Donna Winstanley was summoned to testify in the scandal. Winstanley, who is responsible for the department's time/date stamp machine, was ordered to bring Anello's financial disclosure statements for the years 2002, 2003 and 2004, along with any charts or other records designed to track when the documents were actually filed.

Sources familiar with the original documents say that some filings, for different years, appear to have been done at the same time and with the same pen. Federal agents are particularly interested in the filing for 2004, the year when Anello accepted more than $45,000 in unsecured "loans" from prominent downtown developer "Smokin'" Joe Anderson and Kathy Kajfasz, sister of John Kajfasz, a principal in the group Anello gifted with 18 holes of the Hyde Park Golf Course.

At the time, Anello was serving as a city councilman and the payments were made just before and immediately after his election as mayor. None of his disclosure forms was stamped with the time or date, and the public documents only came to light following Freedom of Information Act requests by the Niagara Falls Reporter and the Niagara Gazette.

Interestingly, the 2004 form had been dated by Anello as 4/11/04 until someone changed it to 4/11/05. The filings are now in the hands of forensic document examiners at the Federal Bureau of Investigation's laboratory in Washington, D.C. Some believe the documents were filed only after the media's FOIA requests.

Anello never disclosed his fiduciary interests with either Kajfasz or Anderson to the public or the City Council, even as he introduced legislation beneficial to those he owed a substantial debt.

The unusual financial arrangements came to light only after a May 3 Reporter expose uncovered documents showing he'd taken the money. At first, Anello chose to deny the story, calling it "totally unfounded, false and defamatory." Later he admitted to taking the money, and even later admitted he hadn't yet paid back a dime. He hired noted criminal defense attorney Joel Daniels to represent him as federal agents, smelling blood, began to circle.

"A lot of times in Niagara County, it's difficult to tell whether someone had a criminal intent or was just being stupid," one source told the Reporter. "Clearly, though, in this case, we're not talking about lunch money. "Is what's been discovered so far indictable? Personally, I'd say yes," he added. "The question now is whether this was an isolated case or part of a larger pattern."

The federal grand jury seated in Buffalo began hearing evidence in the case on June 9, when Niagara County Elections Commissioners Scott Kiedrowski and Nancy Smith were called upon to appear, and produce all financial records submitted by the Friends of Vince Anello Committee between Jan. 1, 2003, and Dec.31, 2004. Neither the Anderson nor Kajfasz "loans" are listed on those records.

In addition to Winstanley, Kiedrowski and Smith, others known to have been interviewed by the FBI or testifying before the grand jury include Anderson's ex-wife Gail Anderson, City Council members Babe Rotella and Candra Thomason, former Anderson associate John Caputo, NFC Development Corp. Director Ralph Aversa and members of the Reporter staff.

Rotella said he is particularly troubled by the burgeoning scandal.

"It bothers me because this is another black eye for Niagara Falls and it's another black eye for the Italian-American community here," he said. "This is the last thing we needed."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Paul Campana has been assigned to direct the case. A tough prosecutor, Campana has been involved in a number of high-profile Justice Department cases going back to the 1980s, including the prosecutions of former Buffalo Bill Robb Riddick in 1991, Albion Police Chief James Prioetty in 2000 and the extradition back to Germany of accused killer and reputed Russian Mafia hitman David Kricheli earlier this year.

In the Anello case, sources close to the investigation said no fewer than three indictments are expected. Some expressed amazement that the government was already set to present evidence before a grand jury.

"These things can sometimes take years to unfold," said one. "In this case, the U.S. Attorney's office must feel pretty confident about the evidence it has."

In addition to the golf course giveaway and multiple shady deals involving Anderson, the feds are also looking into circumstances surrounding the bidding process for the city's proposed new public safety complex, the demolition of the former Third Street parking ramp and the use of city credit cards by Anello and City Administrator Dan Bristol.

The investigation has brought city government to a virtual standstill here, as developers fearful of being brought into the scandal are staying away in droves and the formerly Anello-friendly City Council now routinely balks at the mayor's initiatives, particularly those involving outside consultants and influence-peddlers.

After just 20 months in office, Anello's lame-duck status is such that the prospect of him even winning the Democratic Primary in 2007 seems unimaginable.

But the toughest toll is being borne by the city workers who now find themselves having to deal with the criminal justice system for no offense other than showing up to do their jobs.

Municipal employees have become increasingly paranoid working under the shadow of looming indictments. The morale of the workers was reflected on Aug. 12, when Anello hosted an employee picnic. Of the more than 600 city workers, fewer than 50 showed up for the event.

"I've been here for a long time, and I didn't think it could get any worse than it was under (former mayor) Irene Elia," one City Hall employee told the Reporter. "But this is crazy. You're afraid to leave your office or talk to anyone in case you'll get subpoenaed, too."

For his part, Anello has displayed braggadocio bordering on the pathological.

"I know the way my enemies want to see it. I know how my friends feel. OK?" he told a skeptical television reporter. "Why should I be put in a position to answer a political attack by a political opponent in this venue?"

In a separate TV appearance in July, he went so far as to lay the blame for his monumentally poor judgment and colossal lack of ethics squarely where it belongs -- on other people.

"In Niagara County, and the Falls in particular, you've got more rats than cats, and the rats have their own newspaper," he said.

He was right, of course, though not in the way he intended.

Animal Rights Activist Pleads Guilty In U.S. Mink Release (AP)

AP, September 6, 2005

MADISON, Wis. - An animal rights activist accused of freeing thousands of minks across the U.S. Midwest has pleaded guilty and faces two years in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0002875

Investigators say Peter Daniel Young, 28, and an accomplice raided farms in Wisconsin, South Dakota and Iowa in 1997, trespassing and cutting fences to release the small animals valued for their thick fur.

Young pleaded guilty Friday to two counts of animal enterprise terrorism. He is believed to be a member of the Animal Liberation Front, a radical group that aims to destroy animal industries it considers inhumane.

Young and his accomplice, Justin Samuel, both disappeared after they were indicted in 1998, but Samuel was captured in Belgium the following year. He struck a deal with prosecutors and served two years in prison.

Young remained at large until March, when police arrested him for trying to shoplift CDs in California.

Rumor Keeps Waltz Alive (AP)

By MATT GOURAS, Associated Press

AP, September 6, 2005

NASHVILLE - All lawmakers can do is watch and wait as a federal probe into bribery and corruption at the state Capitol continues to sink colleagues.

Legislators said they have heard the rumors that more arrests are on the way, but don't know if it will include local officials like the one nabbed last week or more state lawmakers.

Advertisement

Like in May, when four sitting lawmakers were arrested on their way to work, they expect to be the last to know.

"I believe the Department of Justice and the FBI know a lot more about these investigations than I do," said House Speaker Jimmy Naifeh.

Just last week, pressure mounted in the Legislature to react when former state Rep. Chris Newton pleaded guilty and resigned. At the same time, it became very clear the Tennessee Waltz sting is not over.

Another indictment was handed up last week, this time against a local Shelby County official, as the grand jury sent notice its work isn't finished.

It's unknown if other lawmakers will be arrested - and federal authorities are predictably quiet about their ongoing investigation - or if Newton is now feeding them information.

"I just hear there are other indictments coming down," said House Republican caucus chairman Charles Sargent of Franklin. "No one has said if it's just going to be county commissioners or local school board members or legislators.

"I don't think any of us truly knows except for the grand jury and the FBI."

The lawmakers have proven ready to address arrested colleagues once they resign - as in the case of Newton and former state Sen. John Ford, who is pleading innocent.

But lawmakers are by and large taking it easy on the two who are staying in office and fighting the charges, Sens. Ward Crutchfield and Kathryn Bowers.

Sen. Doug Jackson, D-Dickson, said they should only resign "if they know in their heart of hearts" they are guilty.

"I believe them innocent until proven guilty," said Sen. Tommy Kilby, D-Wartburg.

Legislators, defending themselves against charges from Newton that what he did is "business as usual" in Nashville, were angry and indignant at comments likely to worsen their public image.

"I have never heard of a bribe being offered in my 18 years (in the Legislature)," said Jackson.

Lawmakers are trying their best at damage control, though, and are rushing work by a special panel to draft tougher ethics laws for the state. But leaders say new guilty pleas or arrests won't force them to rush their work, or change their plans.

Naifeh said he would continue "waiting and listening" as the Tennessee Waltz case unfolds rather than talk about it.

Gov. Phil Bredesen, who has his own panel drafting ideas for new laws in anticipation of a special session late this year or early next year, said officials already have more than enough reason to act.

"The arrests in the spring are plenty enough to focus on this," he said.

Bredesen said he thinks it's best for his independent panel to finish its work first, especially since it is removed from the legislative environment.

"Let's do this in an orderly fashion. Let's get their (independent ethics panel) report first. Let's get some meaningful legislation. Then let's call a special session."

Ex-mayor, Co-felons Sentenced In Bribe Case (CLPD)

By Mike Tobin, Plain Dealer Reporter

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, September 6, 2005

Emmanuel Onunwor was once the picture of success. He emigrated from Nigeria, earned a master's degree and was elected mayor of East Cleveland.

Holes have been punched in that success story for more than two years since Onunwor tearfully admitted to FBI agents that he took bribes from businessman Nate Gray. The latest blow came Friday in U.S. District Court when Onunwor, 46, was sentenced to nine years in prison.

"The conduct you engaged in was, in a major way, a complete betrayal of the citizens," U.S. District Judge James Gwin told Onunwor. "You caused the city major damage in terms of their economics."

Onunwor, who took about $50,000 in bribes, was contrite.

"I apologize to my family, my friends and the citizens," said Onunwor, dressed in a navy blue prison jump suit. "I did wrong. I deserve to be punished."

He shaved about 10 years off his sentence by agreeing to testify against Gray.

But he made that agreement only after a jury found him guilty of racketeering and bribery. Gray was convicted of conspiracy and fraud charges last month and is to be sentenced this fall with co-defendant businessman Gilbert Jackson of New Orleans.

Onunwor was also ordered to pay more than $5 million in restitution - the amount of contracts that he steered to companies doing business with Gray. All sides agree that Onunwor is broke and unlikely to be able to pay the money. Upon his release, however, a portion of his income will be paid to the government.

Four others were sentenced Friday in the corruption scheme in which bribes were exchanged for public contracts in Cleveland, East Cleveland, Houston and New Orleans.

Ricardo Teamor, a onetime associate of former Cleveland Mayor Michael R. White, was sentenced to four months in prison and four months of house arrest. He paid bribes to former Cleveland Councilman Joe Jones, who is to be sentenced next month.

As part of his plea deal, Teamor told prosecutors about widespread corruption during the $500 million expansion at Cleveland Hopkins International Airport when White was mayor. He said he allowed his construction company to be used as a front company to help contractors get around a city program requiring that some work be subcontracted to companies owned by minorities.

Teamor, 59, of Aurora, told officials that most of the minority-owned companies doing work at the airport were actually front companies that paid kickbacks to Gray. Teamor has met with a special investigator hired by Mayor Jane Campbell to probe Teamor's allegations, lawyers said.

"He's trying to ensure the program will continue on and operate as it was intended," said Robert Dixon, Teamor's attorney.

A former Houston building services director, Monique McGilbra, 41, was sentenced to three years in prison. She admitted to accepting cash and lavish gifts such as a $700 purse and all-expenses-paid trips to New Orleans from Gray and two businessmen trying to get contracts with Houston.

Former Honeywell executive Brent Jividen, 43, was sentenced to 2½ years in prison. Jividen of Medina admitted to bribing McGilbra with gifts.

Oliver Spellman, 51, of Brooklyn, N.Y., was given two years' probation for accepting bribes from Gray while serving as chief of staff to the mayor of Houston. Spellman previously worked as director of parks and recreation under White.

Ex-city Official Given 3-year Sentence (HC)

By Dan Feldstein
Houston Chronicle, September 6, 2005

Former city of Houston official Monique McGilbra was sentenced to three years in federal prison Friday for accepting bribes from a Cleveland businessman, while former mayoral chief of staff Oliver Spellman got probation for a similar crime.

McGilbra apparently earned the disdain of U.S. District Judge James Gwin in his Cleveland courtroom, insisting that she thought the gifts she accepted from businessmen seeking city work were purely part of dating.

In a trial against the businessman this summer, she testified that she took gifts from five people or companies seeking business with the city building services department she supervised.

McGilbra told Gwin at her sentencing that she was "a woman, a mother and a lover" and that it shouldn't be a crime to have expensive tastes, according to the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

"My involvement with the men in this case was primarily personal that became business. There were personal advances. I never had my position or City Hall for sale," she told the judge.

DOJ_NMG_0002877

McGilbra, who resigned her city post in April 2003, will be sent to prison after she is sentenced on a similar guilty plea in Houston on Tuesday. The U.S. attorney's office here plans to ask that any prison time run concurrently with her Cleveland sentence.

Prosecutors in Ohio have long pursued Cleveland businessman Nate Gray, a gregarious friend of the former Cleveland mayor whose "consulting" clients always seemed to fare well with local governments. They finally got their man last month in a trial in which McGilbra and Spellman both testified against him to reduce their sentences.

The investigation spilled into Houston because Gray was friendly with Spellman, who served as Cleveland's parks director before coming here in the same capacity and being promoted by former Mayor Lee Brown as his chief of staff.

While Spellman and McGilbra both pleaded guilty, Gray fought the charges, earning a conviction and giving prosecutors a chance to lay out the alleged bribery conspiracy.

Spellman took $2,000 from Gray and in bugged phone calls offered Gray inside information on airport and parking meter contracts. Through the wiretaps it was learned that Mayor Brown's brother, Earl, was a paid "sub-consultant" to Gray.

Gray showered McGilbra with a trip to the Super Bowl and other gifts on behalf of Honeywell, which wanted a piece of a city energy contract won by Reliant.

The charge in Houston, for which McGilbra has also pleaded guilty, revolves around gifts she received from local businessman Andy Schatte and his Keystone Group. Keystone offered McGilbra's then-boyfriend $250,000 if Keystone got a fire station deal with McGilbra's department.

McGilbra, 41, is divorced with two school-age children. She received the upper range of her plea-agreed sentencing range of 30-37 months, plus a $5,000 fine.

Spellman, 51, got probation plus a $10,000 fine.

Prosecutors protested that Spellman's sentence was too light. But Gwin said he thought Spellman was a decent person who had made a bad mistake.

"It was a complete lack of judgment on your part. Defendant Gray used your friendship to line his own pockets. You had something of a stellar career throughout your life. Except for your substance abuse problem, it appears you were an exemplary public official," he told Spellman, according to the Plain Dealer.

Also sentenced Friday was former Cleveland-based Honeywell employee Brent Jividen, 43, who got 30 months in prison.

A former Cleveland attorney received four months and the former mayor of East Cleveland, who took regular payments of cash across a table from Gray, received nine years.

Gray, a Cleveland City Council member and a New Orleans businessman all await sentencing in the case.

Federal officials have said more investigations are ongoing in Houston but have declined to offer details.

Check Was In The Mail, But Thieves Were At Mailbox (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 6, 2005

What makes Joseph Mo Pun Lau's federal case so audacious isn't what he's accused of stealing. It's how he allegedly pulled it off.

Lau, an intuitive Hong Kong fugitive, was already an established identity thief by late 2003, according to the FBI. Using a crude tool, agents said, he fished envelopes from street-corner mail-collection boxes throughout the Philadelphia suburbs, counterfeiting whatever checks and credit cards he found inside.

And yet, an accomplice told the FBI, Lau had become frustrated by the slow, risky and unpredictable process of snaring letters one at a time.

So Lau allegedly came up with a clever way to reel in a bigger catch: He surreptitiously videotaped letter carriers as they opened the boxes, zooming in on their keys. Lau used those images to calculate measurements for the grooves in the keys and created brass duplicates.

With these homemade keys, Lau pilfered mail-collection boxes in Exton, Wayne, Frazer, Devon and the Southwark neighborhood of Philadelphia, as well as unidentified towns in New Jersey and Maryland, according to a criminal complaint.

When Lau couldn't do the job himself, he shipped a key to an accomplice and e-mailed the global-positioning-system location of the targeted collection boxes, authorities said.

"The FBI is not aware of anything else like this," bureau spokeswoman Jerri Williams said.

Lau, 46, appears to be a serious fellow, once admonishing an accomplice that "every day is a working day," according to an FBI transcript.

DOJ_NMG_0002878

He and his wife lived in an $800-a-month apartment in Parlin, N.J. He was unemployed and drove a 1999 Ford Expedition. (The vanity plates read "HVYDUTY.") He owes $30,000 on his credit cards, records show.

Lau has one previous criminal conviction - in Atlantic City in 1999 for putting shaved quarters into slot machines; the technique can earn a winning player an extra 25 cents a pull.

"Joe's a very smart guy, a gentleman, someone who makes a good impression," said J. David Alcantara, his lawyer in the slots case.

After his casino conviction, Lau was ordered deported. When he missed a deadline to leave voluntarily, officials issued a warrant.

Lau remained free until shortly before midnight Aug. 17, when postal inspectors and FBI agents apprehended him as he left a Chester apartment - a safe house that authorities say he and the accomplice used to make forged keys and documents.

When Lau was arrested, he was carrying a backpack, a duffel bag, and a computer bag, authorities said. Inside the bags, agents said, they found six cell phones, a copy of a U.S. Postal Service collection-box key, two picture albums of post offices and collection boxes, bogus checkbooks, and keys to private mailboxes, such as those at Mailboxes Etc. and UPS stores. Authorities said Lau was also carrying a variety of forged documents - including passports, Social Security cards, New Jersey driver's licenses, and resident alien cards.

Lau's gang stole $140,000 worth of checks, counterfeited them, and deposited them in 16 different bank accounts, according to an affidavit by Philadelphia-based FBI Agent Catherine L. Nowery.

Lau was charged with bank fraud, mail fraud, and illegal possession of postal keys - and ordered held without bail.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Zane D. Memeger, and Lau's lawyer, Elliot Cohen of Philadelphia, declined comment on Friday.

Postal inspectors first discovered the collection-box heists in the Philadelphia area in February, when they noticed empty collection boxes. But the case was not cracked until this summer, when an FBI agent recognized Lau's accomplice from bank surveillance photos.

Authorities confronted the accomplice on Aug. 2, and he agreed to cooperate, according to court records. The accomplice is not identified in the court filings, but authorities said he had been told he was likely to be charged in the case.

Inside the accomplice's Chester apartment, agents and inspectors found a $600 key-making machine, a thin-line grinder, a bag of homemade and blank keys, a Sony Mini DV Handycam, a JVC Digital video camera, and nine boxes of blank check-writing stock. They also found small cardboard boxes with holes in them, ones allegedly used to conceal the cameras that filmed the letter carriers.

Last week, Lau agreed to help authorities catch an alleged third member of the gang, Xiao Chun Chen, a 41-year-old illegal alien from China who lives in Atlantic City, and who also has been convicted of cheating at slots.

According to a court filing, U.S. Postal Inspector D. James Bannan arranged for Lau to call Chen on Wednesday and ask to meet Friday at the bus station at 10th and Filbert Streets in Philadelphia, near a favorite ATM machine.

When Chen arrived, he was arrested.

New Prosecutor Will Focus On Gang Crimes (BSUN)

By Matthew Dolan, Sun Staff

The Baltimore Sun, September 6, 2005

Justice Department officials have approved funding of a new federal prosecutor to exclusively handle gang-related prosecutions inside Maryland's U.S. attorney's office.

The move comes after a sweeping indictment last month against 19 suspected members of the Hispanic gang MS-13 who were arrested on federal racketeering charges that include a string of homicides and attempted killings in Montgomery and Prince George's counties.

U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein, who took office this summer, said he told Justice Department officials that the state had an urgent need to beef up its prosecutorial resources to focus on gangs in suburban Washington and on gun-related crime in the Baltimore region.

His office has 65 prosecutors split between the state's two federal courts in Baltimore and Greenbelt. Rosenstein plans to fill five vacant slots within the next few months. A new agreement with the city will bring two additional prosecutors to Baltimore to handle gun-related prosecutions.

It was unclear where the new gang prosecutor will work. Rosenstein said Greenbelt would be the likely choice because an organized-crime prosecutor in Baltimore already focuses on the city's drug-related gang activity and because the new prosecutor approved last week would more likely target such gangs as MS-13 in the Washington region.

"MS-13 is a new and specific challenge in Montgomery and Prince George's," Rosenstein said. "A major focus of our anti-gang strategy remains to combat loosely organized, street-level, violent drug gangs in Baltimore. [The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosive's] Violent Crime Impact Team is a big part of our anti-gang program in Baltimore, and it is working well."

Andrea Smith, an assistant U.S. attorney in Baltimore who helps coordinate the local Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force, said the new anti-gang prosecutor should help prosecutors who have used a similar strategy against drug-related, violent organizations, such as the Lexington Terrace gang in the city.

"We target a neighborhood under siege," Smith said. "These organizations are multijurisdictional and often nationwide in scope. We start to piece together what's going on, where the connective tissue is and then scoop out that group."

The indictments announced against MS-13 tie reputed gang members, including a Baltimore carpenter, to murders and other crimes from April 2003 through June of this year. Prosecutors accused them of kidnappings, drive-by shootings and a killing in a cemetery. Six people were slain in suburban Washington, and authorities say gang members attempted to kill another five.

MS-13, also known as Mara Salvatrucha, originated in Los Angeles among refugees from El Salvador. Members also come from Guatemala, Honduras and Mexico. Mara refers to a gang, while Salva is an abbreviation for Salvadoran. Trucha is slang for "fear us," according to federal authorities.

An estimated 10,000 MS-13 members are in the United States, many in the Washington suburbs, which has a large population of Central American immigrants. Montgomery County police said they believe at least 500 gang members are active in the county, many of them part of MS-13.

Double Shooting Kills Man In PG (WT)

By Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, September 6, 2005

A double shooting early yesterday in Suitland left one man dead, marking the sixth homicide in Prince George's County in the first five days of September.

The shooting occurred in the 4600 block of Chelsea Way at about 1 a.m., said Cpl. Clinton Copeland, a spokesman for Prince George's County Police.

Kenneth Stanford, 22, of the 4700 block of Hudson Avenue had been shot several times. He was taken to a hospital, where he died. Also shot was a 28-year-old man, who was hospitalized.

The killing brings the number of homicides this year in Prince George's County to 119, up from 96 at this time last year.

The county has experienced a spate of violence since Thursday, when Charmaine Edwards, 21, of Southwest was found fatally shot in her car on Keystone Manor Drive in Morningside.

Four persons were fatally shot in the county Friday. Three of those killings occurred in the daylight hours.

·Dorsey Tyler, 42, who lived on Sheriff Road, was killed at about 3:10 p.m. in the 1500 block of Village Green Drive.

·Abdul Gregory Leftwich, 18, was killed at about 4:50 p.m. in the 1700 block of Kenilworth Avenue where he lived.

·John Douglas Lewis Jr., 27, of the 1200 block of Nalley Road was killed at about 5:10 p.m. in the 1800 block of Ray Leonard Road.

·Angelo Lorenzo Braddy, 21, was killed at about 10 p.m. in the 1500 block of Ray Road in the Hyattsville area.

Cpl. Copeland said no arrests have been made in those cases, but James Esau Davis, with no fixed address, has been identified as a suspect in connection with Mr. Leftwich's death and a warrant for first-degree murder has been issued for his arrest.

"As of right now, there's nothing indicating that [the cases] are related, but that's just preliminary. The investigations are ongoing." Cpl. Copeland said.

Also over the Labor Day weekend, Anne Arundel County police charged Brandon Iam Kellam, 16, with second-degree murder after the stabbing death of a 17-year-old boy outside a Glen Burnie mall Saturday night.

Police said Kevin Michael Weingart of Glen Burnie and a group of friends became involved in an altercation with another group in the parking lot of Marley Station Mall.

As the dispute escalated, the teenager was stabbed in the torso. He was flown by helicopter to the University of Maryland Shock Trauma Center, where he was pronounced dead.

In the District, Metropolitan Police are investigating a fatal shooting that happened at about 9 p.m. Saturday in the 3700 block of Hayes Street Northeast.

Police said they found Derrick Jones, 22, of the 3700 block of Cassell Place Northeast with gunshot wounds to his head and body. Police said they don't have any suspects or a motive in the case and that they are searching for witnesses.

Through Friday, the District had recorded 128 homicides, compared with 129 at the same time last year.

CIVIL LAW:

Successful Lobby Shops Build On BRAC Victories (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, September 6, 2005

Some high-powered Washington lobbying shops are banking on their freshly collected laurels to get even more business from the communities that hired them to get military bases off the Pentagon's chopping block.

As the independent Base Closure and Realignment (BRAC) Commission is getting ready to send its final deliberations to President Bush on Sept. 8, lobbyists are monitoring the BRAC process here in Washington while corralling communities to extend their contracts.

"They have done well in BRAC, and we [want] to continue the momentum because the Department of Defense is making many changes," said John Simmons, a senior adviser at law firm Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld LLP.

The Pentagon is undertaking a sweeping review of capabilities, called the quadrennial defense review.

A boon in business for the Washington lobbying shops can come from a whole range of issues, from defense appropriations to military construction, such as new technology centers and housing for those bases that are receiving more troops.

Among Washington lobbying shops scoring large victories for their clients are the Rhoads Group and Kutak Rock LLP, which represented Ellsworth Air Force Base in South Dakota; the Washington Group, which defended the Naval Submarine Base New London in Connecticut; Patton Boggs, which represented the Portsmouth Naval Shipyard in Maine; Akin Gump, which worked for the states of New York, Kansas, Maryland and Arkansas; and Spectrum Group, which represented the state of Louisiana and a large Defense Finance and Accounting Service center in Cleveland.

"We are up to speed on [the communities'] issues as part of BRAC, as we argued their military value. They are comfortable with us, and we are going to compete for more contracts," Simmons told The Hill.

Because no other BRAC round is planned yet, the success of a lobbying firm in the 2005 BRAC round can lead to representation of defense issues for installation-related matters, said Jim Noone, a lobbyist with the Washington Group, a Ketchum company.

"Getting BRAC residual business is down the road," said Noone, who was part of the team representing New London, Conn.

While several lobbying shops contacted by The Hill said that they did not receive so-called "success fees" for their work on BRAC, Keith Ashdown with Taxpayers for Common Sense said that it is possible for these firms to have an understanding with the communities to be retained for several more years.

Akin Gump, which worked with the lobbying group Hyjek and Fix to represent a number of states and communities in this BRAC round and has achieved a 100 percent success rate for its clients, according to Simmons.

The lobby consortium represented the state of New York, the state of Kansas, three communities in Maryland, the Alliance of Pine Bluff, Ark., and the state of New Mexico.

Maryland is one of the largest gainers in BRAC, and it is in Maryland that the firm has its eyes on further representation. Akin Gump represented the Navy Alliance at Indian Head, Md., the Southern Maryland Navy Alliance at Patuxent River, Md., and Harford County.

The community at Indian Head is planning to build an energetics center in proximity to the University of Maryland, which has a strong program in energetics, Simmons said. The Indian Head alliance already spent upward of $290,000 in lobbying fees since 2003.

With the Navy's budget unpredictable in the future, Patuxent River will also have to continue its legislative presence, said Simmons.

"This is something they need to meet about, but we were told that they were interested," Simmons said. The southern Maryland alliance also hired the PMA Group to lobby for its defense interests.

Meanwhile, Cannon Air Force Base in New Mexico, which was slated for closure, will stay open until 2009. The BRAC Commission directed the Pentagon to evaluate its need for the base.

"It could be the home of the future Airborne Laser Program," Simmons said, hinting at potential lobbying material for the firm.

Kansas, projected to receive thousands of new soldiers at several installations, may need to continue its military counsel, said Simmons. "That is something that they would be discussing later this fall," he said. "We would compete for that contract."

DOJ_NMG_0002881

New York state has the longest-standing relationship with Hyjek and Fix and Akin Gump. Hyjek and Fix has been representing New York communities' interest since 1998.

Akin Gump won a contract two years ago to represent New York state interests. The state was reeling from previous base closures, Simmons said, and was trying not to repeat mistakes.

According to lobbying disclosures, the Empire State Development Co. paid $520,000 in lobbying fees to Akin Gump by the end of 2004.

The Niagara Area Chamber of Commerce spent $380,000 in fees to Hyjek and Fix up to the end of 2004. Disclosures for 2005 are not yet available, and the companies refused to reveal their fees.

"New York was set to lose more than 1,000 jobs, had the DoD recommendations been adopted," Simmons said. "As a result of the BRAC decisions, the state will gain more than 1,000 jobs."

Punching power comes with a certain price tag. Former Rep. Bill Paxon (R-N.Y.), who was chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee and is now a senior adviser at Akin Gump, represented the interests of New York.

9th Circuit: Sexual Content Not Needed For Harassment (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

Law.com, September 6, 2005

You don't have to be a groper, lecher or explicit misogynist to get sued for sex-based harassment, a three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled Friday.

The opinion, in a case originating at an Alaska teachers union, said that Thomas Harvey, a manager accused of "shouting, 'screaming,' foul language, invading employees' personal space ... and [making] threatening gestures" may be sued for gender-based discrimination under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, even though his acts were not overtly motivated by the victims' gender.

"We hold that offensive conduct that is not facially sex-specific nonetheless may violate Title VII if there is sufficient circumstantial evidence of qualitative and quantitative differences in the harassment suffered by female and male employees," wrote Senior Judge Alfred Goodwin in a unanimous decision.

Senior Judge Melvin Brunetti and Judge William Fletcher concurred. In the case, male and female employees agreed that women bore the brunt of Harvey's outbursts.

Employment lawyers said the opinion offers encouragement to plaintiff lawyers whose clients don't fit the traditional mold of harassment victims.

"I think it's a good decision for plaintiffs," said Jack Lee, a partner at Minami, Lew & Tamaki who specializes in gender discrimination suits.

The opinion stands to strengthen plaintiffs' arguments that adverse effects of an employer's behavior are more important than intent.

"Before, it was pretty clear that you didn't have to be lusting after" an employee to be held liable for discrimination, Lee said. "But here, it's bullying that might create an adverse impact."

Particularly significant, Lee said, was Goodwin's statement that "this case illustrates an alternative motivational theory in which an abusive bully takes advantage of a traditionally female workplace because he is more comfortable when bullying women than when bullying men."

Such alternative theories, Lee said, would be useful in cases like one he handled last year for an Air Force surgeon. The surgeon said she had been treated differently than her male counterparts, even though she was not called names or explicitly abused for being a woman.

While a jury eventually awarded his client $500,000, Lee said the case was a challenge because doctors tend not to act in stereotypically discriminatory ways. Friday's opinion, he said, could help overcome that hurdle.

"Highly educated people don't have that kind of roughhouse environment, but there can be sex harassment nonetheless," said Lee. Shelley Gregory, a staff attorney at the Legal Aid Society-Employment Law Center in San Francisco, agreed.

"It's not always the case that we have a smoking gun," she said. "What I think the court is doing is recognizing the evolving nature of harassment in the workplace." Gilmore Diekmann Jr., a partner at Seyfarth Shaw who defends employers in harassment suits, was less enthused.

He said the opinion is unclear on the most alarming point it raises: that subjective effects of an employer's behavior may be used to determine whether there was discrimination.

"It's unique and probably wrong" if the court meant that people's different reactions to the same behavior could form the basis for a discrimination claim, he said. "It seems to be some effort by a panel to possibly inject a new type of liability," he added.

The opinion, Christopher v. National Education Association, 05 C.D.O.S. 7999, sends the case of plaintiff Carol Christopher back to the U.S. District Court for the District of Alaska, which had dismissed the suit.

11th Circuit: Jail Was Right To Conduct Strip Search (LAW)

By Scott Simonson, Fulton County Daily Report

Law.com, September 6, 2005

Atlanta's federal appeals court, with apparent reluctance, ruled Wednesday that a North Georgia county's policy of strip-searching every prisoner booked into jail violated the Constitution.

The court also noted that the policy didn't necessarily violate the rights of individual prisoners who were searched, so long as jailers had "reasonable suspicion" that a detainee might possess weapons or contraband.

The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals made the ruling in the case of Janet M. Hicks, who sued Habersham County's sheriff and jail supervisor after she was strip-searched following her 2001 misdemeanor arrest for a domestic-violence dispute with her estranged husband. Hicks v. Moore, No. 03-13686.

According to the 11th Circuit's ruling, Hicks was strip-searched by a female sheriff's department employee and was not touched during the search.

About three years ago -- and after Hicks' strip search -- the sheriff in charge of the jail at that time, Richard Moore, changed the jail's policy, and the facility no longer strip-searches everyone who is booked.

Hicks' suit did not name the county as a defendant but targeted Moore, the jail commander and other individuals who supervised or participated in her detention and search. Current Habersham County Sheriff DeRay Fincher could not be reached for comment.

A unanimous three-judge panel ruled that the jail did not violate Hicks' rights, because her arrest for a violent crime justified a strip search. The 11th Circuit effectively ended Hicks' federal case against the jail and reversed a district court ruling that denied the Habersham government employees' motion for summary judgment.

Chief Judge J.L. Edmondson wrote the opinion, joined by Judge Frank M. Hull and U.S. District Judge B. Avant Edenfield of the Southern District of Georgia, sitting by designation.

QUESTIONING PRECEDENT

Edmondson, with apparent unease, ruled that circuit precedent didn't allow Habersham's practice of strip-searching everyone booked at the jail. This ruling marks the second time in the past four months that Edmondson has written an opinion expressing dissatisfaction with the circuit's precedent on strip searches.

His opinion stopped short of endorsing circuit precedent or condemning the jail's policy. He added, in a footnote, "We personally question that such a practice violates the Fourth Amendment," noting that the circuit's precedent justifies strip searches only when a "reasonable suspicion" indicates that a detainee could possess weapons or contraband, according to the court's 2001 ruling in Wilson v. Jones, 251 F.3d 1340.

Edmondson pointed out that the "reasonable suspicion" standard remains stricter than what the U.S. Supreme Court requires.

In May, in another opinion written by Edmondson, a full 12-judge panel of the 11th Circuit voiced unease with its precedent on strip searches. In that case, Edmondson wrote, "most of us are uncertain that jailers are required to have a reasonable suspicion of weapons or contraband before strip-searching -- for security and safety purposes -- arrestees bound for the general jail population." Evans v. Stephens, 407 F.3d 1272.

SUFFICIENT REASON TO SEARCH

In Hicks' case, the court found that the strip search did not violate her constitutional rights, eliminating the basis for her federal suit.

"Just because she was strip-searched at a jail that had a search practice that would generally violate the Constitution does not mean every search that was conducted actually violated the Constitution," Edmondson wrote.

Because Hicks was arrested on a misdemeanor charge of family violence battery -- obviously, a crime of violence, according to the opinion -- jail officials had sufficient reason to suspect hidden weapons or contraband, Edmondson wrote.

However, the opinion pointed out that the arresting officer and jail supervisor in Hicks' case testified that they did not suspect Hicks of having weapons or drugs.

"Whether reasonable suspicion existed at the time is a question of law to be determined ultimately by judges, not policemen or jailers," Edmondson wrote. "The subjective intentions and beliefs of the jailers conducting the strip-search are

'immaterial to the Fourth Amendment analysis,'" according to the 1989 U.S. Supreme Court case Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386.

Terry E. Williams of Lawrenceville, Ga., who represented Moore, the former Habersham sheriff, and other county employees, could not be reached for comment.

One of the attorneys representing Hicks, Scott D. Delius of the Delius Law Firm, said Thursday that he was disappointed with the outcome and that his client hasn't decided whether she'll pursue the case.

"We at least feel good about the fact that there's no longer a blanket strip-search policy at the jail and that jails are taking the issue seriously," said Delius, who represented Hicks along with J. Matthew Maguire Jr. of Balch & Bingham.

Lawsuit To Be Filed Over New Voting Law In Georgia (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

ATLANTA, Sept. 5 (AP) - Opponents of a new Georgia law requiring voters to show photo identification at the polls are planning a federal lawsuit challenging the measure, which they fear will lower voter turnout.

The bill eliminates the use of formerly accepted forms of voter identification like Social Security cards, birth certificates or utility bills.

A news conference to discuss the lawsuit was set for Tuesday, said State Representative Tyrone L. Brooks Sr., Democrat of Atlanta.

The suit is likely to echo the complaints that several groups filed in objection letters sent to the Department of Justice before it approved the new law last month.

Under the Voting Rights Act, Georgia and other states with a history of suppressing minority voting must get federal permission to change their voting laws.

Mr. Brooks said he believed the issue could ultimately be decided by the United States Supreme Court. "No matter who wins at the lower court level, there will be appeals," he said.

The Republican-backed measure caused racial tension during the state's legislative session last spring. Most of Georgia's black lawmakers walked out at the Capitol when it was approved.

Democrats had argued that the idea was a political move by the Republican Party to depress voting among minorities, the elderly and the poor, all traditional bases for Democrats.

Plaintiffs in the suit include the Coalition for the People's Agenda, whose chairman is the Rev. Joseph Lowery; the Georgia Association of Black Elected Officials; the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. The American Civil Liberties Union is representing the plaintiffs in the case.

The groups plan to include Georgia voters as co-plaintiffs, especially those who would be "grossly affected by the proposal," Mr. Brooks said.

Several other states request photo identification, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures. Most allow voters without photo ID to use other forms of identification or sign an affidavit of identity.

Exploiting The Gender Gap (NYT)

By Warren Farrell

The New York Times, September 5, 2005

Carlsbad, Calif. — Nothing disturbs working women more than the statistics often mentioned on Labor Day showing that they are paid only 76 cents to men's dollar for the same work. If that were the whole story, it should disturb all of us; like many men, I have two daughters and a wife in the work force.

When I was on the board of the National Organization for Women in New York City, I blamed discrimination for that gap. Then I asked myself, "If an employer has to pay a man one dollar for the same work a woman would do for 76 cents, why would anyone hire a man?"

Perhaps, I thought, male bosses undervalue women. But I discovered that in 2000, women without bosses - who own their own businesses - earned only 49 percent of male business owners. Why? When the Rochester Institute of Technology surveyed business owners with M.B.A.'s from one top business school, they found that money was the primary motivator for only 29 percent of the women, versus 76 percent of the men. Women put a premium on autonomy, flexibility (25- to 35-hour weeks and proximity to home), fulfillment and safety.

After years of research, I discovered 25 differences in the work-life choices of men and women. All 25 lead to men earning more money, but to women having better lives.

High pay, as it turns out, is about tradeoffs. Men's tradeoffs include working more hours (women work more around the home); taking more dangerous, dirtier and outdoor jobs (garbage collecting, construction, trucking); relocating and traveling; and training for technical jobs with less people contact (like engineering).

Is the pay gap, then, about the different choices of men and women? Not quite. It's about parents' choices. Women who have never been married and are childless earn 117 percent of their childless male counterparts. (This comparison controls for education, hours worked and age.) Their decisions are more like married men's, and never-married men's decisions are more like women's in general (careers in arts, no weekend work, etc.)

Does this imply that mothers sacrifice careers? Not really. Surveys of men and women in their 20's find that both sexes (70 percent of men, and 63 percent of women) would sacrifice pay for more family time. The next generation's discussion will be about who gets to be the primary parent.

Don't women, though, earn less than men in the same job? Yes and no. For example, the Bureau of Labor Statistics lumps together all medical doctors. Men are more likely to be surgeons (versus general practitioners) and work in private practice for hours that are longer and less predictable, and for more years. In brief, the same job is not the same. Are these women's choices? When I taught at a medical school, I saw that even my first-year female students eyed specialties with fewer and more predictable hours.

But don't female executives also make less than male executives? Yes. Discrimination? Let's look. The men are more frequently executives of national and international firms with more personnel and revenues, and responsible for bottom-line sales, marketing and finances, not human resources or public relations. They have more experience, relocate and travel overseas more, and so on.

Comparing men and women with the "same jobs," then, is to compare apples and oranges. However, when all 25 choices are the same, the great news for women is that then the women make more than the men. Is there discrimination against women? Yes, like the old boys' network. And sometimes discrimination against women becomes discrimination against men: in hazardous fields, women suffer fewer hazards. For example, more than 500 marines have died in the war in Iraq. All but two were men. In other fields, men are virtually excluded - try getting hired as a male dental hygienist, nursery school teacher, cocktail waiter.

There are 80 jobs in which women earn more than men - positions like financial analyst, speech-language pathologist, radiation therapist, library worker, biological technician, motion picture projectionist. Female sales engineers make 143 percent of their male counterparts; female statisticians earn 135 percent.

I want my daughters to know that people who work 44 hours a week make, on average, more than twice the pay of someone working 34 hours a week. And that pharmacists now earn almost as much as doctors. But only by abandoning our focus on discrimination against women can we discover these opportunities for women.

California To Vote On Marriage (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, September 6, 2005

A bill legalizing homosexual "marriage" in California is scheduled to go up for its second vote in the state Assembly this week, amid vigorous lobbying.

"We intend to keep the Assembly members' feet to the fire," said Benjamin Lopez, a leader of the Traditional Values Coalition. "If they support marriage for one man and one woman, like their constituents voted, they will vote against AB 849."

Mr. Lopez and his allies think California lawmakers legally cannot enact same-sex "marriage" because voters approved Proposition 22, which says only marriages involving one man and one woman are valid in California.

Homosexual rights supporters, however, think their message is the right one.

"We are so very close," Assemblyman Mark Leno said last week after his bill to legalize same-sex "marriage" passed the state Senate.

"It would be very disappointing for [the Assembly] not to be able to stand up for civil rights," he said.

In June, the Assembly rejected Mr. Leno's bill by four votes.

Meanwhile, two same-sex "marriage"-related decisions are expected in Massachusetts this month.

Either today or tomorrow, Massachusetts Attorney General Tom Reilly is expected to issue his decision on whether to certify a constitutional marriage amendment filed by a citizens' group called VoteOnMarriage.org.

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican, supports the amendment, which must garner nearly 66,000 certified signatures and two legislative approvals before it can get on a 2008 ballot.

DOJ_NMG_0002885

However, dozens of homosexual rights groups and lawyers have urged Mr. Reilly not to certify the amendment. They say it is unconstitutional in light of the 2003 Goodridge decision, which legalized same-sex "marriage" in Massachusetts, the groups say.

Meanwhile, on Sept. 14, the Massachusetts legislature is scheduled to meet in a constitutional convention to offer a second vote on a marriage amendment that passed last year.

The amendment, which would disallow same-sex "marriage" but create civil unions, is unpopular. However, if Mr. Reilly rejects VoteOnMarriage.org's amendment, some lawmakers may decide to vote in favor of the civil-union amendment.

It's also possible that this month the Washington State Supreme Court will issue its pivotal ruling on mandating same-sex "marriage" in that state.

Traditional-values groups hope the court will uphold the state's Defense of Marriage Act, which was passed by a supermajority of lawmakers and clarifies that marriage involves only one man and one woman.

But homosexual rights groups hope the court will make Washington the second state to legalize same-sex "marriage" -- especially since, unlike Massachusetts, Washington doesn't have a residency law to block out-of-state couples from marrying there.

"We are all waiting -- anticipating the decision with bated breath," said Fran Dunaway, executive director of Equal Rights Washington in Seattle.

ANTITRUST:

Retail Giant Cries 'Unfair' (LAT)

By Evelyn Iritani, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 6, 2005

Wal-Mart Stores Inc., the retail giant infamous for crushing competitors and putting mom-and-pop retailers out of business, is now worried that its British rival might be too big.

H. Lee Scott Jr., Wal-Mart's chief executive, told a London newspaper last week that British authorities should be concerned about a retail chain having too much market clout.

Tesco, Britain's largest supermarket, has a 30% share of the food market and is expanding fast, thanks in part to an aggressive discounting program. Wal-Mart-owned Asda Group Ltd., Britain's second-largest retail chain, controls 16% of the market.

"As you get over 30% and higher, I am sure there is a point where government is compelled to intervene, particularly in the U.K., where you have the planning laws that make it difficult to compete," Scott told the Times of London, adding that "at some point, the government has to look at it."

Those remarks raised some eyebrows in the United States, where the Bentonville, Ark., retailer is regularly accused of abusing its clout to squeeze pennies out of its supply chain, trounce its competition and expand its sales.

"Wal-Mart is asking for an antitrust investigation of a competitor?" asked Albert Foer, president of the American Antitrust Institute in Washington, a think tank. "How delicious."

Wal-Mart is known for its super-sized profile. It has the world's largest workforce, 1.6 million at last count, more than the entire population of Montana. And 138 million shoppers visit its 5,379 stores and restaurants worldwide each week, racking up $285 billion in sales in 2004.

The retailer's protestations leave people wondering why it would complain about Tesco, given that any debate over curbing power in the global retail market is likely to shine the spotlight on Bentonville.

"Wal-Mart has done a good job of escaping from close antitrust scrutiny in this country, and a lot of people are wondering whether they are vulnerable in this area," said Foer, who had persuaded Wal-Mart Chairman S. Robson Walton to address his annual antitrust conference in Washington last year.

Walton denied that Wal-Mart used its clout to bully suppliers and unfairly drive competitors out of business.

"The real secret to our low prices is not tied to the deals we get with suppliers," he said. "Rather, our low prices are derived from a company culture that is passionate about taking unnecessary cost out of the business and equally passionate about investing in more-efficient business practices."

Wal-Mart has 10% of the U.S. retail market. But in at least two other places, the company has come under the scrutiny of antitrust regulators. In 2002, Mexico's Federal Competition Commission looked into complaints that Wal-Mart de Mexico, known as Walmex, was forcing suppliers to charge the retail giant's competitors higher prices for the same products. After Walmex, the leading retailer, agreed to write to its purchasing department that such a practice was not allowed, the commission closed the investigation.

When Wal-Mart bought Supermercados Amigo Inc., the largest Puerto Rican grocery store chain in 2002, the U.S. Federal Trade Commission required that the company sell off four stores to ensure competition on the island.

But in Britain, where Wal-Mart bought the Asda chain in 1999, Tesco is the market leader. Nick Agarwal, an Asda spokesman in London, said Scott was not referring specifically to his firm's rival in the Times of London interview but was speaking generally about the dangers of market concentration.

"Lee did not say he wants an investigation of Tesco," he said. "What he did do was say that he understands why, when food market share reaches 30% or higher, the government might want to look at that."

Scott has had his own run-ins with Britain's antitrust regulators. In 2003, British authorities turned down Wal-Mart's bid to purchase Safeway, saying the combined stores would have too much clout. At that time, an Asda-Safeway chain would have controlled about 26% of the food market, less than Tesco has today.

Tesco declined to respond directly to Wal-Mart's comments. But in a written statement, the company said British authorities had already investigated the retail market and found that it "operates in the consumer interest."

Wal-Mart representatives insist that anti-competitive issues aren't a concern with their company, because it controls small portions of the market in most parts of the world.

"We're pretty small potatoes outside the U.S.," said William Wertz, a Wal-Mart spokesman in Bentonville. "It really hasn't been an issue."

Critics have suggested that Wal-Mart already poses a threat in some markets. Take Canada, for example, where the retailer has 256 stores and its share of department store sales has risen to 52%, according to Talbot Consultants International, a Toronto-based research firm.

Asked whether Wal-Mart could face antitrust scrutiny in Canada, Wertz said, "I can't answer that," adding that competition laws and market forces are different in every country.

But critics who have launched a global campaign to slow the retailer's expansion accused the company of doublespeak.

"The unmistakable irony here is that Wal-Mart is accusing its British competition of accomplishing exactly what it has planned for its U.S. operations," said Andrew Grossman, executive director of Wal-Mart Watch, an anti-Wal-Mart coalition backed by some of America's leading unions.

The emergence of big-box retailers such as Wal-Mart with global supply chains and markets has created new challenges for antitrust regulators who are constrained by outdated laws and national boundaries. Wal-Mart doesn't fit the traditional definition of a monopolist, an entity that uses its dominant market share to push up prices.

But Wal-Mart's growing influence as a buyer has prompted a debate in antitrust circles about whether a concentration of "buyer power," known as a monopsony, is harmful for society.

Some legal experts say that improved technology and the lowering of trade barriers has made it more difficult to determine when a global player is exerting too much power. For example, though global companies such as Wal-Mart and Tesco are improving efficiency and lowering costs, they may also be undermining societal goals such as preserving small businesses.

"It all comes back, at some point, to politics and to the vision people have of the kind of country they want," Foer said. "I'm not castigating Wal-Mart; I think they have done a lot of good things. I'm much more worried about where we go from here and what things we need to worry about as a society to keep us going in the right direction."

Tide Turns Against Web Music Piracy (FT)

By Alain Levy

Financial Times, September 6, 2005

Monday's court ruling in Australia against Kazaa, the biggest brand name in international music piracy, is the latest sign of a turning tide in our industry's efforts to create a thriving pro-consumer, legitimate digital music business.

It is also a reminder that even with the greatest music, the best technology and the most willing fans, we cannot create this bright digital future alone: public education and proper enforcement of intellectual property rights, by courts and by governments, have a vital part to play as well. This applies to any record company, from the largest major to the smallest indie.

The ruling from Australia has important implications for our business. The Sydney court has not only reinforced the message handed down on Grokster from a unanimous US Supreme Court in July – namely that internet file- sharing services can be liable for music piracy. The world's best-known, and until recently its biggest unauthorisedfile-sharing service, has been found liable for facilitating copyright theft and ordered to stop. The message for similar networks that distribute copyrighted repertoire on a mass scale without permission is clear: it is time to change your ways or stop. Change your systems; respect copyright; use technology responsibly to benefit the music community and not to harm it.

These are momentous rulings for a creative, intellectual property business like EMI, as well as for the artists we invest in and for the legitimate digital market we are working to create. Investment in music is our business and protection of our content is central to everything we do. Our ability to invest in music, and to offer it to our consumers via downloads, ring tones or other digital formats, is integrally dependent on our ability to contain music piracy. Taken together, the Grokster and Kazaa judgements are crucial milestones for us.

The decision is also pro-consumer. It helps investment in the music consumers want. It is good news for fans who want to get great quality music legitimately, while seeing the artists they love get properly rewarded.

And the ruling is pro-technology. Those who claim that all record companies want is to do away with peer-to-peer distribution, in the case of EMI at least, have got it wrong. On the contrary, we have been working hard with companies like SnoCap and iMesh on creating a legitimate file-sharing model – one that uses peer-to-peer technology to benefit the music business, rather than abusing technology to harm it.

This improvement in the legal landscape comes at a critical moment. At EMI we are fast adapting for a digital future and our industry is doing the same. Within the last 18 months digital sales have moved out of a niche market and into the mainstream. Much credit of course goes to Apple iTunes for starting the ball rolling. Now a groundswell of competing services is gathering – great news for the business and the consumer.

Last week's launch of new digital services by the UK's two major music retailers, HMV and Virgin, are a landmark for the British market. But in most other markets outside the US, Japan, Germany and France, digital music has hardly gained a foothold. The growth potential is exciting.

Consumers, we know, are hungry for the new ways in which we can now make our music available: digital downloads in the first half of 2005 outstripped the whole of 2004. Surveys show that as many consumers are now trying legitimate online services as are using the unauthorised alternative. There are exciting forecasts for growth of the digital business. I believe it could grow from about 5 per cent now to 25 per cent of our industry's revenues over the next five years..

The digital music market is up and running, and our challenge now is to build on the successful start. I am confident and I take little notice of the sceptics. A few years ago no one held much hope for record companies breaking into what was then a 100 per cent internet pirate market. The mood is very different today. Virtually all our front line music is available in a huge array of digital channels. Music is becoming easier to buy than to steal.

But the tide is turning for other reasons, too. Public attitudes are shifting towards good and responsible practices in downloading music. A big public awakening has happened on the issue – helped by waves of industry information campaigns. Probably more significant still, the lawsuits taken out in 12 countries, which now total over 14,000, have clearly played an important part in deterring would-be illegal file-sharers and containing internet piracy. These strategies must be sustained because they are working.

The decisions on Grokster and Kazaa have helped us further. The extra layer of legal protection they represent gives our industry better conditions in which to invest in music, and a better environment in which to create a thriving digital business. Today, an entrepreneur working on a new legitimate innovative peer-to-peer service should feel better about his business prospects in the music industry. Equally, I would hope that the guy who, as I write, is planning to build the next pirate peer-to-peer service will today feel considerably worse about his.

Court Orders Kazaa To Stop Pirates (WP/AP)

By Mike Corder, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

SYDNEY, Australia -- A federal judge on Monday ordered distributors of the popular file-swapping program Kazaa to alter the software, which millions have downloaded, so it can no longer be used for music piracy.

Hailed as a victory by the recording industry that brought the suit, the decision has implications well beyond Australia, where Kazaa executives are based, because Kazaa's users span the globe.

In some ways, it mirrors the U.S. Supreme Court's June ruling that Hollywood and the music industry can sue technology companies that encourage their customers to steal music and movies over the Internet.

Federal Court Judge Murray Wilcox determined in Monday's ruling that Kazaa's owners and distributors, led by Sharman Networks Ltd., took no action to rein in illegal file-sharing despite posted warnings on their Web site urging Kazaa users not to swap copyright material.

Wilcox said it had been in the financial interest of Sharman and its partners "to maximize, not minimize, music file-sharing."

DOJ_NMG_0002888

He found six of the 10 defendants, including Sharman, its Sydney-based chief executive Nikki Hemming, as well as Altnet, a Sharman software partner, guilty of copyright infringement and ordered them to pay 90 percent of the record industry's costs in the case.

A hearing will be set later to establish damages.

"We will ask the court when it comes to damages to reflect the value of the music these people ripped off," Michael Speck, a spokesman for the Australian recording industry, said of the millions who have downloaded Kazaa.

In a brief statement, Sharman said it would appeal and Kazaa software remained available online, with more than 800,000 downloads reported last week and 390 million total since Kazaa first became available in 2001. Sharman says its software is no different from a tape recorder or photocopier _ and that Kazaa could not control copyright infringement by users.

But Wilcox said that Kazaa's distributors actively encouraged users to share files, the vast majority of which were copyright material.

He said that if Kazaa is to continue its owners will have to ensure that new versions of the software filter out unlicensed copyright material, a task the judge said would be extremely difficult.

Wilcox stressed, however, that he was anxious not to damage legitimate file-swapping with his ruling. He said Kazaa needs to be changed "without unnecessarily intruding on others' freedom of speech and communication."

Kim Weatherall, a lecturer in intellectual property law at Melbourne University, called Wilcox's decision brave but potentially chilling to technology innovators.

"It is clear that the judge is concerned not to stop the technology completely but to try and work some middle line," she said.

The case is the latest in a long line of courtroom showdowns between purveyors of so-called peer-to-peer (P2P) networks and copyright holders led by the music and movie industries.

The U.S. Supreme Court's related June decision gave those industries the go-ahead to proceed with suits against file-sharing software developers Grokster Ltd. and Streamcast Networks Inc. It said such companies can be liable if they deliberately encourage customers to infringe on copyrights as their businesses attempt to grow audiences and sell more advertising.

In a statement Monday, the Recording Industry Association of America praised Wilcox's ruling as continuing in that vein: "... this decision reflects a growing, international chorus: those who promote theft can be held accountable no matter how they may attempt to escape responsibility.

"A corrupt business strategy of attempting to hide off-shore is not off-limits to the enforcement of rights by creators or law enforcement," the RIAA added.

Kazaa has lost significant popularity since its 2002 heyday, due in part to legal pressure and sabotage efforts by the recording industry but also to the emergence of competing technologies.

Other peer-to-peer file-sharing tools and services that similarly do not require a central server, including BitTorrent and eDonkey, have supplanted it as the Internet's most popular.

FastTrack, the network tapped by Kazaa users, accounted for 10 percent of traffic volume in a six-week study begun in June of data swapped using the Internet's top four file-sharing applications. The study was done by CacheLogic.

Chiron Snubs 'inadequate' Novartis Bid (FT)

By James Politi

Financial Times, September 6, 2005

Novartis was on Monday facing an uphill battle in its attempt to take full control of Chiron as independent directors at the US vaccine company rejected the Swiss drugmaker's $4.5bn offer.

Chiron board members also decided to make clear that Novartis's proposal had not been solicited by the company, conflicting with the impression given by Novartis last week.

The US group said: "After thorough analysis and consideration of Novartis's offer to acquire the shares of Chiron it does not already own for $40 a share in cash, the independent directors of Chiron have determined that this offer is inadequate."

Novartis already owns 42 per cent of Chiron, which lost its flu vaccine production licence last year after the contamination of vaccines at its UK plant.

Chiron's rejection means Novartis might become embroiled in a long-running struggle to gain control of the company, which it is courting to gain access to the fast-growing market for vaccines.

DOJ_NMG_0002889

Under the complex rules governing Novartis's investment in Chiron, the Swiss group has four months to secure the support of the independent directors for an offer to buy all of Chiron's shares. After that, it can begin an arbitration process to determine the company's fair value. But Chiron's board members could delay the arbitration until 2007 if they decide this is not the right time to sell.

Novartis's proposed $40 a share offer values Chiron at the equivalent of a 10 per cent premium on its price before the announcement.

Since the offer, Chiron shares have risen above the level of Novartis's offer, as Wall Street investors bet that the Swiss group would be forced to increase the price. On Friday, they closed at $42.79, down 0.3 per cent.

Last year, Chiron saw its net profits fall to $156m, compared with $304m in 2003, on the back of its manufacturing woes.

But its prospects were bolstered last week when the company said it had received a "favourable report" from US regulators visiting the UK plant that produced the contaminated vaccines.

ENVIRONMENT:

Redemption In The Bayou (NYT)

The New York Times, September 5, 2005

People keep making bets against nature, and in the end nature usually wins. This is as true in the rainforests of Central America, where clear-cutting has led to disastrous floods, as it is in the steep California canyons, where people have no business building houses.

It is no less true of the Mississippi Delta and its biggest city, New Orleans, whose heart-rending tragedy is partly traceable to years of federal efforts to manage the Mississippi River in ways that it did not intend to be managed, keeping it from going where it wanted to go and thus weakening the natural defenses that might have spared the city the worst.

Amends can be made. Before Congress is a $14 billion plan to restore the vanishing wetlands and barrier islands off the Louisiana coast that in times past would have served as a buffer against the storm. The House has approved a modest $1.9 billion down payment on this plan, but it needs a push from President Bush and the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist, to ensure Senate approval. The plan would involve some delicate re-engineering of the natural system and is not without risk. Still, it could provide a measure of redemption for years of environmental carelessness for which Congress itself is largely responsible.

The problem, in a nutshell, is this: the Louisiana coast, its protective fringe of barrier islands and coastal marshlands, is disappearing. Over the last 75 years, 1.9 million acres have vanished. Every year, another 25 square miles, an area roughly the size of Manhattan, sinks quietly beneath the waves. In some places, the coastline has receded 15 miles from where it was in the 1920's.

The soil in the delta compacts and sinks naturally. Historically, however, the Mississippi replenished the loss with sediment gathered from its many tributaries and then deposited like clockwork in the delta with the spring floods. Or so it did until 1927, when Congress ordered the Army Corps of Engineers to find ways to control the floods so as to make the river safe for farming, homes and commerce.

As it would later do in the Everglades (with equally disastrous results for the Florida ecosystem), the corps then proceeded to construct a network of dams, levees and canals throughout the river basin. The upstream dams reduced the river's sediment load well below historical levels; the sediment that remained, while considerable, was then routed away from the Louisiana coast by a system of levees and navigation channels. The effect of all these engineering changes was to hurry the river along and, at its mouth, propel its contents deep into the Gulf of Mexico, as if shot from a cannon, bypassing the coastal marshes and barrier islands that most needed its nourishment.

Add to all this the demands of a growing population, plus thousands of miles of pipes and canals dug through the marsh for a booming oil and gas industry, and the result was inevitable: a shrunken, degraded and essentially defenseless landscape.

More is at stake, of course, than the landscape. These may be the hardest-working wetlands in America. They support one of the country's largest fisheries; almost every fish caught in the Gulf of Mexico spends part of its life in the Louisiana marsh. They are the wintering ground or refueling stop for most of the migratory waterfowl that travel the Mississippi flyway. And as everyone who has bought gasoline in the last few days knows by now, they are vital to the production, refining and transportation of much of the nation's oil. Indeed, the oil and gas industry has as much incentive as anyone to protect the marshes from further erosion. Most of its equipment cannot survive in open water.

The conditions are thus ripe for a major effort to restore the Louisiana coast. The program before Congress was hatched by the state's politicians and in its universities and drafted by the Army Corps of Engineers. It is supported by both industry and advocacy groups like the National Audubon Society and Environmental Defense, which helped with its design. It would start small, with three or four carefully calibrated pilot programs to divert water flow to the marshes, then go from there.

What it has always required is the enthusiastic support of Washington's political leaders. It is hard to believe that the events of the last week haven't caught their attention.

Missouri Condemnation No Longer So Imminent (WP)

By T.r. Reid

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

SUNSET HILLS, Mo. -- When David Wright retired from his factory job in 1997, he poured just about all his savings into a handsome brick house in the Sunset Manor subdivision here. "This was our dream," said David's wife, Lorraine. "We were set here for the rest of our lives."

But the dream turned sour when the city council of this St. Louis suburb decided last year to bulldoze all 254 homes in Sunset Manor and turn the land over to a shopping-mall developer. "We cried and we prayed," Lorraine Wright recalled. "And we put a lot of hope into the Supreme Court, because they were supposed to decide whether this kind of thing is legal."

So the Wrights were crushed -- at first -- when the U.S. Supreme Court ruled on June 23 that the Constitution does not stop cities from seizing homes to make way for commercial development projects. "What we didn't realize right away," David Wright said, "was that the decision would be a positive development for those of us who don't want to see people's houses taken away."

Here in Missouri and all over the country, the court's decision in Kelo v. City of New London has sparked a furious reaction, with politicians of both parties proposing new legislation that would sharply limit the kind of seizure the court's decision validated.

As a result, a decision first seen as a key legal victory for cities that want to use eminent domain for private projects has turned into a major setback on the political front for pro-development interests.

The popular backlash has slowed or blocked many pending projects, as developers, their bankers and local governments suddenly face public furor.

In Sunset Hills, the bank that planned to finance the proposed new mall abruptly withdrew its funding amid a noisy political argument after the Kelo decision. That means the Wrights' home is safe, for the time being -- but hundreds of their neighbors who had agreed to move out are left in limbo.

Three states have already passed new laws in response to the Kelo decision.

The statutes in Alabama and Texas sharply curtail eminent-domain condemnations for private development. "We don't like anybody messing with our dogs, our guns, our hunting rights or trying to take property from us," said state Sen. Jack Biddle, a sponsor of the Alabama law. Delaware's new statute permits condemnation but sets new procedural requirements for local governments.

Larry Morandi, an analyst at the National Conference of State Legislatures, predicts a rush of new laws next winter, when 44 state legislatures will be back in session.

"Most if not all state legislatures will be dealing with eminent-domain laws next year," Morandi said. "The outcry has been so sharp that many states already have task forces or study committees at work on this issue this summer. Most of the proposed legislation is designed to restrict the kind of governmental action that the court upheld in Kelo ."

The Institute for Justice, a Washington-based libertarian think tank, said that hundreds of local governments around the country are also debating new ordinances to restrict the use of eminent domain. Many have passed laws this summer barring any seizure of private property for commercial development. Other cities are tightening the conditions that could authorize such seizure.

Several members of Congress have introduced legislation that would bar federal financing for any local government project that condemns property for a commercial development. But Congress did authorize governments to condemn property for the benefit of energy companies in the new energy bill that President Bush signed last month.

The right of government to seize private property for public projects is specifically authorized in the Constitution as long as owners receive "just compensation." A farmer whose cornfield lies in the path of a proposed expressway can be forced to sell the land even if he wants to keep farming there.

Traditionally, this power of eminent domain was used for government functions such as parks and highways. But more and more local governments have begun seizing property from unwilling owners for the creation of industrial parks, hotels and shopping centers.

This trend was not widely recognized until the Supreme Court decision in June that validated the practice. An issue that had been primarily of interest to local governments and land-use planners quickly hit every editorial page in the country, with widespread condemnation of the court's 5 to 4 ruling.

DOJ_NMG_0002891

Some interest groups, including the National League of Cities, endorsed the ruling. But the overall political reaction was intensely hostile, sparking a rush of proposed legislation.

Supreme Court justices may not be unhappy about this reaction. Justice John Paul Stevens, author of the majority opinion in the Kelo case, said in a speech this summer that he did not agree with the property seizure in that case but felt that the law required him to uphold it nonetheless.

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who dissented in Kelo , warned that permitting seizure of private property for private development would have a reverse Robin Hood effect, giving governments "license to transfer property from those with few resources to those with more."

That pattern is clear here in Sunset Hills. This affluent town is dotted with large $600,000 homes on green hills surrounding a country club. But the Sunset Manor subdivision, the most ethnically mixed neighborhood in town, is made up mainly of small homes on small lots, with prices around $100,000.

The city council here, known as the Board of Aldermen, decided last year to level the 65-acre subdivision so that Novus Cos., a local developer, could build an upscale shopping mall to be called Main Street at Sunset. Of the 254 homeowners, 229 have agreed to sell their property to Novus. The owner of a shopping mall two miles away has financed the efforts of the holdout owners to block condemnation of their properties.

In July, the alderman authorized condemnation proceedings against the remaining owners -- including David and Lorraine Wright, a black couple who had planned to spend the rest of their lives in Sunset Manor and thus declined to sell their home.

"We thought at first, you know, we didn't have a prayer," David Wright said. "How can you fight City Hall? And then the Supreme Court ruled against people like us.

"But the reaction to that decision has been so strong. The project is kind of stopped. So now we are thinking maybe we can stay here."

Novus, the developer, said it is searching for new financing. Meanwhile, the project is on hold -- a painful development for the 229 homeowners who had agreed to sell their houses and move.

"The collapse of the financing for the [shopping mall] project has left a couple of hundred families in a terrible place," said Pete Snyder, a spokesman for the developer. "A lot of them are already paying the mortgage on their new home, but now they don't have a buyer for the old one. This has to be resolved, and condemning those 25 houses is the way it has to go forward," he said of the holdouts.

But Will Aschinger, a leader of the anti-condemnation group, thinks the political reaction to the Supreme Court decision has effectively saved the Sunset Manor subdivision. "The backlash against that decision is the best thing that ever happened to us," he said with a smile. "No matter what the court says, I don't think cities can get away with this kind of stuff anymore."

Government Cowboys Spend Days Trailing Texas Ticks (WP)

By Sylvia Moreno

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

LAREDO, Tex. -- This federal employee works along a treacherous stretch of high Rio Grande riverbank known as No Man's Land. His work uniform: leather chaps, sturdy Wranglers, high-top bullhide boots and silver spurs. His tools: a .357-caliber revolver, a lariat, a machete, a walkie-talkie, and his beloved brown-and-white appaloosa, Payaso.

His mission: to hunt down ticks.

Meet Fred Garza, government cowboy -- one of a small force of hardy men whose mission for almost 70 years has been to keep the dreaded Texas cattle fever tick confined to 900 miles of winding riverfront along the Mexican border. He is a tick, or river, rider, a U.S. Department of Agriculture employee who has managed to marry his cowboying skills and love of desolate open range with benefits and a federal pension.

It's hard and lonely work in unforgiving terrain. The cowboys live away from their families in remote shacks four to five nights a week. They ride solo six or seven hours daily in 100-plus-degree temperatures, cutting trails through thick gnarly brush and prickly cactus to rope frightened steers, searching them for ticks and then transporting them to a pesticide vat for a disinfecting dip. (The cattle are dipped regularly in organophosphates for six to nine months before being returned to their owners or sold at auction if not claimed.)

It may be a tough life, but Garza, a GS-8 after 15 years in the saddle, loves it.

"This is not work for me. It's not work for a lot of us," said Garza, a mustachioed 50-year-old whose uncle rode the river for 56 years before retiring from the USDA. "Like they say, ma'am, if you don't want to work, find you a good job."

Garza and his horseback-riding colleagues make up the nation's front line against a scourge that decimated the cattle industry in 1906 and continues to be a threat as long as the cattle fever tick thrives south of the border and Mexican cows stray or are smuggled across the Rio Grande. Mexican cows have developed immunity to many tick diseases or suffer only mild symptoms.

Today, the riders are fighting the worst infestation of cattle fever ticks in 30 years and are doing so in the face of budgetary shortfalls and bureaucratic turf wars.

"We're losing ground," said Edwin J. Bowers, director of field operations for the Laredo-based program, which is part of the USDA Animal and Plant Health Inspection Service.

The battle against the ticks dates back to 1906, when cattle tick fever spread through 14 southern states, wiping out up to 90 percent of herds in just days. The cause was traced to the Boophilus annulatus and Boophilus microplus , ticks carried by Texas cattle driven along trails to stockyards and auction markets up north. The parasites cause piroplasmosis, a disease known as Texas fever or red water disease. It causes red blood cells to rupture and the fever-crazed animals -- usually cows but also horses -- bleed to death by expelling blood through urine.

The epidemic sparked an intense campaign against ticks that began, initially, under the auspices of various affected states and counties. By 1938, the dreaded insect had been confined to portions of eight Mexican border counties in south Texas, and the federal government took over the eradication program. To patrol the permanent quarantine zone for "Mex-ee-co cows," as these cowboys call them, the USDA created a squad of river riders, some of them members of the old U.S. horse-riding sentry against hoof-and-mouth disease.

"They call us tick riders. We call ourselves the tick eradication mounted patrol," Bowers said.

In January, Bowers asked USDA officials for an emergency appropriation of $521,000 to hire two tick riders for his understaffed unit (he is two short of the full complement of 61), to pay keep on four temporary workers, to buy needed equipment, and to fund a special feeding program that kills fever ticks on south Texas's abundant whitetail deer. The deer are believed to be spreading the tick on cattle-grazing land, making it harder to contain the parasite. At the same time, U.S. ranchers have been stymied in keeping Mexican cattle off their property because of drought-induced low water levels along certain parts of the Rio Grande and regulations by the International Boundary and Water Commission that prohibit fencing and brush management on dried riverbeds. The funding has yet to be released, and negotiations with the IBWC are stalled.

"Until 1996, we hadn't had any ticks on my land in 50 years," said Humberto Vela, who owns a 2,000-acre cattle ranch in Zapata, Tex., outside Laredo. He said lax efforts by Mexican officials to kill off the fever tick and the ban on building fences in dried portions of Rio Grande riverbed have penalized him and other ranchers. "We have to go through this whole cycle of dipping to keep an epidemic out of the United States," Vela said.

In Spanish, the tick riders are called garrapateros for the Spanish word for tick (garrapata). Although 60 percent of these government cowboys are Spanish-speaking Mexican American, the Anglo tick riders are bilingual, too. The job requires regular encounters with Mexican ranchers and ranch hands across the river -- not to mention chance meetings with undocumented immigrants, usually dehydrated and starving, who get lost wandering through the thick brush; the coyotes who guide them across the Rio Grande; and other smugglers and border bandits, as well.

"I got caught in the cross-fire between the bandidos and the coyotes when I worked the river over in Brownsville. One got shot in the heart and right here," Garza said as he pointed to his upper right rib cage. "He died and the other guy got shot in the arm and leg and lived. It was 10 in the morning, on a Sunday."

Danger has always been part of a tick rider's job. In 1982, Congress passed a law to arm the patrol after a group of weathered cowboys, bullet-riddled saddle in hand, went to Capitol Hill to lobby lawmakers for help. They got .357 magnums and later, the choice to carry .40-caliber semiautomatics.

The weapons have not eliminated the casualties, however. One tick rider was shot and killed at his camp not far from the river (the case has not been solved). One drowned in the Rio Grande, and another was killed in a vehicle accident. One rider survived a bullet in the back, and many others have been shot at and missed. "We've been very, very lucky considering the climate we work in," Bowers said.

Among all of USDA's animal health technicians or animal inspectors -- as the tick rider's law enforcement badges proclaim them to be -- they are more prone to be injured on the job. One kick of an angry cow's hoof can snap a forearm.

Despite the hazards of the job, Bowers gets about 100 applicants per job opening, and some tick riders apply multiple times before getting hired as a GS-5 with a current starting salary of $26,197 a year.

Joe Akers, 37, a champion rodeo roper of the Tilden, Tex., rodeo applied three times before he got the job on the mounted patrol three years ago. Like Garza, he was following in a relative's footsteps. His uncle was a river rider for decades.

"If you like ridin' and you love ropin', this is the job for you," said Akers, who wears the big silver belt buckle he was awarded in a cattle-roping competition. "Especially in south Texas, it's extremely prestigious to get on with the tick force."

A Class War Runs Through It (NYT)

By Jonathan Weber
The New York Times, September 6, 2005
Missoula, Mont.

JAMES COX KENNEDY, the head of Cox Enterprises, the Atlanta media company, was just doing what lots of modern media moguls do when he bought nearly 4,000 acres in Montana's Ruby Valley: transforming remote Western ranchland into a private hunting and fishing retreat, and doing some commendable habitat conservation and restoration work in the process.

Perhaps unwittingly, however, Mr. Kennedy has walked into the middle of two separate but closely related controversies, one having to do with Montana's stream-access laws - that one will be the subject of a mediation session next week - and the other relating to conservation easements.

Both issues, ultimately, are about class, and point to the need for new policies (and vigilance) in policing the conservation easement system and defending access to public lands and water. Just as important, though, Mr. Kennedy's Ruby Valley imbroglio underscores the need for a deeper sense of noblesse oblige among the ultra-rich as they buy up great swaths of the American West.

Montana's 20-year-old stream-access law, which declares that the state's rivers and streams are public property up to the high-water mark, provides a clear window into land-use battles. The law, among the strongest in the nation, has survived numerous legal challenges and become a source of pride for many Montanans (including Gov. Brian Schweitzer), though it's still fiercely opposed by property-rights advocates.

The law does not require property owners to provide entry to waterways through their own land, but it does permit access from any public property. As a result, among the most common access points are county bridges. That's where Mr. Kennedy has run into trouble: his ranch includes all or parts of two bridges that cross the Ruby River, and he has blocked access by reinforcing old fencing along those bridges. Stream-access advocates have sued the county for allowing the fences, setting the stage for a showdown on a controversy that has raged for almost a decade.

Mr. Kennedy claims that the bridges are neither safe nor legal river-access sites. More to the point, though, he says allowing public access would damage the riparian habitat and destroy a fragile fishery that he has spent a lot of time and money nursing back to health. That's a similar argument to one being made by the brokerage mogul Charles Schwab, the rock musician Huey Lewis and others who are fighting to keep the public off a waterway south of Missoula where they own property.

And that brings us to the second controversy. Much of Mr. Kennedy's Ruby Valley property is in a conservation easement, an arrangement under which property owners receive tax breaks for forgoing development on ecologically sensitive lands. Easements have been under fire in Congress in the wake of revelations that some developers were claiming conservation easements for golf courses (hey, it's open space, right?) and otherwise gaming the system.

While Mr. Kennedy's Ruby Valley easements are not cover for a golf course, they do have one unfortunate feature: Mr. Kennedy is the president of the land trust that is supposed to serve as the enforcer of the easement agreement. That's exactly the kind of arrangement that rightly gets easement critics up in arms.

Easements have proved to be a very effective means of encouraging land conservation and habitat preservation. But there's something wrong when a billionaire buys a ranch, gets a tax break for an easement and then chases the locals off the river in the name of conservation.

Class, of course, is an issue here. Consider the people who are fighting for access to the river: retired miners and schoolteachers and other working folk, some of whom grew up fishing the local waters and some of whom couldn't give a hoot about fishing but hate seeing the landscape walled off. But there's also wider a social issue involved: if land and water conservation and wildlife protection come to be seen as things that only benefit the rich, it will reinforce the perception that conservation is a luxury of the elite rather than a universal concern.

If class warfare breaks out in Montana, the environment is going to suffer. So what do we do? As Jon Christensen and Terry Anderson, two of the West's leading thinkers on conservation issues, have pointed out, the conservation easement system needs to be better policed. For starters, appraisers - working with state and federal tax authorities - should establish appraisal standards for easement donations. Moreover, the land trusts should work together to set up an accreditation system, and Congress could mandate that tax deductions be available only for donations to accredited land trusts.

When it comes to public access, state and local officials - and voters - need to recognize that the heavy bias toward property rights that exists throughout the West is something that will increasingly serve a small minority of wealthy landowners, not mom-and-pop homesteaders or family farmers. This imbalance needs to change. County commissioners, who are often on the front lines, can't allow themselves to be intimidated by the threat of litigation over access issues. And they need strong back-up from state attorneys general.

But a big part of the solution is in the hands of the landowners themselves. In an era of economic policies that are producing an ever-larger group of the super-rich, those who are wealthier than the rest of us have a responsibility to manage their properties at least partly in the public interest.

They need to meet with their neighbors, get involved with the community and find compromises that work for everyone. In most cases, the locals will be more than receptive to even small gestures. After all, who wants to fight when the fish are biting?

Is This The Gaze Of An Endangered Species Or An Evil Croc? (NYT)

By Larry Rohter

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

MAMIRAUÁ, Brazil - As dusk falls, the waters here gradually come alive. One after another, caimans begin to stick their armored heads above the surface, and before long this isolated, tree-lined channel feeding the Amazon is teeming with crocodilians as large as 15 feet long. Their thrashing, splashing and grunting reverberates all through the night.

Just a generation ago the caiman, a cousin of the American alligator, was driven so near extinction by the demand for its skin and meat that the government banned hunting it. But efforts to protect the black and spectacled caiman (pronounced KAY-men) have proved so successful that the population has exploded and the beast has now become a pest and, according to some, a threat.

Peasants along the rivers complain that caimans devour their livestock, and they are clamoring for the right to resume hunting. Even small children are occasionally attacked at the river's edge, leading local newspapers and radio stations to say the officials in far away Brasília know nothing about the hard realities of river life.

The loudest and most constant protests, however, come from fishermen in areas like this, 450 miles west of Manaus, the capital of Amazonas State. They complain that the resurgent caimans destroy their nets, which can cost between $50 and $200, and consume large quantities of the same game fish that they need to catch and sell to feed their families.

"Every time you go out, they always get in the way," said Ademar Nunes Nogueira, 41, who has been fishing since he was 10. "But if you dare to kill a caiman and the environmental agents catch you, you're the one who has to pay a fine."

Even in Manaus, a city of 1.5 million people, caimans are now a real presence and not just an urban legend. "There are spectacled caimans living in the sewers of Manaus," said William Magnusson, a caiman specialist at the National Institute for Amazon Research there. "They adapt to anything."

The exploding caiman population has also become a political issue in Amazonas, with campaigning politicians promising they will ensure that the ban on hunting is lifted. "The argument is that if they are doing it in the United States, why can't we do it here?" said Ronis da Silveira, a professor of biology at the Federal University of Amazonas who is a leading expert on crocodilians.

No one knows exactly how many caimans now navigate Amazon waters. Asked for an estimate in an interview with the magazine Epoca, Eduardo Braga, governor of Amazonas, replied, "The only thing I can say is that the presence of the caiman is intimidating and immensely greater than the human population" of the state, which is 2.8 million.

The animals have become so plentiful that some fishermen have begun using caiman meat as bait to catch a particular catfish known as the vulture of the waters. Brazilians themselves refuse to eat the fish, so it is exported upriver to Colombia, where it is considered a delicacy.

Mr. Magnusson puts the total caiman population at "tens of millions," but government officials defend the hunting ban, arguing that to lift it would bring about a return of the same predatory practices that nearly drove the caiman into extinction in the first place. They say the campaign to resume hunting reflects the peasants' desire for more income and a prejudice that stems from mankind's ancestral fear of reptiles.

"Mosquitoes transmit malaria, which kills a lot more people than caimans ever have," said Henrique Pereira dos Santos, regional director of the government's environmental agency. "I think you have to take the semiotics of all this into account."

What may well be the largest concentration of crocodilians anywhere in the world can be found here at the Mamirauá Sustainable Development Reserve. "At this time of year, there are some places where the caiman concentrations are so thick that if they just sat there and didn't move, you could walk across their backs to dry land," Mr. Magnusson said.

At the reserve, which is supported in part by the Wildlife Conservation Society, the government now permits a limited harvest of caimans. One linear inch of the hide of the prized black caiman can be worth up to $25 on the international market if properly skinned, and the meat fetches 30 cents a pound. The skin of spectacled caimans goes for about $3 a square foot. But the program is still experimental, and scientists have doubts about extending it to other places.

"You can't allow hunting all over, only in particular areas and at certain times of year, where and when concentrations are the largest," cautioned Professor da Silveira, who is involved with the project. "You must be selective and at the same time convince the residents of the region that there is something in it for them, something of economic value, that the caiman is not just a pest."

A selective approach, however, does not appeal at all to Sebastião Batista Pereira, 46, a peasant who lives in a hut at the edge of the river a bit farther downstream. When water levels rose nearly to his front door during the latest rainy season, one caiman made off with a pig he had just bought while another came perilously close to his 78-year-old mother and youngest child as they were bathing at the river's edge.

"Look, I don't hunt the beast to take its meat or skin into the city to sell," Mr. Pereira said. "That would be abusive and a clear violation of the law. But I'll say this before any authority: if I come across a snake or a caiman on the trail, I'll kill it. What is worth more, the life of my children or of some animal, and a wild, violent beast at that?"

Lawmakers Seek Far Harsher Penalties For Steroids Users (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely, Usa Today

USA Today, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON — The chairman of the House Judiciary Committee plans to unveil a new proposal this week to crack down on steroid use in sports, another sign of the growing determination by Congress to impose tougher testing standards and penalties on pro sports.

Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., told USA TODAY he's co-authoring the bill with Rep. John Conyers, the top Judiciary Committee Democrat from Michigan. It would put the Justice Department in charge of developing "minimum standards" for testing and penalties. Participation in the program would be voluntary, but Sensenbrenner says there will be "incentives" to encourage pro sports leagues to sign up.

He did not elaborate on what those incentives might be. But in baseball's case the Judiciary Committee could threaten to lift the sport's antitrust exemption.

Lawmakers are returning to Congress this week for the first time since news broke of Baltimore Orioles star Rafael Palmeiro's 10-day suspension last month for steroid use. That has stoked many members' exasperation. "That's called a vacation; that's not a suspension," said Rep. Chris Shays, R-Conn.

Palmeiro testified under oath at a House Committee on Government Reform hearing in March that he never used steroids. Committee members and staffers have been examining records of his positive test provided by Major League Baseball to determine whether he could be prosecuted for perjury.

Two members who have seen the records, Reps. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., and Elijah Cummings, D-Md., say they think perjury charges against Palmeiro are unlikely. "It will be very difficult to prove," Cummings said. But information in the records, Cummings added, would frustrate lawmakers "even further."

The records have not been made public, but Waxman indicated he might push for that. "I don't know for sure, but I generally favor information being made public," he said.

Steroids news hits home

Cummings still lives in the west Baltimore neighborhood where he grew up and, like many natives of the Charm City, considers himself a diehard Baltimore Orioles fan.

But few lawmakers have been more critical of Palmeiro after news last month he tested positive for steroids. When the first baseman returned to the playing field on Aug. 11 after a 10-day suspension, Cummings said he was "bothered" that some in the crowd cheered him.

"Most of us are trying to set some kind of decent example for kids," says Cummings. "What kind of message is that sending?"

In Congress, frustration with professional sports in general, and Major League Baseball in particular, is growing. As they prepared to return to town this week from a month-long August recess, a number of Republican and Democratic lawmakers said the Palmeiro revelations would build momentum for federally mandated drug tests and penalties in pro sports.

"Obviously the current approach on steroids both in professional sports and amateur sports is not working," says Sensenbrenner.

The bill will be the sixth measure introduced in Congress this year to regulate steroids in pro sports. All of the bills have bipartisan support. All would impose much stiffer penalties than the one levied on Palmeiro.

DOJ_NMG_0002896

One, backed by Rep. Cliff Stearns, R-Fla., would require a half-season suspension for a first-time steroid offense. Four others — including one authored by Sen. Jim Bunning, R-Ky., a Hall of Fame pitcher — would impose a two-year ban for a first-time offense and a lifetime ban for a second.

The measure being authored by Sensenbrenner and Conyers would leave it up to the Justice Department to set penalty guidelines. Sensenbrenner doesn't think Palmeiro's suspension would be adequate. "My gut tells me that type of tap on the wrist would not meet the minimum standard," he says.

Obstacles abound

Fueling momentum for the legislation has been a feeling that Palmeiro's suspension was an affront to Congress. Appearing before a House committee in March, the Orioles slugger swore under oath he had never used steroids. "He got the confidence of all of us," Cummings said. "We thought he was a stand-up guy."

But there are obstacles to passage of a federal steroids testing bill, including Congress' busy fall agenda and internal fights over who should get credit for legislation.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., will push for the various bill sponsors to find "common ground," says his spokesman, Ron Bonjean. Waxman says it would be "pretty ridiculous" to let disputes among various bill sponsors stop the legislation.

"What we end up passing will probably be a blend of several proposals," Sensenbrenner says.

Sen. Chuck Grassley, an Iowa Republican, acknowledges "a reluctance to get involved in something traditionally left to baseball itself," but he argues that "baseball has had an opportunity to straighten up and they have used kid gloves." Echoing the sentiment of many lawmakers, Grassley said: "I think they are afraid of their union."

Greg Bouris, director of communications for the MLB Players Association, argues Palmeiro's suspension shows the current testing system is working. Bouris says the length of Palmeiro's suspension is irrelevant. "It's the outing, the public humiliation that the player is going to face that's going to be the ultimate deterrent."

Even so, he says union president Don Fehr has been visiting teams to discuss the possibility of changing the steroids policy with players. Commissioner Bud Selig has proposed a 50-game suspension for the first offense, 100 games for a second offense and lifetime ban for a third offense.

Members of Congress are skeptical. "I don't have a good feeling about either the baseball owners or the players," says Shays.

Congressman feels support

Cummings says very few of his constituents have complained about his tough stand on Palmeiro. "I've only had one person say, 'Lay off Raffy.' " Some comments have come from "diehard baseball fans" who are worried about the integrity of the games' records, Cummings says. Some have come from African-Americans who wonder "Why is it that a baseball player can commit a (drug) crime and make more money? If a guy in my community of West Baltimore were caught doing it, he'd go to jail," says Cummings.

But the congressman says his biggest supporters are "the soccer moms" who want to make sure athletic role models are worth emulating.

Says Cummings: "They're worried about their kids."

Palmeiro Goes Home, Booed And Injured (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

Filed at 7:43 p.m. ET

BALTIMORE (AP) -- Rafael Palmeiro was sent home to Texas to rehabilitate knee and ankle injuries, leaving his baseball future unclear during a season in which he was suspended for a positive steroids test.

Palmeiro's season unraveled soon after he collected his 3,000th career hit on July 15. He received a 10-day suspension on Aug. 1 for failing a drug test, and upon his return was booed by fans in Baltimore and on the road.

He is 2-for-26 with one RBI since coming back, and has been bothered the past two weeks by injuries to his left ankle and right knee. The Orioles still expect him to play this month, but decided Monday that the first baseman should go home to recover.

"It is in his and the Orioles best interests for Palmeiro to stay off the knee as much as possible to allow it to heal completely," the team said in statement. "At the same time, remaining with the team while unable to play has created an unnecessary distraction for both Palmeiro and the ballclub."

Palmeiro, who has not played since Tuesday in Toronto, left for Texas shortly after the Orioles' 6-2 loss to the Blue Jays on Monday.

"We will monitor him and bring him back at the end when he's ready," interim manager Sam Perlozzo said. "We definitely feel like he's going to play again this year. I'd like to see him get back for the last 10 days, anyway."

Things can't get much worse for Palmeiro, who's experiencing a one-of-a-kind season for all the wrong reasons.

"Everything just kind of crumbled, unexpectedly really. I never expected that anything would happen to me, not at this stage of my career anyway," he said before Monday's game. "I've played my whole career pretty much injury free. There's been no controversy in my life at all, on and off the field. I've always been a type of person that does it the right way and follows the rules and does the right thing for the most part."

This isn't the way Palmeiro, 40, wanted to go out. For that reason he's still considering coming back next season.

"Obviously, I would love to play and come back and finish and hopefully to prove to everyone that I can still play at a high level, that I can still be productive and do it the right way, which I've always done," he said. "I just don't know. I can't look that far ahead and predict what's going to happen. I would love to have that opportunity, but I have a lot of things to think about and a lot of things to weigh."

Ending his season at this point, however, is not in his immediate plans.

"Raffy doesn't want to shut it down yet. He doesn't want to walk away from this thing without playing again," Perlozzo said. "If he looks like he can help us with a couple of at-bats here and there, we'll see what happens."

In March, Palmeiro told Congress that he never took steroids. Upon receiving the suspension, Palmeiro insisted that he never intentionally took a banned performance-enhancing drug. When he returned, he said he would not address the case until Congress concludes its ongoing investigation on whether Palmeiro committed perjury with his testimony in March.

His decision on retirement won't be influenced by the backlash he has received since the suspension.

"If I had to make a decision right then, I probably wouldn't play," he said. "But I am not going to shy away from something like what happened to me like that. I am going to face it and I am going to do what I can. Hopefully, I can explain myself one day, and whether people believe me or not, I can't control that."

Palmeiro never wanted a farewell tour or a lavish ceremony before his final game. He always intended to make a decision over the offseason, which he will, but now must factor in the suspension, his injuries and a late-season slump that has dropped his batting average to .266 -- 23 points below his career mark.

"I wasn't going to make this huge announcement. I wasn't going to have a parade going out around the country at all the ballparks. That's not what I wanted to do," he said. "I wanted to sit down and make a good decision and feel good about it, like 'This is it, I am done, I enjoyed the ride and it's time to do something else.'

"But obviously, that's not going to happen."

Chiefs' Wellbourn Suspended For Steroids (WP/AP)

The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

KANSAS CITY, Mo. -- Kansas City Chiefs offensive lineman John Welbourn has been suspended for four games for violation of the league's steroid policy.

"John has been suspended," coach Dick Vermeil told The Associated Press on Saturday. "We are moving forward. I really can't say any more than that right now."

Welbourn, a reserve guard acquired from Philadelphia in 2004, played in Friday night's exhibition loss to St. Louis. He will not be eligible to practice during the suspension and may not play until the Oct. 16 game against Washington.

Vermeil said Friday night that Welbourn lost an appeal of his suspension.

"It doesn't matter if it was taken accidentally or something was in something he took that wasn't marked on the bottle," the coach told the Kansas City Star. "It doesn't matter. There's no tolerance and we'll have to live with that."

Eric Warfield, a starting cornerback, already has been suspended for the first four games for violation of the league's substance abuse policy.

Charges Dropped Against Husband Of Woman Who Claimed Cancer (AP)

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, September 3, 2005

SALT LAKE CITY -- Prosecutors have dropped the fraud charges against a man whose wife falsely claimed to have cancer and collected thousands of dollars in donations.

Salt Lake County prosecutors said Wednesday they no longer felt they could prove Drug Enforcement Agency officer Jeff James Clark was part of the scam perpetrated by his wife, Tania Clark.

Tania Clark, 32, who has pleaded guilty to felony counts of theft and theft by deception in Utah and Salt Lake counties, is taking sole responsibility for the crimes, said Deputy Salt Lake County District Attorney Robert Stott.

DOJ_NMG_0002898

Stott said the attorney for the woman said she would testify "she was the only one involved, and that her 36-year-old husband did not know anything about the fact that (her claims of illness) were false."

To prove the husband was involved in the scheme, prosecutors would have to prove that "he knew she didn't have cancer and he had intent to commit fraud," Stott said. "We don't think we have sufficient evidence to overcome that."

Jeff Clark's job status remains uncertain, DEA spokeswoman Karen Flowers said Thursday, and he remains on unpaid administrative leave.

Tania Clark was sentenced by a Utah County judge last month to probation and community service and was ordered to pay $5,800 in restitution.

Sentencing in Salt Lake County is set for Sept. 12 before 3rd District Judge Paul Maughan.

Tania Clark told family and friends she was dying of myeloma and needed $62,000 for a bone marrow transplant.This story appeared in The Daily Herald on page D3.

Greed Lured GIs Into Colombian Underworld (WP/AP)

By Kim Housego, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

BOGOTA, Colombia -- U.S. Army Staff Sgt. Daniel Rosas was deployed to Colombia as part of the large U.S. mission to fight drug trafficking, but before long he found the lure of cocaine money too hard to resist.

He formed a smuggling ring involving U.S. soldiers that was eventually busted, deeply embarrassing U.S. officials.

A deposition obtained by The Associated Press shows Rosas' scheme was so amateurish that at one point he made a deal with a stranger he met in a Mexican nightclub bathroom and even saw a $140,000 payment vanish in the mail. The authenticity of Rosas' sworn statement was recently confirmed by a Colombian official familiar with the case.

The document provides for the first time a detailed look into how the drug ring operated and shows that, with stunning ease, it was able to send 170 pounds of cocaine from Colombia to the United States, subject to only cursory searches at best from U.S. Customs agents.

"They never suspected that any military or civilian personnel would bring back contraband," Rosas said in the March 31 sworn statement to military investigators at Fort Bliss, Texas. "They did not use dogs, they very rarely checked our carryon bags but never checked our equipment that was loaded on the pallets."

U.S. Ambassador William Wood said in the wake of the arrests on March 28 that U.S. soldiers leaving Colombia would be subjected to stricter searches. The case infuriated many Colombians who said President Alvaro Uribe should revoke treaties granting immunity to U.S. soldiers serving in Colombia.

Rosas, 23, of McAllen, Texas, is behind bars awaiting court-martial along with two other U.S. soldiers.

A fourth soldier, Spc. Francisco Rosa, pleaded guilty on Aug. 10 to using, possessing and distributing cocaine and making a false official statement. He was sentenced to five years in prison, demoted to the rank of private and will receive a bad conduct discharge.

Rosas told military investigators he got involved in drug smuggling in the summer of 2003 when he struck up a friendship with Angel Gutierrez, a bartender at the officer's club in the Apiay military base southeast of Bogota, where he was stationed. Rosas said Gutierrez told him he could hold cocaine and drive it onto the base through the front gate.

"Greed overtook my state-of-mind. I saw an opportunity and took advantage of it," Rosas said, according to the sworn statement.

Rosas said he and two other Americans on the base _ Spc. Rolando Sandoval and a civilian defense contractor identified only as Jake _ pooled their money to buy about nine pounds of cocaine from Gutierrez for $12,000. Sandoval left the military before Rosas' arrest and it is unclear what happened to him and Jake.

Jake smuggled the cocaine to the United States in August 2003, then headed to Las Vegas to try to sell some of it _ but promptly disappeared.

"We never saw him again ... we never received any money from Jake," Rosas said.

When Rosas returned to Texas within a few weeks, he tried to sell the remaining two pounds. That amount normally fetches about $25,000 in the United States, but Rosas didn't know where to turn.

"I went to Juarez, Mexico, and while in the bathroom of a club I saw a guy snorting cocaine," Rosas said. He eventually sold the cocaine to the man for $6,500 at a Taco Bell in El Paso, Texas.

The money didn't last long.

"I spent $3,000 on partying and stuff of that nature," the soldier said.

On his next tour in Colombia, Rosas said he recruited three U.S. soldiers _ Rosa, Staff Sgt. Victor Portales and Staff Sgt. Kevin G. Irizarry-Melendez _ and they began smuggling much larger quantities of cocaine, according to the sworn statement.

DOJ_NMG_0002899

They wrapped sheets of fabric softener and plastic wrap around the cocaine, placed it inside zip-lock bags then put them inside coffee boxes. The drug shipments were loaded onto pallets with other gear then put aboard U.S. Air Force transport planes heading to Texas.

Once, two coffee boxes containing 35 pounds of cocaine vanished after it arrived at Fort Bliss. Rosas said he suspects a private working at the hangar found the cocaine and stole it.

Meanwhile, Rosas found connections in the drug-trafficking underworld in the United States. But that presented new problems.

One drug dealer, identified only as Gustavo, mailed $200,000 to Rosas' El Paso apartment in four boxes as payment for cocaine, but Rosas was not present to pick up two of the boxes, and they were sent to a forwarding address Gustavo had provided. Gustavo told Rosas he had made up the forwarding address. The two boxes were never found.

"I do not know where the boxes were sent to, nor where the money is at now," Rosas told the army investigators. "So basically, somebody received $140,000."

The sworn statement suggests informants finally broke up the smuggling operation.

Rosas said he shipped 134 pounds of cocaine between July 2003 and March 2005 to the United States and sold it for about $260,000. He said Irizarry-Melendez smuggled another 35 pounds, while the others mainly fronted money to buy the drugs.

Asked by the investigators how he felt after being caught, Rosas replied: "Disgraced, unfaithful, disloyal, saddened and I wish I never did it."

Gun Control Efforts Weaken In South (BOS)

By Alan Wirzbicki, Globe Correspondent

The Boston Globe, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Even as Boston struggles against a tide of smuggled handguns, some state governments in the South are loosening their gun control laws in ways that critics say will make it easier for traffickers to bring illegal firearms into the Northeast.

Under pressure from the National Rifle Association, South Carolina abolished a state law last year that limited to one the number of handguns individuals can buy in a month, a measure that was designed in 1975 to prevent trafficking.

Virginia, which was the epicenter of gun smuggling into New York and Boston before it passed a one-gun-per-month law in 1993, weakened that rule in 2004 and gun control advocates fear that it could soon be abolished.

Academic studies have shown that limits on monthly gun purchases help limit smuggling, but lobbyists for gun manufacturers call such laws "gun rationing" and say they infringe on Second Amendment gun ownership rights.

Over the past five years the overall trend on the state level has been toward lax gun laws, said David Hemenway, a professor at the Harvard School of Public Health who studies gun crime. That has left states such as Massachusetts and New York, which retain their strict gun limits, increasingly isolated.

When it is easy to buy firearms in neighboring states, Hemenway said, "it just makes it a lot harder for states with less permissive gun laws to keep guns out."

Urban jurisdictions in the Northeast have some of the most restrictive gun ownership laws in the country, though shootings in Boston were up 11 percent from last year, according to statistics obtained by the Globe.

Police seized 490 guns in Boston through Aug. 23, up from 380 in the same period last year and 294 in 2001. A large percentage of those guns originated from outside the region.

Last month, a South Carolina judge sentenced a Boston man to 24 years in federal prison for buying 21 guns in the state, which he resold illegally in Boston after removing their serial numbers.

Sergeant Thomas Sexton, a spokesman for the Boston Police Department, said the police were concerned that less restrictive gun laws in other states would fuel smuggling into the region.

"It is a concern that some of these other states are relaxing some of their gun laws," he said.

South Carolina Governor Mark Sanford, a Democrat, signed legislation ending that state's ban in May 2004. In Virginia, Democratic Governor Mark Warner, who may seek the party's 2008 presidential nomination, approved an exemption for gun owners with "right-to-carry" permits from the state's one-gun-a-month limit.

Pinpointing the precise source of guns smuggled into the Northeast is difficult, analysts say, because last year Congress inserted a provision into a spending bill that prevented the US Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms, and Explosives from releasing federal data about where guns used in violent crimes originated.

DOJ_NMG_0002900

The amendment, sponsored by US Representative Todd Tiahrt, a Kansas Republican, prohibited the ATF from releasing documents related to "traces" of guns. Local authorities can request traces for individual firearms to locate the owner of a stolen gun or in criminal investigations, but they don't have access to traces requested by other agencies.

As part of an ongoing lawsuit, the city of New York has subpoenaed the ATF over access to trace data, which New York police hope to use to identify rogue gun dealers.

Lawyers from the city sought trace reports to establish that many guns used to commit crimes come from the same sources.

A federal judge has ruled in favor of the city twice, but the ATF is still seeking to avoid turning over the traces.

In 1999, when the ATF last made some data from gun traces available, the report showed that Florida was the top source of handguns used by youth criminals in Massachusetts in 1997-98, accounting for 17.6 percent of crime. By comparison, only 14.7 percent of guns came from in-state.

Virginia, North Carolina, and Florida were the top three sources of crime guns for young people in New York City.

Brian Malte, outreach director of the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence, an antigun group, said that while the repeal of gun control laws was worrying, another problem is the many states that lack strong gun control laws to begin with.

"It's not like a South Carolina, that they've passed and then repealed the law," he said.

"They just never had the laws to begin with."

1.7M Kids At Home With Loaded Guns (USAT)

By Marilyn Elias

USA Today, September 6, 2005

About 1.7 million U.S. children live in homes with loaded, unlocked firearms, according to the largest survey ever done on home weapons storage, out today in the Pediatrics online journal (www.pediatrics.org).

James Mercy, researcher with the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, and colleague Catherine Okoro analyzed surveys of 224,000 adults done by health departments in 50 states and the District of Columbia during 2002.

One-third of adults have handguns, rifles or shotguns at home, says the CDC report. But states vary greatly in the percentage of adults who keep weapons, and in how many with children at home store their guns loaded and unlocked. The states with the highest percentage of adults who have children at home and leave guns unlocked and loaded are Alabama, Alaska, Arkansas, Idaho, Montana and Wyoming.

Eighteen states have laws dealing with proper storage of guns to limit access by children, says Jon Vernick, co-director of the Center for Gun Policy and Research at Johns Hopkins University's school of public health. But the laws vary in strictness — 7 states make it a felony under some circumstances to give minors access to weapons — and they vary in the ages of kids covered, he says.

There's little known about how well these laws are enforced, Vernick adds. “They're great, and we absolutely need more states with laws. But often they seem to get enforced after it's too late, when a child has shot himself or someone else.”

Two studies show accidental gun deaths and teen suicides decline in states with these laws, Vernick says.

The Pediatrics report says that of 1,400 children and teens shot to death in 2002, about 90% were home when it happened.

“It's a frightening problem,” says Michael Barnes, president of the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence, a lobbying group that favors limiting gun ownership.

The gun storage survey may underestimate kids with access to firearms, says CDC's Mercy, because women tend to underreport the presence of weapons at home, past studies show. About 60% of survey participants were women.

Gun ownership has declined in the past decade, says Barnes, because the USA is increasingly urban and fewer adults hunt.

Andrew Arulanandam, spokesman for the National Rifle Association of America, declined to comment on specific laws but says, “The sad reality is, you cannot legislate responsibility.”

Education is the best way to reduce gun accidents, and the NRA runs many education programs, he says. “Children are by nature curious and will try to seek out objects they shouldn't have. … It's up to the parents to see that firearms are stored safely.”

IMMIGRATION:

Fox Says U.S. Shares Blame For Problems Along Border (NYT)

By Ginger Thompson

DOJ_NMG_0002901

The New York Times, September 5, 2005

MEXICO CITY, Sept. 4 - President Vicente Fox responded over the weekend to criticism from American authorities about a recent surge in violence and illegal immigration along the border, saying that the United States shares responsibility for the problems and should work harder with Mexico to fix them.

Mr. Fox said he rejected "forcefully" the statements by the Bush administration and governors of border states, contending that they had unfairly depicted Mexico as a safe haven for organized crime, though his government has arrested more leading drug traffickers and dismantled more cartels than any of its predecessors. He also said Mexican immigrants had been portrayed unfairly as potential terrorists when they had in fact become a pillar of the American economy.

In an interview aboard the presidential airplane on Saturday, Mr. Fox acknowledged that his government had a long way to go to make the border secure. But he said the United States should stop casting blame for problems created by both countries.

He also said the United States should not allow concerns about border security to derail efforts to adopt new measures to allow millions of additional Mexicans to become guest workers in the United States.

"Security is a shared responsibility," President Fox said. Then, referring to the United States, he said, "I don't understand that now they only cast blame and accusations, and they do not collaborate or cooperate so that together we can resolve this problem."

On the changes in immigration policy, he said: "There is will on the part of President Bush, according to what he has expressed publicly, and what he has expressed in conversations with us. So, I trust that in the coming weeks and months, we will succeed finally in arriving at a positive resolution for the benefit of both countries."

More pressing realities, however, may once again stand in the way. Work on immigration policy was first postponed four years ago, after the Sept. 11 attacks. Then it was put off for Mr. Bush's re-election campaign. Now, it may be set aside again as the United States struggles to recover from Hurricane Katrina.

But Mr. Fox has little time left; he is entering his last year in office.

His comments were aimed at what many here perceive as a troubling shift in United States attitudes and diplomatic policy toward Mexico.

In recent weeks, the United States has openly berated Mexico for failing to stop a wave of drug-related violence that has taken close to 1,000 lives along the 2,000-mile border. The Bush administration has issued numerous travel advisories and temporarily closed its consulate in the city of Nuevo Laredo, which has turned into a murder capital as drug traffickers fight for control of lucrative routes into Texas.

Last month, the governors of New Mexico and Arizona declared states of emergency, saying they needed federal help to fend off a flood of undocumented migrants.

Neither Mr. Fox nor his aides denied the problems. But the authorities here said that the responses from the United States did not reflect the complexities of the problems, nor did they acknowledge that Mexico had undertaken significant efforts to address them.

"This self-sustained blaming someone else, is it going to help anything?" said a high-level intelligence official who asked not to be named because of the diplomatic sensitivities involved. "If everyone in the United States keeps profiting politically from this very difficult situation, then we are not going to be able to make things better." He added, "We are trying to do our job, even with our limited resources."

Mr. Fox said trade and other day-to-day interactions between the countries had not been affected by the political tensions, and he said he trusted that President Bush would not allow concerns over security to stall efforts to pass changes in immigration requirements.

"Let there be no doubt, that we are going to win this battle," he said, referring to his government's efforts in Nuevo Laredo. "So it cannot be used as a pretext to provoke a distancing in relations between the United States and Mexico."

He said his country shared the pain of the hurricane. An estimated 140,000 Mexicans were affected, he said, and 70,000 are unaccounted for. But now, he said, the contributions of Mexican workers could be more important than ever.

"The reconstruction of that city and of that region is going to require a lot of labor," Mr. Fox said of New Orleans, Mississippi and Alabama. "And if there is anything Mexicans are good at, it is construction."

Union Organizers At Poultry Plants In South Find Newly Sympathetic Ears (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

MORRISTOWN, Tenn. - Hour after hour, Antonia Lopez Paz said, her supervisor at the Koch Foods poultry plant here told women on the deboning line that production demands were so great that they could not go to the bathroom.

DOJ_NMG_0002902

Sometimes she developed acute pain because she could not go, Ms. Lopez said. And one time when another woman asked for permission, "the supervisor took off his hard hat and told her, 'You can go to the bathroom in this,' " said Ms. Lopez, a Mexican immigrant who moved to this town in East Tennessee three years ago, lured by the company's promise of year-round work.

Out of her solitary complaint has grown a thriving unionization drive that fits neatly into the plans of several insurgent unions that hope to revive the labor movement by focusing on low-wage workers and immigrant workers.

"We believe there is a need for a union to come in and help these workers," said Joe Hansen, president of the United Food and Commercial Workers, which is organizing workers at the two Koch Foods plants here. "The conditions in some of these places are criminal, especially in the way they treat undocumented workers, and it's criminal that they often get away with it."

This summer Mr. Hansen's union joined the Teamsters and the Service Employees International Union in breaking away from the A.F.L.-C.I.O., with those three unions promising to devote far more energy to recruiting workers than the rest of organized labor has. Two organizing drives aimed at poultry workers - one in this old factory town and the other in Russellville, Ala. - are among the early battles in this effort to reinvigorate labor.

As part of their new push, the insurgent unions say they will seek to build deep community support among local houses of worship, political leaders and immigrant groups. They also plan to lend organizers to one other's drives, something the food and commercial workers could use because it has few Spanish-speaking organizers in areas like Morristown, where the Hispanic population is soaring.

The 700 poultry workers here, most of them Mexicans, might seem ripe for organizing, but labor's efforts at resurgence face daunting obstacles. Companies often fight back tooth and nail, and many immigrants who are initially sympathetic to unions ultimately shy away, fearing that their employers might grow angry and fire them or have them deported.

"It's been extraordinarily difficult to organize factory workers - and that includes poultry workers - in the South," said Daniel Cornfield, a labor expert at Vanderbilt University in Nashville. "There's plenty of employer resistance in this neck of the woods. And then there's another problem - there's an unfamiliarity between unions and immigrants, far more so in the South than on the coasts. Unions here don't know much about the culture of immigrant workers, and then many immigrant workers are unfamiliar with U.S. labor unions."

But Ms. Lopez was the exception, knowing a good deal about American unions. The daughter of a migrant worker, she saw how the United Farm Workers helped her father when he harvested vegetables in Arizona.

Last April she quit Koch Foods because she was pregnant and the managers rejected her request to be transferred to a less rigorous position. Her job as a wing cutter was so arduous that she feared it would jeopardize her pregnancy.

Like many other workers, she disliked the 42-chickens-a-minute line speed. That pace means that many workers make 18,000 cuts during their eight-hour shifts as they prepare breasts, wings, tenders and cutlets for restaurants and consumers.

"What I didn't like is they would yell at us and tell us we're good for nothing and we didn't know how to work, and sometimes they wouldn't even let us leave to go home when we were sick," Ms. Lopez said as she nursed her month-old son. "We need to convince people to join the union, that they shouldn't be afraid because the union is the only way to make things better and stop them from mistreating at us."

Officials with Koch Foods declined requests to be interviewed. But at proceedings that the Tennessee Occupational Safety and Health Administration held in response to Ms. Lopez's bathroom complaint, Koch representatives said their supervisors were attentive to workers' concerns and gave adequate bathroom breaks.

Several Koch workers said the bathroom break situation improved after the unionization drive began, although some workers said problems remained. In August the state's safety administration dismissed their complaints for lack of evidence.

After Ms. Lopez quit, the unionization drive continued to gain momentum, fueled by the complaints about mistreatment and low wages. The top pay is $7.55 an hour, even for employees there a decade.

"That level of pay is a misery, an embarrassment, considering how hard we work," said Ernestina Gonzalez, who earns the top wage and said she could not afford the premiums for the health insurance the company offers.

In northwest Alabama, 280 miles to the west, workers at the Gold Kist plant in Russellville voice similar complaints about line speed, wages and bathroom breaks. But many Gold Kist employees also complain about how injuries are handled. Most of the plant's 1,500 workers are Hispanic, but there are also many blacks and whites.

One day last December, Delores Smith slipped on a greasy metal plate. Ms. Smith, who prepares boxes to hold processed chickens, crashed to the floor and was in agony, certain that she had broken her right ankle.

She said Gold Kist's nurse did not even look at her ankle and told her that she must have sprained some ligaments and should take ibuprofen and go home. After a supervisor took her to her car, Ms. Smith looked at her ankle and saw pieces of bone protruding through her sock. When her son took her to the emergency room, X-rays showed that her ankle was broken in three places.

DOJ_NMG_0002903

Ms. Smith still limps slightly, but now she has another health crisis. Her job involves removing folded-up boxes that workers upstairs send to her via a chute. Those boxes often tumble out, and one day in July the boxes knocked her eyeglasses to the floor, breaking the frames.

Looking comical in her taped-together glasses, Ms. Smith said: "They sent me home for the day, saying it was my fault. I also got a write-up. My glasses can't even be fixed."

At first, Gold Kist refused to pay for new glasses, which she said would cost $378. With her base wage of $8.40 an hour, that would exceed her weekly pay. Workers who do not arrive late or miss a day for a whole week receive a 75-cent-an-hour bonus.

The company, she said, has now offered to pay $38 toward the glasses. She hopes to get some more from workers' compensation.

Ms. Smith said she and the two other workers in her unit often could not go to the bathroom for hours at a time because the pace was so demanding and there was nobody to replace them.

"They don't respect us at all," she said. "That's why I'm praying for a union."

Yurken Pozo, who quit in early August, said Gold Kist was campaigning hard against unionization.

"They gathered the workers together and kept telling us: 'We don't need a union. The union will only take your money. The union doesn't help anybody,' " Mr. Pozo said.

Wayne Lord, Gold Kist's vice president for corporate relations, said the company's policy was to provide workers with needed bathroom breaks. He voiced surprise about Ms. Smith's health care complaints, saying Gold Kist had a telephone line that employees could call anonymously to report problems about bathroom breaks or medical treatment.

Gold Kist has long told employees why it thinks unions are unnecessary, Mr. Lord said. That practice helped persuade the Russellville workers to vote down a union twice in the 1990's.

"We believe our wages are competitive," Mr. Lord said. "We strive everyday to do the right thing by our employees."

The union is collecting signatures from workers and may soon ask for recognition from the company or for a unionization vote.

Back in Morristown, the Koch poultry workers are so united behind a union and have generated so much community support that they persuaded Koch to pledge not to mount an anti-union campaign. Several workers spoke at churches, and ministers, congregants and community groups wrote letters to the company backing unionization. The workers at Koch's kill plant and deboning plant are expected to approve unionization in mid-September.

"What Koch did is an important precedent," said Anita Grabowski, coordinator of the Poultry Workers Justice Project, a nonprofit group based in Austin, Tex. "This new model of community unionism is a way to help rebuild the labor movement, even in a hostile climate."

Feds Say Telecom Tycoon Trying To Move Assets From Jail (LEGALT)

By Jason McLure, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 5, 2005

Even from jail, Walter Anderson, the D.C. telecom tycoon accused of concealing $450 million from the Internal Revenue Service, continued to try to hide money overseas, federal prosecutors say.

On Aug. 24, prosecutors filed in court a transcript of a taped jailhouse phone call from Anderson to an overseas business associate that they say shows him trying to move assets beyond the government's reach. On March 22, Anderson placed a collect call to the associate from the D.C. Correctional Treatment Facility to discuss moving an investment from a Cayman Island company to a blind trust on the Isle of Man.

In the transcript, Anderson says Chadbourne & Parke corporate attorney Hwan Kim was advising him on the offshore deal. "I had a meeting with my attorney, Hwan Kim," Anderson says in the call. "I explained to him the logic that we were trying to create some full separation. He understands completely what we're trying to do. He said that there are a number of different ways to do it . . . he simply suggested that if you could decide which lawyer you want to do it on your side, he'll see if his firm has somebody appropriate to do it on the other side." Moments later, Anderson tells the business associate: "The main thing we have to make sure [is] it's reversible, in some way . . . so that when we clean up the mess, we can reverse it." The transcript makes no mention of how much money would be involved.

Kim did not return calls, but a Chadbourne spokesman issued a statement saying: "[W]e do not and have not represented Orbital Recovery [the Cayman company mentioned in the transcript] and, therefore, have not advised them on any transaction, domestic or foreign, Isle of Man or elsewhere."

Kim previously worked at Swidler Berlin, a firm that advised Anderson's companies for more than a decade. Kim's partner at Chadbourne, Abbe Lowell, is representing Anderson in the criminal tax case.

The new filing comes just as Lowell asked to be dismissed from the matter, saying Anderson owes $1 million in fees. A hearing is set for Sept. 6.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Buying Time With Quick Action On The Court And A Second Trip To The South (NYT)

By Todd S. Purdum

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 5 - By 7:15 Monday morning, President Bush was meeting in the Oval Office with Judge John G. Roberts Jr. to offer him the nomination for the 17th chief justice of the United States. On most Mondays, that might be a good day's work, but Mr. Bush's Labor Day was just beginning, and not everything else about it was quite so crisp or well timed.

On the White House lawn, Marine One was waiting to take Mr. Bush on the first leg of his second trip in three days to inspect the devastation left by Hurricane Katrina in Louisiana and Mississippi. He traded a suit and tie for slacks and a soft-blue sports shirt, and flew straight into a thicket of continuing recriminations over his administration's handling of the disaster and into an awkward dance with the Democratic governor of Louisiana over who would command relief efforts.

"We're going to show the world once again that not only we will survive, but we'll be stronger and better for it, when it's all said and done, that amidst this darkness, there is light," Mr. Bush said at the emergency operations center in Baton Rouge, La. It was a line that echoed William Faulkner and the Bible, meant to bring hope and comfort to the displaced and the desperate.

But just how well Mr. Bush would endure the political challenges posed by the hurricane, much less prevail over them, remained a question on Monday. He assured a crowd at a makeshift shelter at the Bethany World Prayer Center in Baton Rouge, "This is a project that not only deals with the immediate; we're going to have to deal with the long term as well."

In elevating the nomination of Judge Roberts from associate justice to fill the Supreme Court seat left vacant by the death of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, Mr. Bush acted with typical dispatch and self-assurance to address one of the immediate and unexpected challenges that landed on his desk, perhaps turning it into an opportunity. Judge Roberts, a former Rehnquist law clerk, has already drawn considerable praise, from both parties, for his intellect and acumen. And though some Senate Democrats were quick to suggest that the scrutiny would be greater in considering him for chief justice, his eventual confirmation would not seem to be in any significant doubt.

That means Mr. Bush may well have a chief justice, firmly in Chief Justice Rehnquist's conservative mold, in place by the time the court reconvenes on the first Monday in October, with time to consider - and perhaps calibrate - the more politically delicate task of choosing a successor for Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who has been the court's swing vote on contentious issues like abortion, affirmative action and religion.

It also buys Mr. Bush a bit of time to untangle the aftermath of the hurricane, a job that his trip on Monday suggested might take a while, as the images of suffering continued to dominate television news coverage during the long holiday weekend. The challenge for the president is to repair the political damage caused by the government's slow response to the disaster and to counter the sense that his initial flyover in Air Force One on the way home from vacation and his on-the-ground visit to the region last Friday had sounded some sour notes - all without looking political.

That proved not so easy on Monday, after a weekend of behind-the-scenes finger pointing between administration officials and state and local leaders over who was to blame for the inadequacy of initial relief efforts. Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco of Louisiana has been at odds with administration officials over whether to federalize the National Guard in her state, and her aides said she learned of Mr. Bush's latest visit only from early morning news reports, then rearranged her schedule to make a couple of joint appearances with him.

Having been faulted by some as not spending enough time last week with black victims of the flooding in New Orleans, Mr. Bush was flanked at one point on Monday by prominent blacks, including Mayor Kip Holden of Baton Rouge and Bishop T. D. Jakes, a prominent Pentecostal minister from Dallas who has been courted by the White House in efforts to reach out to black voters.

William Kristol, the conservative publisher of The Weekly Standard, said of Mr. Bush: "I do think people think he could have showed stronger leadership." But Mr. Kristol expressed doubt that the hurricane would have much lasting effect on the president's personal and political fortunes, because "people are capable of saying, 'The president kind of screwed this one up, but I still basically agree with him.'"

Mr. Kristol added, "I think the Clinton administration would have done a better job in handling Hurricane Katrina, but I'm also glad Bush is president and not a Democrat."

For their part, Democrats on Capitol Hill wasted no time in pressing their advantage over a wounded president, repeatedly urging a delay in Judge Roberts's confirmation hearings until at least after Chief Justice Rehnquist's funeral on Wednesday, and demanding a postponement of Republicans' plans to take up one of Mr. Bush's longstanding goals, the repeal of the estate tax, in the Senate.

"Moving to the estate tax would be a travesty on top of a tragedy," said Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader.

It was a charge to which Mr. Reid's Republican counterpart, Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, effectively pleaded no contest late Monday, announcing a delay in addressing that issue. Mr. Frist also said the Homeland Security Committee would convene hearings to review the "weaknesses and strengths" of the federal response to the hurricane and to "apply the lessons learned."

But there is a risk for Democrats, too, in appearing too political, a reality that former President Bill Clinton acknowledged on Monday, saying, "I just think right now we need to focus on the suffering of the people and how to alleviate it and where to go from here."

Mr. Bush's father, the first President Bush, who has teamed up at the president's request with Mr. Clinton to raise money for hurricane victims, reflected on the criticism on Monday.

"The president can take it," the elder Mr. Bush said. But, he told reporters at a news conference with Mr. Clinton in Houston, "As a father? I don't like it," adding, "It goes with the territory."

The criticism has been visibly irritating to the president, a man capable of public displays of great tenderness whose resoluteness after the Sept. 11 attacks rallied the nation. On Monday, as he left the heavily damaged town of Poplarville, Miss., Mr. Bush insisted to local residents: "I understand. I understand the damage. I understand the devastation. I understand the destruction. I understand how long it's going to take. And we're with you."

Once more, Mr. Bush is hoping the people will be with him.

UPDATE 1-Bush: U.S. Will "do What It Takes" After Katrina (REU)

By Tabassum Zakaria

Reuters, September 5, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La., Sept 5 (Reuters) - President George W. Bush, under fierce criticism for his government's slow response to Hurricane Katrina, promised on Monday that the U.S. would "do what it takes" to help victims of the devastating storm get back on their feet.

Bush was on his second visit to Louisiana and Mississippi, where the storm has caused one of the biggest humanitarian crises in U.S. history. On his first tour on Friday, five days after the huge scale of the disaster became apparent, the president acknowledged the initial relief effort had been "unacceptable."

"If it's not right, we're going to fix it, and if it is right, we're going to keep doing it. And this is just the beginning of a huge effort," Bush pledged after meeting disaster relief officials at an emergency operations center in Baton Rouge.

He added: "This is one of the disasters that will test our soul, and test our spirits."

At the Bethany World Prayer Center, where dozens of evacuees are being cared for, Bush was with Dallas religious broadcaster T.D. Jakes and Baton Rouge Mayor Kip Holden, who are both black, as he spoke to reporters.

Some black leaders have accused relief officials of not taking the crisis seriously enough because many of its victims are poor and black.

Bush has been under fire from Democrats and Republicans alike for a sluggish federal response to a flood that has made hundreds of thousands homeless and is feared to have killed several thousands along the northern Gulf of Mexico coast.

Bush has not publicly singled out anyone for criticism although there has been some finger-pointing between state, federal and local authorities. "All levels of government are doing the best they can," Bush said.

The outcry has triggered a major political crisis for Bush, already suffering from the lowest public approval ratings of his presidency, largely because of the war in Iraq.

"He's doing good now, I guess, since he came down to see it for himself," said one evacuee at the prayer center, Milton Beverly of Jefferson Parish, Louisiana.

Some victims at the center were still sleeping on mattresses on the floor when Bush and his wife Laura arrived.

DOJ_NMG_0002906

The crowd quickly grew around Bush when the survivors realized the president had come to see them.

"We've got a lot of work to do," Bush told them.

"We can help save lives once a person finds a shelter such as this," he said. "The response of this country has been amazing." He said the country would "do what it takes" to help people get back on their feet.

He signed T-shirts, hugged women holding babies and sat on a bed next to pregnant Ailisa Eugene, of Metairie, Louisiana.

Bush Makes Return Visit; Two Levees Secured (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller And Clyde Haberman

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

As criticism raged over the federal government's response to Hurricane Katrina, President Bush returned to the region yesterday, and Army engineers patched up two levees that had been breached by the storm and cautiously began pumping water out of New Orleans.

Mr. Bush comforted victims in Poplarville, Miss., and Baton Rouge, La., but he found himself ensnared in a dispute with Louisiana's Democratic governor, Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, who learned of Mr. Bush's trip from news reports.

"There's a lot of work to be done," Mr. Bush told a group of mostly black victims at a makeshift shelter, the Bethany World Prayer Center, in Baton Rouge. He said that Americans' response to the disaster had been "amazing" and that "this country is going to be committed to doing what it takes to help people get back on their feet."

The president's trip, an effort to calm the region and part of a major White House campaign to stem the political damage from the hurricane, came as rescue teams in New Orleans searched for thousands of residents who remained in the city, many having ignored pleas to evacuate. The city's No. 2 police official, W. J. Riley, said his officers were trying to convince people that staying behind was pointless because "this city has been destroyed, completely destroyed."

As has been true for days, the death toll was assumed to be disastrously high, but estimates remained little more than guesses - perhaps educated, perhaps not. Officially, the Louisiana toll climbed to 71. The mayor of New Orleans, C. Ray Nagin, said the figure might well reach 10,000.

But there was some positive news yesterday. Army engineers said that after having dumped hundreds of bags filled with cement, sand and pieces of ruined roadways, they had closed the breach in the levee at the London Avenue Canal.

Late yesterday afternoon, state officials said that another crucial levee, on the 17th Street Canal, had also been patched up.

With those barriers at least temporarily restored, engineers began draining the flooded streets and sending the water back into Lake Pontchartrain, but carefully, using portable pumps set up at near the lake on the 17th Street canal. Gregory E. Breerwood, a city engineer, said, "We intend to take it slowly so we don't overtax the pumps themselves, because they have not been in service for a while."

West of the city, in Metairie, residents were permitted to return, if only for a day, to salvage what they could from their flooded houses.

In Baton Rouge, Governor Blanco greeted Mr. Bush as he arrived, but only after her press secretary called to alert her at 6 a.m. as she waited on a plane to take off from Baton Rouge for Houston. The press secretary, Denise Bottcher, said in an interview that she had first learned that Mr. Bush would be in Baton Rouge from news reports late Sunday and early yesterday, even though CNN had been reporting the president's trip to an unspecified location in Louisiana as early as Saturday.

"We're so busy, I can't sit down to watch TV," Ms. Bottcher said, adding. "Why should I get that news from CNN?"

Ms. Bottcher said she then called the White House yesterday morning, "and they extended an invitation."

Dana Perino, a White House spokeswoman, said the White House reached out to Ms. Blanco's office on Sunday and made contact with her yesterday morning.

Ms. Blanco and Mr. Bush have been at odds over the deployment of the National Guard in Louisiana, and both sides pointed fingers. On Friday night, Ms. Blanco refused to sign an agreement proposed by the White House to share control of National Guard forces in the state with federal authorities. "She would lose control when she had been in control from the very beginning," Ms. Bottcher said on Sunday.

The Times-Picayune, Louisiana's largest newspaper, published an open letter to Mr. Bush on Sunday that called for the firing of every official at the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

"We're angry, Mr. President, and we'll be angry long after our beloved city and surrounding parishes have been pumped dry," said the newspaper, which endorsed Mr. Bush for president in 2000 but made no endorsement in 2004.

At the Bethany World Prayer Center in Baton Rouge, the president's first stop of the day yesterday, some evacuees from the hurricane ran up to meet with Mr. Bush, but many hung back and looked on. One of them, Mildred Brown, who had been at the shelter since Tuesday, told The Associated Press: "I'm not star-struck; I need answers. I'm not interested in hand-shaking. I'm not interested in photo ops. This is going to take a lot of money."

One evacuee from New Orleans, Richard Landres, a lumberyard worker, was more positive about Mr. Bush. "I think he's doing what he can do," Mr. Landres said, according to a White House pool report.

Mr. Bush was flanked as he spoke by Mayor Kip Holden of Baton Rouge and T. D. Jakes, a conservative African-American television evangelist with a megachurch in Dallas who has been courted by the White House as a partner in reaching out to the black vote.

"I want to thank my friend T. D. Jakes for rallying the armies of compassion to help somebody like the mayor," Mr. Bush said.

Later in Baton Rouge, Mr. Bush spoke for an hour and a half with Ms. Blanco and members of Louisiana's Congressional delegation in a meeting that Ms. Bottcher described as "very positive" and that other participants called blunt. The elected officials said Mr. Bush mostly listened.

Representative Bobby Jindal, a Republican who represents New Orleans, said afterward that while the tone of the meeting was polite, "there was a lot of frustration."

"It was not hostile," Mr. Jindal said. "It was honest."

The trip was Mr. Bush's third survey of the region in the past week. He was in New Orleans and Biloxi, Miss., on Friday, and he flew over the area in Air Force One as he returned from an extended vacation on Wednesday.

Scott McClellan, the White House press secretary, said Mr. Bush did not go to New Orleans yesterday because he had visited it on Friday. On that visit, however, he did not go to the Superdome or the convention center, where tens of thousands of largely poor and black victims had been desperate for food and water for days, and some older evacuees had died in their wheelchairs. Mr. Bush did speak at the New Orleans airport and visit the repair work under way at the 17th Street Canal, where he met with workers, some of whom had lost their homes.

Mr. McClellan also said Mr. Bush steered clear of New Orleans yesterday because he did not want to disrupt continuing relief efforts.

"Today, he wanted to visit citizens of New Orleans who have been evacuated and are in need of continued assistance, as well as volunteers who are helping them," Mr. McClellan said in an e-mail message.

Yesterday afternoon, Mr. Bush spoke at a community college to residents of Poplarville, a small town about 40 miles inland that was badly hit by tornadoes accompanying the hurricane, then took a walking tour of a suburban street. Branches and trees littered the sides of roads, and electricity was still out, with water coming back slowly, but the damage was nothing like the destruction Mr. Bush saw on Friday in Biloxi.

"Out of this despair is going to come a vibrant coast," Mr. Bush told the crowd at the Pearl River Community College. "I understand if you're saying to yourself, 'Well, it's hard for me to realize what George W. is saying because I've seen the rubble and I know what has happened to my neighbors.' But I'd like to come back down here in about two years and walk your streets and see how vital this part of the world is going to be."

Some residents said Mr. Bush's visit to Poplarville had lifted their spirits. "He said the worst was going to be over," said Dawn Stuit, 48, a real estate agent, who had spoken to the president on the street and said that he had kissed her cheek. She said she was feeling better yesterday because her electricity would be restored soon. "I think the president visiting had something to do with the power coming back on," she said.

Other residents viewed the president's visit with anger. "If it takes them a week to figure out that people need food and water, maybe they need to step back and fire themselves," said Robert Duke, 43, waiting in a gas line in Poplarville. "Some of them need to go to jail over this."

In New Orleans, the city took a few slow steps on the arduous journey toward recovery. Power was even restored in some neighborhoods.

Mayor Nagin, who had raged against the federal government days ago for what he called its slow response to the crisis, struck a more positive tone, despite his estimate of the large number of dead. "We're making great progress now," he said on the "Today" program on NBC. "The momentum has picked up. I'm starting to see some critical tasks being completed."

After days of looting and reports of murders and rapes, the New Orleans police and military troops asserted control. "We continue in lockdown," said Mr. Riley, assistant police superintendent. "I feel the city is very secure," he said. "Chaos is moving to being organized chaos. It's better now."

A major issue, he said, is clearing the city of remaining residents to prepare for the cleanup. "Our officers are telling people there's absolutely no reason to stay," Mr. Riley said. "There are no homes to go to, there's no hotels."

Social services officials in Louisiana said yesterday that about 114,000 people had taken refuge in shelters stretching from West Virginia to Utah. The largest number, 54,000, remained in Louisiana, but almost as many were in Texas. Officials also said that in the last three days they had received 90,000 applications for food stamps from hurricane victims. Typically, they said, they process 1,300 applications a day.

Long-term problems facing people along the Gulf of Mexico were raised by former Presidents George Bush and Bill Clinton. As in the aftermath of the Asian tsunami, they were asked by President Bush to help raise money for evacuees.

"Recovery is going to take years," former President Bush said in Houston as he and Mr. Clinton announced the creation of a new fund.

Mr. Clinton touched on the need to find jobs for people who had left their homes. "One of the things we have to ask is: What could we do to give incentives for people to get jobs where they have to relocate," he said. "A lot of these people will be out of their homes a year or more."

Bush, Blanco Reveal Strained Relationship (AJC/AP)

By Jennifer Loven, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 6, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La. — Like estranged in-laws at a holiday gathering, President Bush and Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco kept their distance as both toured a relief center for storm victims Monday. At their next stop, the Republican president kissed the Democratic governor on the cheek, but it wasn't clear whether they had made up.

State and federal officials are all facing public criticism for a slow response to the crisis. Behind the scenes, each suggests the other is to blame.

In front of the cameras during Bush's visit to the Gulf Coast states on Monday, the president and Blanco said little to each other, focusing instead on thanking relief workers.

"I know I don't need to make any other introduction other than `Mr. President,'" Blanco said tersely, turning the microphone over to Bush after praising emergency management officials during a stop with Bush at an emergency operations center.

"This is one of these disasters that will test our soul and test our spirit, but we're going to show the world once again that not only can we survive but we will be stronger and better for it," Bush said after taking the microphone.

Blanco late Monday sought to tone down suggestions of a rift.

"We'd like to stop the voices out there trying to create a divide," she said. "There is no divide. We're all in this together. Every leader in this nation wants to see this problem solved."

Bush echoed Blanco's praise for rescue workers. "I hope that makes you feel good to know you have saved lives," Bush said, promising state, local and federal officials that he would fix anything that isn't going right. "This is just the beginning of a huge effort," he said.

The president, looking choked up as he finished his brief remarks, nodded at Blanco and kissed her on the cheek. She nodded back and both left the podium, headed for separate spots in the crowd.

Blanco has refused to sign over control of the National Guard to the federal government and has turned to a Clinton administration official, former Federal Emergency Management Agency chief James Lee Witt, to help run relief efforts.

Blanco was not told when Bush would visit the state, nor was she immediately invited to meet him or travel with him. Blanco's office didn't know Bush was coming until told by reporters. Bush spokesman Scott McClellan said the White House reached out to Blanco's office on Sunday, but didn't hear back. White House staff in Louisiana spoke with Blanco early Monday, he said.

Making his third visit to the Hurricane Katrina-ravaged states, Bush stopped first at the Bethany World Prayer Center, a huge hall half covered with pallets and half filled with dining tables. Blanco visited at the same time, but she and Bush kept apart as they walked around talking to people.

During his stop at Bethany, several people ran up to meet Bush and get autographs as he and first lady Laura Bush wandered around the room. But just as many hung back and looked on.

"I need answers," said Mildred Brown, who has been there since Tuesday with her husband, mother-in-law and cousin. "I'm not interested in handshaking. I'm not interested in photo ops. This is going to take a lot of money."

Bush hasn't gone a day without a public event devoted to the storm and its aftermath. But none of those trips so far — nor appearances by several Cabinet members in the region — has quieted complaints that Washington's response to the disaster has been sluggish. Congress already plans hearings on the response.

Bush's trip Monday was his third inspection tour, the second by ground. Last week, he had his pilot lower Air Force One, the presidential jet, to an altitude of about 2,500 feet as he flew over the area. Last Friday, he walked a neighborhood in Biloxi on Mississippi's coast and stopped at the airport and a breached levee in New Orleans.

By contrast, Baton Rouge, about 80 miles northwest of New Orleans, largely escaped damage. Its population, however, has swelled dramatically with displaced people and is experiencing clogged roads and supply shortages.

On Monday afternoon, Bush headed to Poplarville, Miss., to meet with Republican Gov. Haley Barbour and other state and local officials at the Pearl River Community College. The city is about 45 miles inland, but the area was in the path of Katrina's eye and the town and surrounding rural areas suffered enormous devastation.

Bush said he understood his optimism about the region's recovery is hard for others to share: "It's easy for me to say that I can see a better tomorrow because I haven't been living through what you are living, but I do," he said.

On Bush's last stop of the day, he walked a middle-class Poplarville street of tidy ranch homes and commiserated with residents. Unlike many other places in the hurricane zone, the homes were intact, with downed trees and power lines the only evidence of the storm.

Bush has come under fire for waiting two days after Katrina hit — and a day after levee breaks drowned New Orleans and turned it into a place of lawless misery — to return to Washington from his August break in Texas to oversee the federal response.

It took several days for food and water to reach the tens of thousands of desperate New Orleans residents who took shelter in the increasingly squalid and deadly Superdome and city convention center. Outlying areas suffered some of the same problems.

Officials are reporting progress and new worries.

Russ Knocke, a Department of Homeland Security spokesman, said at least 22,800 people have been rescued — more than four times the number the Coast Guard usually saves in a year.

At least 155,000 people have been evacuated from the stricken areas, most of them now housed in some 560 shelters, he said. More than 60,000 civilian and military personnel are assisting.

Hundreds of federal health officers and nearly 100 tons of medical supplies were sent to try to head off disease, feared because of hot weather, mosquitos and standing water holding human waste, corpses and other contaminants.

In Houston, former Presidents George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton announced a nationwide fundraising campaign to help hurricane victims.

New Orleans Mayor Says Death Toll Could Be 10,000 (LAT)

By Ellen Barry, Scott Gold And David Zucchino

The Los Angeles Times, September 6, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Tens of thousands of residents today returned to suburban New Orleans to view what was left of their lives, a week after Hurricane Katrina dealt the Gulf Coast a deadly blow.

President Bush took his second tour of region, hoping to calm days of criticism that the federal government acted too slowly in dealing with the tragedy that New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin said could have cost 10,000 lives. There were also reports of a dangerous bacterial infection spread by contaminated saltwater.

Accompanying Bush was Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, who along with Nagin has been a fierce critic of the federal effort. Bush planted a kiss on the governor's cheek, but their staffs continued their wrangling.

The Army Corps of Engineers announced that it had repaired one of the levees that had shattered last week, turning this low-lying city into a polluted lake. Today, officials estimated that most of the city remained underwater. But they were hoping to start the pumps soon that would begin drying out and restoring life to the city that has become a soggy ghost town with almost all its half a million residents evacuated to shelters elsewhere.

Between 20,000 and 30,000 evacuees from suburban Jefferson Parish, just outside New Orleans, returned to their homes at dawn today, taking advantage of an offer by parish officials to stay for four days.

Thousands came supplied with coolers crammed with food and water to sustain them until parish sheriff's deputies force everyone to leave again Thursday.

The parish's move, which was criticized by some parish officials as too dangerous, began at 6 a.m. sharp, when police removed cruisers that had blocked a four-lane highway at the western edge of the parish. The residents, most of whom had slept in their cars on a highway Sunday night, sped into the township, eager to see their homes since evacuating a week ago.

Swerving past toppled trees and downed power lines, most found their homes intact. The parish, the second-largest in the state with 480,000 residents, was spared the widespread flooding that left more than 80% of adjacent New Orleans underwater. About 15% of the parish was flooded, said parish Councilman Chris Roberts.

Although some homes are underwater, Roberts said, most are intact. Thousands lost sections of roofs and siding, and many were struck by falling trees and limbs. Electricity, phones and water have been knocked out, and stores have been looted. Even so, the scale of destruction and displacement was far less than in New Orleans.

DOJ_NMG_0002910

The residents' return came as parish officials were condemning the Federal Emergency Management Agency and other national and state relief organizations for failing to offer assistance. On Monday, a week after the hurricane, the parish still had not received outside aid, officials said.

Charges that federal officials have let down the region have become more frequent in recent days as the scale of the catastrophe has become clearer. Since Monday, when Katrina made landfall in the gulf, estimates of the death toll have steadily risen as has the cost of damage.

New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin said on NBC's "Today" that "it wouldn't be unreasonable to have 10,000" dead.

Estimates of the cost are around $25 billion in insurance claims and a like amount to repair infrastructure like highways, water supplies and sewage plants in more than four Southern states. There are no figures for caring for the hundreds of thousands of refugees made homeless by the storm or for the lost incomes, schooling and destroyed lives.

Cleanup in some places could take months. New Orleans is expected to remain empty for weeks until the water is removed.

Facing what is shaping up as one of the nation's worst disasters, President Bush again insisted that the government was doing what it could.

"I think all levels of government are doing the best they can," Bush said when asked about the federal response during a visit to Bethany World Prayer Center in Baton Rouge. "The response of this country is amazing."

When the president and his wife, Laura, arrived, some of the 200 evacuees were still sleeping, wrapped in quilts and lying on mattresses on the floor. But the crowd quickly grew.

"Laura and I have come back down here to let the good people of this region know there's a lot of work to be done, and we're going to get it done," Bush said.

It was a message that Bush has been pressing for days, during a trip to the region last week and a visit to the Red Cross in Washington over the weekend.

Today, he also tried to spread hope and blessings to workers and the Emergency Operations Center in Baton Rouge and to refugees at the Pearl River Community College in Poplarville, Miss.

"So let me conclude by asking for God's blessings on you all, and your families and friends, and let you know we're here for the long term," he said in Mississippi. "I understand. I understand the damage. I understand the devastation. I understand the destruction. I understand how long it's going to take. And we're with you. That's what I want you to know."

His comments were similar to those he made in Louisiana.

"This is one of these disasters that will test our soul and test our spirit," he said. "We're going to show the world, once again, that not only we will survive, but that we will be stronger and better for it when it's all said and done, that amid this darkness, there is light.

"And I want to thank you all for providing light, immediate light to people who needed help," he told the emergency workers. "You make your state and your local governments and your country proud."

The president returned to the White House later in the day.

While Bush was praising in public, behind the scenes there were simmering disputes about who was in charge and whether enough had been done. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff minimized reports of bureaucratic infighting during a news conference today in New Orleans.

Army Lt. Gen. Russel Honore, who has emerged as a hero for cutting red tape to bring food and water to evacuees waiting for days in the city's inadequate shelters, used profane language to dismiss the charges at the same news conference.

Today, officials at the Centers for Disease Control said some of the refugees have contracted a bacterial disease called vibrio vulnificus. It may have been picked up by people with open wounds who were forced to wade through badly polluted waters for long periods of time.

Vibrio vulnificus is a more benign cousin of the bacterium that causes cholera -- and was only discovered, officials said, because tests were done amid false reports that cholera had been discovered among the evacuees.

Among healthy people, the bacteria can cause vomiting, diarrhea and abdominal pain but is generally not life-threatening. It can be readily cured with antibiotics such as doxycycline or cephalosporins. Those who recover show no long-term effects.

It is substantially more serious in people with chronic liver disease or people who have compromised immune systems, such as those taking transplant drugs or those with AIDS.

Von Roebuck, a spokesman for the CDC in Atlanta, said officials have detected the disease among some storm refugees and stragglers but has not been able to determine the number of cases.

"We are seeing some cases," he said. "It could be life-threatening."

DOJ_NMG_0002911

An average of about 50 cases of vibrio, 45 hospitalizations and 16 deaths are reported each year in the Gulf Coast states, but many experts believe the actual number is far higher. Most of those cases occur between May and October, when the ocean water is warmer.

Mayor Nagin said the possibility of epidemics is a critical concern.

"The water quality in the streets continues to deteriorate," he said. "There is some really nasty looking stuff out there. I worry about it every day. The more time that passes, there are more dead bodies left floating, and more mosquitoes breeding and hatching. They bite people who are dead."

Despite the difficulties, there was some progress.

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers has completed repairs to the 17th Street canal, said Cleo Allen, a public information officer for state Department of Transportation and Development. That breach in the levee was one of two that last Tuesday turned this low-lying city into a polluted lake, stranding tens of thousands of people without food and clean water.

Next, engineers will begin to pump water out of the city — "dewatering," as they call it. The first major pump to reactivate will be the Mounds pumping station, but engineers must secure power for those pumps, and check the stability of outfall walls.

Crews from the Department of Transportation are involved in clearing massive amounts of debris, and in moving evacuees out of the Chalmette area. Between 5,000 and 6,000 people were ferried out of Chalmette over the past few days, Allen said.

Security also continues to be restored.

Seven thousand additional National Guard troops will be in place by tonight, said Major Gen. Bennett Landreneau of the Louisiana National Guard. The total number of forces in the city will climb to 10,000, he said.

The number of troops in place has grown very rapidly, beginning with 4,000 National Guardsmen who were mobilized before the hurricane. Landreneau said the Guard's priorities "continue to be saving lives. We're focusing on the security, law and order, and the support of existing critical infrastructure."

Texas has taken in an estimated 250,000 people. As many as 1 million others from southern Louisiana heeded the warnings and fled to friends and relatives before Katrina struck the Gulf Coast last Monday.

At a news conference outside the Astrodome in Houston, which is sheltering an estimated 15,000 evacuees, former Presidents Bill Clinton and George H.W. Bush this morning announced formation of a fundraising foundation to help Katrina victims: bushclintonkatrinafund.org.

"A lot of these people have no cars, no work, no home, no nothing. They depend on us to give them a future," Clinton said.

Both were asked about criticism of the federal government. Bush sidestepped the question, but Clinton suggested that a commission should be formed to investigate the government's slow response.

"I think it's an appropriate thing to look into, but not at this time," Clinton said. "Right now, we're still finding bodies out there."

Asked why FEMA did not move more quickly, Clinton told reporters: "That's a question you should be asking them. It has something to do with how they reorganized after I left."

Clinton, Bush, their wives and other dignitaries toured the Astrodome, where Clinton spoke to a woman who said she was glad that her 113-year-old mother was rescued.

Joining the two former presidents at the news conference was Lee Scott, chairman and CEO of Wal-Mart. The company pledged $23 million for the fund.

On Sunday, Texas Gov. Rick Perry ordered emergency officials to airlift some of the evacuees that had offered to help. Perry said relief centers around the state were running out of room.

"There are shelters set up in other states that are sitting empty while thousands arrive in Texas by the day, if not the hour," Perry said.

For Bush, A Test Of Political Skill (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON - Four years ago, when George W. Bush emerged from the 9/11 attacks with sky-high marks for decisiveness and leadership, he accumulated a reserve of political capital that saw him through reelection.

Now, nearly nine months into his second term, President Bush faces perhaps the most profound test of executive and political skill of his life. One week after hurricane Katrina slammed into the Gulf Coast, wreaking unfathomable devastation, his administration is still scrambling to make up for a delayed initial response that faced broad, bipartisan criticism. Americans are reeling over gasoline prices, and remain skeptical over the course of the Iraq war. Plans for a bold second-term agenda - including Social Security reform and tax reform - sit in doubt.

DOJ_NMG_0002912

The death Saturday of Chief Justice William Rehnquist, the second vacancy on the high court in as many months, added one more element of uncertainty to a tumultuous time.

By Monday morning, the mood turned. After a weekend public-relations offensive by top aides who visited the storm-damaged South and fanned out to the Sunday talk shows, Bush seemed to have caught his balance. His nomination of John Roberts to replace the chief justice, rather than retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, struck analysts as a savvy move, creating the possibility that the court will start its term Oct. 3 at full strength. After the court announcement, the president boarded Marine One to begin his second trip in three days to the Gulf Coast.

Still, Bush has his work cut out for him, seeking to reassure Americans that the nation's military might is not stretched too thin and that the failures in response to Katrina - on the local, state, and national levels - do not bode ill for the ability to cope with any future terror attack on US soil. Republicans agree that this is a dangerous moment for the president.

"Anytime you have a situation like this, you're responsible for the government," says David Winston, a Republican pollster. "If it performs, great, and if it doesn't, people are going to want to know why, and rightfully so."

On the ground, the aftermath of Katrina took on a tangible impact across the country, with more than a half-million displaced people settling into relief centers. Nearly 250,000 evacuees went to Texas, leading the governor to order emergency officials to airlift some to other states. In New Orleans, rescue and recovery operations continued their grim task. Over the weekend, Secretary of Health and Human Services, Michael Leavitt predicted that Katrina's death toll would rise into the thousands. Reports of contractors coming under fire as they made their way to help shore up the 17th Street Canal in New Orleans added to the imagery of a war zone.

Monday, small signs of progress emerged as floodwaters began to recede. Residents of suburban New Orleans were allowed to return briefly to their homes and try to retrieve belongings. Out of Austria came news that oil prices were falling after industrialized nations released 60 million barrels of crude from their stockpiles to help stabilize American supplies.

The two former presidents, George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton, who championed the fundraising cause after last year's tsunami, reprised their role, announcing the formation of the Bush-Clinton Katrina Fund Monday. Proceeds will be turned over to the governors of the affected states.

For the current President Bush, the task ahead remains far more complex. Congressional hearings will examine what went wrong before and after Katrina slammed into the Gulf Coast at Category 4 strength. The initial wave of blame and recriminations continues. Over the weekend, the main newspaper in New Orleans, the Times-Picayune, issued an open letter to Bush, calling on him to fire "every official at the Federal Emergency Management Agency ... Director Michael Brown especially."

For Bush, who prides himself on making smart appointments and effectively delegating, the naming of Mr. Brown to head FEMA in 2003 without much apparent background in emergency management is one of many questions he already faces.

But if Bush is looking ahead to how history will remember him, he still has years to recover from the initial bad reviews out Katrina, analysts say.

"Having a lot of time left as president is a good thing for him, because it gives him the opportunities and time to get out of some of these holes," says Norman Ornstein, a political expert at the American Enterprise Institute.

Already, many Americans don't remember Bush's initial halting response to 9/11, from which he recovered after a few days with his iconic moment shouting through a bullhorn atop the rubble at ground zero. Still, recovering politically from Katrina is likely to take more effort. There is no foreign enemy against which to rally. And Bush was already struggling with low approval ratings over the Iraq war and high gas prices. The decision to proceed last week with a speech in California aimed at bolstering support for the Iraq war, even after Katrina had hit the Gulf Coast, is probably one Bush's aides wish they could do over.

"Even if the reality is, there's nothing more that he could have done back in Washington or anywhere else ... the symbol matters," says Mr. Ornstein.

Under Fire, President Attempts To Regain Sense Of Equilibrium (USAT)

By Judy Keen And Richard Benedetto

USA Today, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON — In a flurry of e-mail exchanges late Saturday night when they learned about Chief Justice William Rehnquist's death, President Bush's top advisers debated — after their most difficult week since 9/11 — what calamity might be next.

Their worried conversations continued in meetings at the White House before 8 a.m. on Sunday. They concluded that for Bush's remaining 40 months in office, they should expect almost anything, said a top adviser who works closely with Bush. “We've just kind of realized that if things are going to happen, they're going to happen to this president,” he said, refusing to be identified because he was not authorized to describe internal discussions.

Bush and his team spent the holiday weekend responding to the Supreme Court vacancy created by Rehnquist's death, managing the aftermath of Hurricane Kristina and trying to minimize damage from the federal government's slow and much-criticized response to the storm.

After angry complaints last week about delays in mobilizing federal help for hurricane victims, criticism of Bush's light-hearted recollection Friday of his youthful partying in New Orleans and failed efforts to blame local and state officials for problems, the president and his aides tried Monday to regain a sense of equilibrium.

Thirty-three hours after learning of Rehnquist's death, Bush announced the nomination of John Roberts to succeed him. Then he left for his second tour in four days to the disaster zone. During a visit to a shelter for storm evacuees in Baton Rouge, an unsmiling Bush said, “I fully understand there's a lot of work to be done.”

Bush counselor Dan Bartlett said Monday that after the situation is under control, Bush will order an inquiry into delays in federal aid. “We want to know what happened and how,” Bartlett said.

John Podesta, who as a chief of staff for President Clinton saw his share of crises, said the mood inside a White House reflects the president's ability to stay calm and take charge. “You never know what is going to hit you, but you have to be ready. (A president) has to be tough when he has to be. … He has to make decisions when decisions are needed. The troops … look at what's in his eyes.”

Ken Khachigian, a White House aide to Richard Nixon and Ronald Reagan, agreed. “One of the worst enemies in such situations is overreaction and even panic,” he said. “Nixon once advised that when circumstances are the hottest is when leaders must be the coolest.”

Events over the last week tested Bush and raised questions about how much lasting damage his presidency has sustained and how his agenda and legacy will be affected. When he said Monday in Baton Rouge that “this is one of these disasters that will test our soul and test our spirit,” he could have been talking about his administration as well as the storm's victims.

Bush's patience with federal hurricane relief efforts evaporated last week when he learned that thousands had been stuck for days in the New Orleans Convention Center without food or water. By Saturday morning, when he and other officials met in the White House situation room for an update, the president was still steaming. He had seen the disaster in person and watched horrific scenes on TV. There was talk around the table that if this disaster was a dress rehearsal for response to a terrorist attack or other national security crisis, the federal government failed the test.

Bush is turning his attention to the next problems for the affected states. Preparations are being made to deal with public health, provide housing, rebuild cities and find jobs for the displaced. Today, Bush will hold a Cabinet meeting on those issues and meet with Education Secretary Margaret Spellings to come up with a plan to get the region's children, now scattered across the country, back in school.

Bush is painfully aware of the scathing criticism directed at him personally. On Monday, the New Orleans Times-Picayune editorial was an open letter to Bush. “We're angry, Mr. President, and we'll be angry long after our beloved city and surrounding parishes have been pumped dry,” it said. “Our people deserved rescuing. Many who could have been were not. That's to the government's shame.”

He has often been dismissive of criticism in the past, but Bush skipped his usual weekend biking outings and went to a Red Cross operations center in Washington on Sunday. His trip Monday was meant to underscore his concern. He'll visit again. “There will be a sustained hands-on presence from the president on down, across the board of his administration for the foreseeable future,” Bartlett said.

Bush and his advisers were better prepared for Rehnquist's death. Because the chief justice had been ill for months, the statement Bush delivered Sunday morning from the White House had been written in advance. The decision to nominate Roberts for chief justice had long been “in the back of the president's mind,” spokesman Scott McClellan said.

Bush, an early riser who's usually asleep by 10 p.m., was awakened at 10:50 p.m. on Saturday and told of Rehnquist's death. Before he left for the 8 a.m. Sunday service at St. John's Episcopal Church, a block from the White House, he met in the Oval Office with chief of staff Andy Card, counsel Harriet Miers, Bartlett and others to discuss the vacancy. By the time Roberts arrived to discuss the job with Bush at 5:30 p.m. Sunday, the president's mind was pretty much made up. He didn't formally offer the job to Roberts until 7:15 a.m. Monday.

Now Bush must nominate a replacement for retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. There's already a short list of contenders, but the announcement likely won't come until next week at the earliest.

Bush had planned to spend this fall promoting his Social Security plan and talking about changing immigration laws. But the storm and the court vacancies have supplanted that agenda, said James Thurber, director of the American University Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies.

Those issues and the Iraq war will occupy Bush for months to come and shape his place in history, he said. “It will be a real challenge to his leadership. Whether he can recover remains to be seen.”

Bush Has Staunch Defender Amid Critics On Gulf Coast (NYT)

By Michael Cooper

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

JACKSON, Miss., Sept. 5 - The Bush administration has been stung by criticism of its handling of Hurricane Katrina by anguished Louisiana officials and by nervous Republicans from across the country, but it has one stalwart defender right in the heart of the devastated region - Gov. Haley Barbour of Mississippi.

From the earliest moments of the crisis, Mr. Barbour, a former chairman of the Republican National Committee, has praised President Bush and a federal response to the storm that even the president later called "not acceptable." At one point last week, when Mr. Barbour's glowing assessment was challenged by an interviewer on CNN, he asked "if this is an interview or an argument."

Mr. Barbour's praise of the federal efforts has put him at odds with some other Mississippi officials who have bemoaned the slow response in their areas and has put him at risk of sounding like a Pollyanna to Mississippians still struggling in the storm's aftermath. But the strategy is unsurprising for a canny political strategist like Mr. Barbour - a former political director in the Reagan White House, chairman of the Republican Party, and powerful Washington lobbyist - who won the governorship two years ago by in part emphasizing the strength of his close ties to President Bush.

While some officials here have found his statements jarring, others said they could pay off if Mr. Barbour is able to parlay his good relationship with the Bush administration into more federal aid for his state. And they noted that the political dynamic here is very different from what is happening next door in Louisiana, where Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, a Democrat, was outspokenly critical of the federal response to the storm, and soon found her administration openly sniping with the White House over who was to blame for the ensuing disaster and who should lead the recovery.

So while the frostiness between the president and Ms. Blanco cast a shadow over his trip to Louisiana on Monday morning, warmth and good feelings were on display when he met in the afternoon with Mr. Barbour in Poplarville and told a crowd that "we're here for the long term." As they met, the Navy and Marines set up camp in Biloxi.

Mr. Barbour appeared on television programs on Sunday morning, spreading his message that the federal effort was going well in his state. He told "Face the Nation" on CBS that "the federal government has been fabulous in our state" and "Meet the Press" on NBC that "the federal government has been good partners to us."

Some local officials have described a far different response. Mayor Johnny L. DuPree of Hattiesburg, a Democrat, complained over the weekend to The Hattiesburg American that it had taken days for federal help to arrive.

"I started trying to get federal help in here on Monday, and six days after this town has struggled to get enough water and ice for its people, we finally hear from the feds," the newspaper quoted Mr. DuPree as saying.

State Senator Gloria Chisholm Williamson, Democrat of Philadelphia, said she believed that the criticism by Louisiana officials was instrumental in having the federal government step up its response.

"When they started getting criticized," Ms. Williamson said, "all of a sudden we got the troops coming in, which is what we needed to begin with. I'm sorry that Governor Barbour is such a loyalist to his Republican president that he appeared to be putting that before the concerns of the people."

The storm and its aftermath will shape the legacy of Mr. Barbour, who has been mentioned as a possible presidential candidate in 2008. And they will pose a big challenge for the governor, a proponent of small government, as he confronts a catastrophe that will require a big government response, whether in rebuilding areas now in ruins, finding housing and schools for the thousands left homeless or filling the sizable gap in state revenues caused by the devastation of coastal casinos and wide swaths of farmland.

Prof. Marty Wiseman, the director of the John C. Stennis Institute of Government at Mississippi State University, said he would give Mr. Barbour generally high marks for his response so far. But Professor Wiseman said some Mississippians were questioning the governor's upbeat assessment of the federal response.

"That's the one eyebrow-raising factor that I've heard people mention," Professor Wiseman said. "You've got to wonder if Haley's not trying to keep the table set for future cooperation."

Mr. Barbour said his praise of the federal government was not a political calculation. "I get all these questions all the time about, you know, there's not enough water in X or there's not enough ice in Y, and almost always there is something to that," Mr. Barbour said at a news conference here on Monday. "But that's why you've just got to manage this deal and keep trying to wrestle this bear down to the ground, and that's what we're doing.

"The federal government, most all the time, has been first to say, 'We want to get you, we're pushing this toward you.' Have there been times where we didn't get as much as we wanted of this or that? Yes, sir. There have been. But, boy, it's been overwhelming, the millions of M.R.E.'s, ice, water that we've received."

DOJ_NMG_0002915

Mr. Barbour added: "We haven't looked at it as, I'm going to be whiny, and I'll get more, or, I'm going to act like Tarzan, and I'll get more. We've been saying, what do you need to do to get the job done?"

Bush's Grip On GOP In Peril? (RC)

By Mark Preston

Roll Call, September 6, 2005

President Bush's command over the Republican Congress is showing signs of weakening as a result of the growing unease over the U.S. mission in Iraq, the lack of a definitive plan to overhaul the nation's Social Security system and rising energy costs.

Complicating matters for Bush is the devastation wrought on the Gulf Coast by Hurricane Katrina, and the subsequent criticism from some local officials of the federal government's alleged failure to respond quickly enough with relief aide.

Just four weeks ago, Bush was riding high after winning a series of legislative victories ranging from passage of the controversial Central American Free Trade Agreement to approval of long-stalled energy and transportation measures. As they left for the August recess, Republicans hoped this momentum would boost their chances of muscling Bush's top domestic issue — restructuring the Social Security system — through the Congress before the year's end.

Now, the White House must work to shore up support among Republican Members even as it tries to advance Bush's goal on Social Security, said Senators, senior aides and GOP strategists, all of whom would speak only on the condition of anonymity.

"This is the perfect storm for the president," said a Senate GOP leadership aide. "We have rising gas prices, patience running thin with the war in Iraq and now Katrina. Coupled with lame-duck status, it is an uphill battle for him."

Evidence of a growing concern among Republicans about Bush's handling of Iraq spilled into public last month when Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) bluntly asserted that the U.S. is "not winning."

"We should start figuring out how we get out of there," Hagel said on the Aug. 21 broadcast of ABC's "This Week." "But with this understanding: We cannot leave a vacuum that further destabilizes the Middle East. I think our involvement there has destabilized the Middle East. And the longer we stay there, I think the further destabilization will occur."

Privately, many other Republicans concede that they are hearing similar concerns from their constituents about Iraq and are likely to start demanding better answers from the White House, GOP sources said.

"People are fundamentally for us succeeding," said a Republican strategist with close ties to the Congressional leadership. "But they are uncertain about what the president's plan is."

Questions about the direction of U.S. policy in Iraq has been exacerbated in recent weeks by the emergence of anti-war activist Cindy Sheehan. Sheehan, whose son was killed in the war, gained international attention by camping outside Bush's Crawford, Texas, ranch during the president's August vacation and demanding a meeting with him.

It is unclear if Sheehan will continue to attract national interest, but she will be the star attraction at what is being billed as a major anti-war protest to be held Sept. 24 in Washington, D.C.

On Capitol Hill, Senate Armed Services Chairman John Warner (R-Va.) will hold an oversight hearing on Iraq within the next few weeks, said his spokesman, John Ullyot. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and various military officials are expected to testify.

"Chairman Warner wants to give Secretary Rumsfeld the opportunity to give his views on Iraq and answer questions from Senators that are relayed through their constituents especially after the August recess," Ullyot said.

Escalating energy costs are also of concern to many Republicans because they are painfully aware it is an issue that affects every segment of the population.

"Bush is hemorrhaging political capital on energy prices," said a House GOP leadership aide. "Energy prices affect everyone. Small businesses get affected. The airlines get affected. It is bad."

The Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee will hold a hearing today to begin reviewing causes that have led to high energy prices. The House Energy and Commerce Committee will hold a similar hearing Wednesday, and several other panels are expected to follow suit. (See related story, page 1.)

Bush's top domestic issue — Social Security — might also be in jeopardy. Several Republicans suggested that the current state of affairs all but dooms any action on dealing with it this year. Congressional Republicans, though, blame the White House for failing to deliver a plan for them to try to sell to their constituents back home.

"There was very little guidance about what to say on Social Security," said a senior Senate Republican aide.

Bush's shaky support from Congressional Republicans comes as Americans' overall perception of his stewardship of the country is slipping. A Washington Post-ABC News poll released last week claimed that Bush's approval rating has sunk to 45 percent, and a majority of people disagree with his approach to Iraq, gasoline prices, the economy and Social Security.

DOJ_NMG_0002916

Congressional Republicans suggested the next few weeks would frame how successful the White House is in advancing its legislative goals this year.

"I think the administration is going to have to reach out and work more to build those relationships and give people a reason to be there for them," said a Republican Senator.

Bush And Katrina (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

The White House is slowly recovering from its first-week stumbles responding to Katrina, with President Bush taking his second trip to New Orleans yesterday. His quick elevation of John Roberts to Chief Justice is another welcome sign of energy (see related commentary). But Mr. Bush can't afford to stop there, because the aftermath of Katrina poses a threat to his entire second term.

We aren't referring here to the storm surge of recrimination blaming post-Katrina problems on everything from Iraq, to tax cuts, to his refusal to endorse the Kyoto Protocol. The American public knows this was an epic natural disaster and won't fall for political opportunism. By the same token, Americans also won't have much patience for White House claims that state and local officials were the greater incompetents. Yes, Louisiana needed a Rudy Giuliani. But what Americans want now is proof that their government understands the nature of the challenge and is acting forcefully to meet it.

On this point, Mr. Bush is going to have to recognize the obvious initial failure of the Department of Homeland Security in its first big post-9/11 test. The President created this latest huge federal bureaucracy, against the advice of many of us, and we're still waiting for evidence that it has done anything but reshuffle the Beltway furniture. If FEMA can't now handle the diaspora out of New Orleans to Houston, Baton Rouge and other cities, the political retribution will be fierce.

Notably, the New Orleans mess improved only after the Pentagon got involved. Though the military is normally barred from domestic law enforcement by the Posse Comitatus Act of 1878, Defense officials have been doing a lot of creative thinking about what they can do and what the public now expects post-September 11. The press corps might even want to report on that thinking, which is contained in a June 2005 report, "Strategy for Homeland Defense and Civil Support." If he ever fires anyone, Mr. Bush could do worse than find a few more Donald Rumsfelds as replacements.

Mr. Bush will also need to guide the rebuilding choices for New Orleans and the Mississippi delta. We're hearing a lot these days about the need to restore barrier marshlands, often from the same people who have long hated the Army Corps of Engineers that would help restore them. But clearly there is an issue of how much federal money to pour into a city that is below sea-level and would still be vulnerable to another Category Four or Five storm.

Mr. Bush should name one or more people, in or out of his Administration, to sort through the ideas and avoid what will be the liberal/GOP Congressional impulse to throw money at everything. An alternative would be to name the entire stricken area an enterprise zone for some period of time, which would offer both tax incentives and regulatory waivers to stimulate reinvestment. There's a danger here of tax breaks for floating casinos, but the greater risk is spending $20 billion or more solely on the priorities of local politicians.

Which brings us to Mr. Bush's broader domestic agenda. The President has admirably refused to give up on Social Security, but Katrina makes reform impossible in the near term. The more urgent Presidential priority now is to take steps to keep the U.S. economy growing. Last week's regulatory moves on fuel emissions and the Strategic Petroleum Reserve are already helping on gasoline supplies, and the price shocks are an opportunity to prod Congress to remove obstacles to more oil and natural gas drilling.

Economic leadership also means instructing Americans on the link between tax cutting and the economic vitality needed to fund both Katrina relief and the war on terror. Predictably, the Bush tax cuts are under attack for denying revenue to the government and because they don't require "sacrifice" in wartime. But the truth is that federal revenues are rising by an estimated $262 billion -- or roughly 14% -- this year thanks to the growth that followed the 2003 tax cuts. Republicans have been far too defensive on tax cuts, and Katrina is an opening to explain their necessity and to push for making them permanent.

What's really at stake in the coming months is the Republican claim to be the governing party. That claim has been based in part on the assertion that energetic government doesn't also have to be big government. Mr. Bush's refusal to restrain a free-spending GOP Congress has already undermined the latter, while Katrina is stretching the credibility of the former. Democrats will spend the next year asserting that at least they'll spend tax dollars on levees in New Orleans, rather than Alaskan bridges to nowhere.

As the initial polls are showing, most Americans aren't yet blaming Mr. Bush for Katrina's aftermath. But with war in Iraq and terrorism, rising energy prices and now a natural disaster, these are also anxious times. Voters will forgive a President many mistakes but no leader can survive a public judgment that he is unsure of himself and hostage to events. We've thought for some time that Mr. Bush's reticence was hurting him on Iraq, and that he needs to be both more visible and more assertive in making his case to Americans. After Katrina, we'd say that's imperative.

Tragic Costs Of Bush's Iraq Obsession (FT)

By Michael Lind

Financial Times, September 6, 2005

Samuel Huntington has called it the Lippmann Gap, echoing the American journalist Walter Lippmann in 1943: "Foreign policy consists in bringing into balance, with a comfortable surplus of power in reserve, the nation's commitments and the nation's power." The historian Paul Kennedy has another name for it: "Imperial overextension". Whatever you call this dangerous disease, the symptoms are clear in the US.

In early 2001, shortly after President George W. Bush was inaugurated and before 9/11, the Federal Emergency Management Agency warned of the three most devastating disasters that could strike the US: a terrorist attack on New York City, a hurricane flooding New Orleans and a San Francisco earthquake. The Bush administration was focused on its priority: Iraq.

The first foreseen disaster took place on September 11 2001, when al-Qaeda flew hijacked jets into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. The federal government was taken by surprise. New York City's first responders were hampered by communications problems and poor planning for this long-predicted event. The Bush administration's response to the mass murder committed by al-Qaeda was warped by the focus on Iraq. Many in Washington believe that the administration failed to send sufficient troops to Afghanistan because it was with-holding forces for the invasion of Iraq.

Day after day, the levees of Lake Pontchartrain in New Orleans and the wetlands that protected the city were eroding. Mr Bush and his allies in the Republican-majority Congress have slashed federal spending for flood control in south-east Louisiana by half and funds for work at Lake Pontchartrain by almost two-thirds. From 2003, funds authorised for the Southeast Louisiana Urban Flood Control Project were diverted to pay for the war in Iraq. Earlier this year, the US Army Corps of Engineers requested $27m (€21.6m) to repair the levees to protect them from hurricanes. Mr Bush sought to cut the amount to $3.9m and also proposed reducing spending to prevent flooding from $78m to $30m (the Republican Congress ultimately passed $5.7m and $36.5m, respectively). The New Orleans Times-Picayune published numerous articles warning that the war in Iraq was taking money away from hurricane protection on the Gulf coast.

Meanwhile, in Iraq, the insurgency metastasised. With US forces divided between the necessary war in Afghanistan and the war of choice in Iraq, and army recruitment numbers plunging, the Bush administration, in addition to hiring private contractors, was forced to mobilise National Guard reserves overseas. When Katrina struck, tens of thousands of National Guard soldiers were in Iraq, along with much of the equipment needed for disaster relief.

At the same time, America's long border with Mexico has gone largely unprotected. Around a million illegal immigrants are apprehended each year, in addition to the estimated half a million who join the roughly 10m living in the US. A growing number of illegal immigrants apprehended at the border are from Middle Eastern countries including Egypt, Yemen, Iraq and Syria. President Bush's justice department claims that suspected American terrorist Jose Padilla and an accomplice planned to enter the US through Mexico and blow up buildings in New York and other cities. Mohammed Junaid Babar, an alleged al-Qaeda agent linked with plots against London, has told US investigators of a plan to bring terrorists into the US from Mexico.

On December 17 2004, Mr Bush signed the National Intelligence Reform Act, which required the addition of 10,000 border patrol agents beginning in 2006. In his February 2005 budget, however, Mr Bush authorised funds for only 210 new border agents. Last month, the Democratic governors of Arizona and New Mexico asked for federal disaster relief to help deal with border chaos.

The horror in New Orleans and along the Gulf Coast, and the chaos along the US-Mexican border, join anarchy in Afghanistan and Iraq as proof of the bankruptcy of the Bush doctrine. Mr Bush's neoconservative strategists wanted a crusade for US hegemony in the Middle East and the world; as "national greatness conservatives," some might have been willing to pay for it with higher taxes. But Mr Bush's political base consists of conservatives and libertarians united by a crusade to cut taxes. The attempt to establish American global hegemony without paying for it was a disaster – actually, several disasters – waiting to happen.

If, early in 2001, the Bush administration had focused on al-Qaeda instead of Iraq, it might have responded to FEMA's call to prepare New York for a big terrorist incident. If it had not divided US forces to fight two wars at once, Afghanistan might have been pacified while Saddam remained in power but contained. If Bush had not sacrificed border security to pay for the war in Iraq, the Mexican border might be under control. If Bush had not diverted so many National Guard units to Iraq, disaster relief following Hurricane Katrina would have been swifter and more effective. And if the war in Iraq had not caused the Bush administration to raid money for the New -Orleans levees, this big port city might not be a corpse-filled cesspool.

Supporters of the war in Iraq predicted that the dominos would fall in the Middle East. Instead, the dominos are falling across America.

Magic Marker Strategy (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

It was the climax of George W. Bush's video introduction at the Republican convention: the moment at Yankee Stadium during the 2001 World Series when he threw a pitch all the way to home plate. The video ended, and the conventioneers cheered as Mr. Bush strode onto a stage shaped like a pitcher's mound.

Well, live by the pitch, die by the pitch. When you campaign as the man on the mound, the great leader whose arm rescues Americans in their moment of need, they expect you to deal with a hurricane, too.

Mr. Bush made a lot of mistakes last week, but most of his critics are making an even bigger one now by obsessing about what he said and did. We can learn more by listening to men like Jim Judkins, particularly when he explains the Magic Marker method of disaster preparedness.

Mr. Judkins is one of the officials in charge of evacuating the Hampton Roads region around Newport News, Va. These coastal communities, unlike New Orleans, are not below sea level, but they're much better prepared for a hurricane. Officials have plans to run school buses and borrow other buses to evacuate those without cars, and they keep registries of the people who need special help.

Instead of relying on a "Good Samaritan" policy - the fantasy in New Orleans that everyone would take care of the neighbors - the Virginia rescue workers go door to door. If people resist the plea to leave, Mr. Judkins told The Daily Press in Newport News, rescue workers give them Magic Markers and ask them to write their Social Security numbers on their body parts so they can be identified.

"It's cold, but it's effective," Mr. Judkins explained.

That simple strategy could have persuaded hundreds of people to save their own lives in New Orleans. What the city needed most was coldly effective local leaders, not a president in Washington who could feel their pain. It's the same lesson we should have learned from Sept. 11 and other disasters, yet both liberals and conservatives keep ignoring it.

The liberals bewailing the insensitivity and racism of Republicans in Washington sound like a bad rerun of the 1960's, when urban riots were blamed on everyone but the rioters and the police. Yes, the White House did a terrible job of responding to Katrina, but Democratic leaders in New Orleans and Louisiana didn't even fulfill their basic duties.

In coastal Virginia - which, by the way, has a large black population and plenty of Republican politicians - Mr. Judkins and his colleagues assume that it's their job to evacuate people, maintain order and stockpile supplies to last for 72 hours, until federal help arrives. In New Orleans, the mayor seemed to assume all that was beyond his control, just like the mayors in the 1960's who let the riots occur.

They said their cities couldn't survive without help from Washington, which proceeded to shower inner cities with money and programs that did more damage than the riots. Cities didn't recover until some mayors, especially Republicans like Rudy Giuliani, tried self-reliance.

Mr. Giuliani was called heartless and racist for cutting the welfare rolls and focusing on crime reduction, but black neighborhoods were the greatest beneficiaries of his policies. He was criticized for ignoring social services as he concentrated on reorganizing the Police and Fire Departments, but his cold effectiveness made the city a more livable place and kept it calm after Sept. 11.

Yet Mr. Bush, with approval from conservatives who should have known better, reacted to Sept. 11 by centralizing disaster planning in Washington. He created the byzantine Homeland Security Department, with predictable results last week.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency, often criticized for ineptitude, became even less efficient after it was swallowed by a bureaucracy consumed with terrorism. The department has spent billions on new federal airport screeners - with no discernible public benefit - while giving short shrift to natural disasters.

The federal officials who had been laboring on a one-size-fits-all strategy were unprepared for the peculiarities of New Orleans, like the high percentage of people without cars. The local officials who knew about that problem didn't do anything about it - and then were furious when Mr. Bush didn't solve it for them. Why didn't the man on the mound come through for them?

It's a fair question as they go door to door looking for bodies. But so is this: Why didn't they go door to door last week with Magic Markers?

The Larger Shame (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

The wretchedness coming across our television screens from Louisiana has illuminated the way children sometimes pay with their lives, even in America, for being born to poor families.

It has also underscored the Bush administration's ongoing reluctance or ineptitude in helping the poorest Americans. The scenes in New Orleans reminded me of the suffering I saw after a similar storm killed 130,000 people in Bangladesh in 1991 - except that Bangladesh's government showed more urgency in trying to save its most vulnerable citizens.

But Hurricane Katrina also underscores a much larger problem: the growing number of Americans trapped in a never-ending cyclone of poverty. And while it may be too early to apportion blame definitively for the mishandling of the hurricane, even President Bush's own administration acknowledges that America's poverty is worsening on his watch.

The U.S. Census Bureau reported a few days ago that the poverty rate rose again last year, with 1.1 million more Americans living in poverty in 2004 than a year earlier. After declining sharply under Bill Clinton, the number of poor people has now risen 17 percent under Mr. Bush.

If it's shameful that we have bloated corpses on New Orleans streets, it's even more disgraceful that the infant mortality rate in America's capital is twice as high as in China's capital. That's right - the number of babies who died before their first birthdays amounted to 11.5 per thousand live births in 2002 in Washington, compared with 4.6 in Beijing.

Indeed, according to the United Nations Development Program, an African-American baby in Washington has less chance of surviving its first year than a baby born in urban parts of the state of Kerala in India.

The national infant mortality rate has risen under Mr. Bush for the first time since 1958. The U.S. ranks 43rd in the world in infant mortality, according to the C.I.A.'s World Factbook; if we could reach the level of Singapore, ranked No. 1, we would save 18,900 children's lives each year.

So in some ways the poor children evacuated from New Orleans are the lucky ones because they may now get checkups and vaccinations. But nationally, 29 percent of children had no health insurance at some point in the last 12 months, and many get neither checkups nor vaccinations. The U.S. ranks 84th in the world for measles immunizations and 89th for polio.

One of the most dispiriting elements of the catastrophe in New Orleans was the looting. I covered the 1995 earthquake that leveled much of Kobe, Japan, killing 5,500, and for days I searched there for any sign of criminal behavior. Finally I found a resident who had seen three men steal food. I asked him whether he was embarrassed that Japanese would engage in such thuggery.

"No, you misunderstand," he said firmly. "These looters weren't Japanese. They were foreigners."

The reasons for this are complex and partly cultural, but one reason is that Japan has tried hard to stitch all Japanese together into the nation's social fabric. In contrast, the U.S. - particularly under the Bush administration - has systematically cut people out of the social fabric by redistributing wealth from the most vulnerable Americans to the most affluent.

It's not just that funds may have gone to Iraq rather than to the levees in New Orleans; it's also that money went to tax cuts for the wealthiest rather than vaccinations for children.

None of this is to suggest that there are easy solutions for American poverty. As Ronald Reagan once said, "We fought a war on poverty, and poverty won." But we don't need to be that pessimistic - in the late 1990's, we made real headway. A ray of hope is beautifully presented in one of the best books every written on American poverty, "American Dream," by my Times colleague Jason DeParle.

So the best monument to the catastrophe in New Orleans would be a serious national effort to address the poverty that afflicts the entire country. And in our shock and guilt, that might be politically feasible. Rich Lowry of The National Review, in defending Mr. Bush, offered an excellent suggestion: "a grand right-left bargain that includes greater attention to out-of-wedlock births from the Left in exchange for the Right's support for more urban spending." That would be the best legacy possible for Katrina.

Otherwise, long after the horrors have left TV screens, about 50 of the 77 babies who die each day, on average, will die needlessly, because of poverty. That's the larger hurricane of poverty that shames our land.

It's Your Failure, Too, Mr. Bush (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

BATON ROUGE -- After a tragically incompetent beginning, the effort to give urgent care to the multitudes from New Orleans whose homes and livelihoods have been obliterated is finally in high gear. The problem now is that nobody knows where it's headed.

At the top, things are still hopeless. Federal, local and state officials who perform for the cameras here at the Louisiana State Police complex, headquarters for the relief effort, still spend an unconscionable amount of time debating who's in charge. Is the president the ultimate authority, or is it Blanco, Nagin, Chertoff, Brown or the generals? The answer seems to vary from hour to hour, depending on who's holding court in the hot, stuffy briefing room or outside on the portico, where visiting luminaries get mobbed by microphones.

Fortunately, the finger-pointing follies don't matter much on the ground and in the water. Military, police and civilian relief units did what had to be done and emptied the New Orleans basin of Hurricane Katrina's bereft survivors. They are being fed, sheltered and clothed. They can't be described as alive and well, but they're alive.

Now what?

Hundreds of thousands of evacuees are scattered around Louisiana and neighboring states in a sudden diaspora, and no one seems to have any idea what to do with them next. The evacuees bristle at the word "refugees," which makes them sound as if they don't belong in this country. But whatever you call them, they won't be able to go back home -- and won't have a home to go back to -- for months or even years.

Baton Rouge, perhaps the best example, has swollen like the Mississippi River in an epic flood. The people here have been generous and good-natured to a fault. Down by the river, at the convention center, the Red Cross is housing about 5,000 evacuees; another big shelter is being opened across town, and smaller shelters are being organized every day, many by local churches. It's impossible to count the families who have opened their homes to relatives, friends or needy strangers.

Every city and town in Louisiana that wasn't blasted by the hurricane is full of evacuees. Then there are the tens of thousands in Texas and the multitudes scattered across neighboring states. Their host communities have the best of intentions, but many won't be able to stand the added drain on resources indefinitely. Where will these people go? Why wasn't there a plan?

That's when I start my finger-pointing, because a few days in and around this ground zero have convinced me that there are two things the federal government failed to do, and that for these failures there's ultimately no one to blame but the president.

First, an administration that since Sept. 11, 2001, has told us a major terrorist strike is inevitable should have had in place a well-elaborated plan for evacuating a major American city. Even if there wasn't a specific plan for New Orleans -- although it was clear that a breach of the city's levees was one of the likeliest natural catastrophes -- there should have been a generic plan. George W. Bush told us time and again that our cities were threatened. Shouldn't he have ordered up a plan to get people out?

Second, someone should have thought about what to do with hundreds of thousands of evacuees, both in the days after a disaster and in the long term. As people flooded out of New Orleans, it was officials at the state and local level who rose to the challenge, making it up as they went along. Bring a bunch of people to the Astrodome. We have a vacant hotel that we can use. Send a hundred or so down to our church and we'll do the best we can.

Tent cities aren't a happy option, but neither is haphazard improvisation. Is the problem the Bush administration's ideological fervor for small government? Does the White House really believe that primary responsibility should fall on volunteers, church groups and individuals? Or is it just stunning incompetence and lack of foresight?

At the big shelter here in Baton Rouge on Sunday, some student volunteers from Louisiana State University took a group of children outside to get some air. The kids were using sheets of cardboard as sleds and surfboards, zooming down the grassy levee next to the Mississippi River and then scampering back uphill for another ride. It was a beautiful, sunny day, and the scene warmed your heart. But those college students are going to have to go back to their classes, and then how will those kids from New Orleans spend their days?

Katrina Rekindles Adversarial Media (USAT)

By Peter Johnson

USA Today, September 6, 2005

Reporters covering Hurricane Katrina on the scene showed their human — and often angry and frustrated — face as they questioned the slow response over the weekend.

“The government said, ‘You go here, and you'll get help,' or ‘You go in that Superdome and you'll get help,' ” Fox News anchor Shepard Smith fumed on-air from New Orleans Friday, in a tone echoed by other correspondents. “And they didn't get help. They got locked in there. And they watched people being killed around them. And they watched people starving. And they watched elderly people not get any medicine."

Says Fordham University communications professor Paul Levinson, "The media rose to the occasion, shone their light on the desolation and the needy, and kept it focused there until the cavalry finally began to arrive."

The story also proved how, even in this emerging new-media age in which bloggers sometimes seem to rule, television news still does it best when it comes to conveying the scope and the depth of emotion in a quickly evolving tragedy.

Whether TV news will continue to lead with this story is open to debate, as attention inevitably turns to John Roberts' confirmation hearings for the Supreme Court, as well as whomever President Bush names to a second vacancy on the court. That story placed a close second Monday.

But some observers say that Katrina's media legacy may be a return to a post-Watergate-like era of tougher scrutiny of the federal government and public policy issues.

"If any good comes from the catastrophe, it will be that it signaled the beginning of the media's reassertion of aggressive, in-your-face reporting, in which it confronts government wrongdoing, rather than just swallowing the government's public-relations handouts," Levinson says.

But Boston University journalism professor Bob Zelnick says the media have never gotten soft on the government, despite continuing questions over the media's own credibility. "I do not believe the press is guilty of the charge that it abandoned its healthy skepticism in Iraq, and I would hate to see it draw the inference from New Orleans that 'in your face' journalism is the panacea for restoring our lost credibility."

In Katrina, CNN "learned from Jon Stewart how to use simple juxtaposition to make a point," says New York University journalism professor Jay Rosen. "Clip of a federal official explaining how no one anticipated the strength of the storm. Clip from the Weather Channel proving plenty of people did."

"Journalists seem to be much more effective than the administration in representing the public's reactions to the disaster," Rosen says. "Clueless federal officials seem to know less about what is happening than the journalists do, and sometimes less than an average TV viewer. This tips the balance of power toward the press, which is why we see such aggressive questioning and on-air criticism close to jeering."

Says NBC Meet The Press host Tim Russert, who grilled Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff Sunday over the federal response to the hurricane, "The primary responsibility of the media is accountability of government, whether it's about lying under oath, which upset Democrats, or the mismanagement of responding to a hurricane, which happens to upset Republicans."

ABC News correspondent Bob Woodruff, who has been in New Orleans for the past week, recalls witnessing the slow pace of the relief effort of January's Asian tsunami, which killed thousands of people.

He never expected to see such a phenomenon again, until he saw a body lying at the corner of Magazine and Jackson in New Orleans — five days after Katrina hit.

"It came as a huge shock to reporters — not just as reporters but as Americans — to see this happening in a great city like New Orleans," he says.

Katrina May Unleash A Media Storm (USAT)

By Peter Johnson

USA Today, September 6, 2005

The media shelf life for natural disasters is notoriously short: Within two weeks of Hurricane Andrew in 1992, which cut a $30 billion destructive path through south Florida and the Louisiana coast, the story virtually disappeared from network newscasts.

But experts and journalists predict that mounting questions about U.S. government preparation, policies and response to Hurricane Katrina will result in intense news coverage for months.

Katrina "doesn't just have legs, it has tentacles," says Bob Lichter of the Center for Media and Public Affairs. "Its implications reach into hot-button controversies involving race, poverty, economics and partisan politics. The reach of this story will make the O.J. Simpson case look like a news brief."

Network news analyst Andrew Tyndall predicts that TV news will focus on personal stories and massive aid efforts in the coming weeks, and then turn to looking at how relief efforts may have resulted in people dying. Stories on inner cities don't get much network attention "unless carnage is involved, and this is what you have" in New Orleans.

In The New Yorker magazine this week, Nicholas Lemann writes, "We're all wondering what will become of New Orleans. A big American city has never before been entirely emptied of people, and had most of its housing rendered useless, and had all its basic systems fail at once."

DOJ_NMG_0002922

The New York Times opened a bureau in Baton Rouge; other news outlets plan to be in the region indefinitely.

"It all gets more interesting by the minute. There are a quarter of a million people in Texas who weren't there five days ago," CBS Early Show anchor Harry Smith said as he arrived back in New Orleans Monday for continuing coverage. NBC's Today dispatched Katie Couric, while ABC's Good Morning America sent Diane Sawyer and Robin Roberts.

NBC Nightly News anchor Brian Williams returns to New Orleans tonight. ABC's World News Tonight has Bob Woodruff and Elizabeth Vargas in the region, with Charles Gibson in New York. CBS' John Roberts co-anchors from New Orleans with Bob Schieffer in New York.

Preliminary evening news ratings showed big increases in viewership, which is normally depressed at this time of year. Tyndall says some 29 million viewers tuned in to the Big 3 last week, up from about 21 million the week before.

Cable news viewing also skyrocketed. Fox News drew an average 4.8 million viewers in prime time, up 142% over July, compared with 3.9 million for CNN (up 466%) and 1.6 million for MSNBC (up 470%).

OUR OPINIONS: An Open Letter To The PresidentDear Mr. President: (NOTP)

The New Orleans Times Picayune, September 6, 2005

We heard you loud and clear Friday when you visited our devastated city and the Gulf Coast and said, "What is not working, we're going to make it right."

Please forgive us if we wait to see proof of your promise before believing you. But we have good reason for our skepticism.

Bienville built New Orleans where he built it for one main reason: It's accessible. The city between the Mississippi River and Lake Pontchartrain was easy to reach in 1718.

How much easier it is to access in 2005 now that there are interstates and bridges, airports and helipads, cruise ships, barges, buses and diesel-powered trucks.

Despite the city's multiple points of entry, our nation's bureaucrats spent days after last week's hurricane wringing their hands, lamenting the fact that they could neither rescue the city's stranded victims nor bring them food, water and medical supplies.

Meanwhile there were journalists, including some who work for The Times-Picayune, going in and out of the city via the Crescent City Connection. On Thursday morning, that crew saw a caravan of 13 Wal-Mart tractor trailers headed into town to bring food, water and supplies to a dying city.

Television reporters were doing live reports from downtown New Orleans streets. Harry Connick Jr. brought in some aid Thursday, and his efforts were the focus of a "Today" show story Friday morning.

Yet, the people trained to protect our nation, the people whose job it is to quickly bring in aid were absent. Those who should have been deploying troops were singing a sad song about how our city was impossible to reach.

We're angry, Mr. President, and we'll be angry long after our beloved city and surrounding parishes have been pumped dry. Our people deserved rescuing. Many who could have been were not. That's to the government's shame.

Mayor Ray Nagin did the right thing Sunday when he allowed those with no other alternative to seek shelter from the storm inside the Louisiana Superdome. We still don't know what the death toll is, but one thing is certain: Had the Superdome not been opened, the city's death toll would have been higher. The toll may even have been exponentially higher.

It was clear to us by late morning Monday that many people inside the Superdome would not be returning home. It should have been clear to our government, Mr. President. So why weren't they evacuated out of the city immediately? We learned seven years ago, when Hurricane Georges threatened, that the Dome isn't suitable as a long-term shelter. So what did state and national officials think would happen to tens of thousands of people trapped inside with no air conditioning, overflowing toilets and dwindling amounts of food, water and other essentials?

State Rep. Karen Carter was right Friday when she said the city didn't have but two urgent needs: "Buses! And gas!" Every official at the Federal Emergency Management Agency should be fired, Director Michael Brown especially.

In a nationally televised interview Thursday night, he said his agency hadn't known until that day that thousands of storm victims were stranded at the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center. He gave another nationally televised interview the next morning and said, "We've provided food to the people at the Convention Center so that they've gotten at least one, if not two meals, every single day."

Lies don't get more bald-faced than that, Mr. President.

Yet, when you met with Mr. Brown Friday morning, you told him, "You're doing a heck of a job."

That's unbelievable.

There were thousands of people at the Convention Center because the riverfront is high ground. The fact that so many people had reached there on foot is proof that rescue vehicles could have gotten there, too.

DOJ_NMG_0002923

We, who are from New Orleans, are no less American than those who live on the Great Plains or along the Atlantic Seaboard. We're no less important than those from the Pacific Northwest or Appalachia. Our people deserved to be rescued.

No expense should have been spared. No excuses should have been voiced. Especially not one as preposterous as the claim that New Orleans couldn't be reached.

Mr. President, we sincerely hope you fulfill your promise to make our beloved communities work right once again.

When you do, we will be the first to applaud.

FEMA Director Singled Out By Response Critics (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu And Susan B. Glasser

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

Michael D. Brown has been called the accidental director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, caricatured as the failed head of an Arabian horse sporting group who was plucked from obscurity to become President Bush's point man for the worst natural disaster in U.S. history.

Amid the swirl of human misery along the Gulf Coast, Brown admitted initially underestimating the impact of Hurricane Katrina, whose winds and water swamped the agency's preparations. As the nation reeled at images of the calamity, he appeared to blame storm victims by noting that the crisis was worsened by New Orleans residents who did not comply with a mandatory evacuation order.

By last weekend, facing mounting calls for his resignation, he told reporters: "People want to lash out at me, lash out at FEMA. I think that's fine. Just lash out, because my job is to continue to save lives." More broadly, the 50-year-old Oklahoma lawyer and the agency he leads have become the focus of a broad reappraisal of U.S. homeland security efforts four years after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

In recent days, politicians and officials in both parties have derided Brown's qualifications to head the nation's chief disaster-response agency -- as well as the performance of the agency and its federal, state and local partners.

At a time when homeland security experts called for greater domestic focus on preparing for calamity, Brown faced years of funding cuts, personnel departures and FEMA's downgrading from an independent, Cabinet-level agency.

As recently as three weeks ago, state emergency managers urged Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and his deputy, Michael P. Jackson, to ease the department's focus on terrorism, warning that the shift away from traditional disaster management left FEMA a bureaucratic backwater less able to respond to natural events such as hurricanes and earthquakes.

The Times-Picayune, Louisiana's largest newspaper, published an open letter on Sunday to President Bush, calling for every FEMA official to be fired, "Director Michael Brown especially," joining critics in the state and Congress.

"We're angry, Mr. President, and we'll be angry long after our beloved city and surrounding parishes have been pumped dry," the editorial said. "Our people deserved rescuing. Many who could have been were not. That's to the government's shame. . . . No expense should have been spared. No excuses should have been voiced."

Brown's defenders say he is the scapegoat of a cataclysmic storm and failure of New Orleans's levee system that, in the words of President Bush and Chertoff, could not be foreseen.

"Brownie, you're doing a heck of a job," Bush said Friday during a tour of the state, a day before Chertoff voiced his confidence.

"It's easy to play the blame game, find a scapegoat, but no one person could be responsible for the challenges we face and the lives lost," said W. Craig Fugate, emergency management director for Florida, where Bush's brother is governor, who worked with FEMA through four hurricanes in 2004. He said state and local authorities share responsibility for the death toll likely to emerge in coming days.

Joe M. Allbaugh -- a college friend, former Bush campaign manager and past FEMA director who hired Brown as FEMA general counsel in 2001 -- offered a qualified defense.

Allbaugh called the government's overall performance "unacceptable" but added: "Blaming one agency, you cannot do that." Still, he acknowledged that FEMA had lost independence and clout with the White House. "I had a unique relationship with the president, having been his chief of staff," Allbaugh said. "If you don't have that kind of relationship, it just makes things tougher."

If anything, Brown's political background has become a liability, leading to charges that he was given his job as patronage. He got his start in politics as an Oklahoma native with Allbaugh but ran unsuccessfully for Congress in 1988, winning 27 percent of the vote. He has chaired the Oklahoma Municipal Power Authority and served as a City Council member, examiner for the Oklahoma and Colorado supreme courts, and assistant city manager.

Allbaugh hired Brown after an acrimonious end to a nine-year stint as commissioner of the International Arabian Horse Association. Former officials say he was forced out; a friend and lawyer of Brown's said he negotiated a settlement after withstanding numerous lawsuits against his enforcement of rules for judges and stewards.

Defending his qualifications, Brown said he has overseen responses to 164 presidential declared emergencies and disasters as FEMA counsel and general counsel, including the 2003 Columbia shuttle disaster and the California wildfires in 2003. "I have been through a few disasters," he said at a news conference yesterday.

Reviews of the government's response to Katrina are beginning. Already, members of Congress such as Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.) and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) are pushing to move FEMA out of its department and back to Cabinet-level status. Senate Homeland Security Committee Chairman Susan Collins (R-Maine) and ranking Democrat Joseph I. Lieberman (Conn.) have launched an investigation, and committee members will meet with department officials tomorrow.

While Chertoff said the levee breach that flooded New Orleans "exceeded the foresight of planners," Max Mayfield, director of the National Hurricane Center, said Brown and other top federal officials were briefed as much as 32 hours in advance of landfall that Hurricane Katrina's storm surge was likely to overtop levees and cause catastrophic flooding.

"They knew that this one was different," Mayfield said yesterday. "I don't think Mike Brown or anyone else in FEMA could have any reason to have any problem with our calls. . . . They were told. . . . We said the levees could be topped."

Louisiana officials have blamed FEMA and Brown for bureaucratic bottlenecks, accusing FEMA of ignoring pre-storm offers of aid from Chicago Mayor Richard M. Daley (D), New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson (D) and the American Ambulance Association.

In his last extended TV interview on CNN,Brown admitted Thursday that the federal government did not know that thousands of survivors without food or water had taken shelter at the city's convention center, despite a day of news reports.

Since then, Brown has been eclipsed by his boss, Chertoff -- who flew overnight Sunday to take charge of integrating military with civilian efforts -- and by a new deputy, U.S. Coast Guard Vice Admiral Thad Allen, whom Chertoff named yesterday to take charge of federal recovery efforts in New Orleans.

Bruce P. Baughman, Alabama emergency management director, head of the National Emergency Management Association and the official in charge of FEMA's response to the World Trade Center and Pentagon attacks in 2001, said Katrina will leave its mark on federal disaster management. "It's time to realize, whoever is in charge of FEMA does need an emergency management background. . . . It's something you learn by experience, and a lot of that experience is gone," he said.

Congress Rolls Up Sleeves ... (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, September 6, 2005

Lawmakers are pledging an across-the-board response to help Hurricane Katrina victims recover and to fix problems the storm and its aftermath exposed.

Efforts are likely to include the removal of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) from the Department of Homeland Security to speed recovery efforts and expansion of energy production to areas outside the Gulf of Mexico to ease future price shocks, congressional and outside experts said.

Congressional leaders approved a $10.5 billion aid package last week as relief workers struggled to evacuate hurricane victims in New Orleans and other areas along the Gulf Coast. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said yesterday that the appropriation is the start of an expansive congressional effort to deal with the crisis.

The Senate Homeland Security and Government Affairs Committee is to hold oversight hearings into the aftermath of the hurricane, Frist said. Lessons learned from those hearings will be incorporated into legislation.

In addition, Congress will push an economic stimulus package to include tax breaks to ease the impact of hurricane on the economy.

Even before Frist's press conference yesterday, lawmakers pledged a broad response as images of hurricane victims in New Orleans suffering in increasingly squalid conditions at the Superdome and Convention Center played out nightly on television.

Other lawmakers have said they back bills to shore up an insurance industry that may face a record number of claims and to increase funding for federal flood projects.

House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) said last week that relief for victims of Hurricane Katrina would be Congress's top priority this fall.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and other Democrats asked that a bipartisan task force be created to speed relief efforts.

DOJ_NMG_0002925

"Disasters are revelatory events," said professor Vincent Gawronski of Birmingham Southern College in Alabama, who has studied how governments respond to natural disasters. "Every disaster is an opportunity to reduce vulnerabilities."

"This is going to be a major, major deal," said Bob Livingston, former House Appropriations Committee chairman, of the hurricane's effect.

For Livingston, a Louisiana Republican, the flood had a personal impact. He said a few of his friends were missing as of last week, and his firm's office in New Orleans was flooded.

Congressional experts expect Katrina to set records for relief costs, but money is likely to be only part of the legislative response.

Staff of the Senate Finance and House Ways and Means committees huddled last week to brainstorm over whether any tax assistance would be needed to help people recover from the storm, although a tax package passed after Sept. 11 eliminated taxes on certain disaster payments.

A Senate Armed Services Committee source said members would continue to examine the necessity of a law passed in the wake of the Civil War that may make it more difficult for federal troops to respond to a crisis.

A number of lawmakers also plan to push reforms of the insurance industry to help it pay what may be a record number of claims.

"This is a lot different than anything we've dealt with because it is so widespread," said a Senate Republican committee staff aide who asked not to be identified because he had not been authorized to talk to the press.

Rep. Mark Foley (R), whose home state of Florida suffered through four hurricanes last year, said the scenes of stranded hurricane victims begging for help has persuaded him to introduce a bill to move FEMA, the principal federal entity responsible for relief efforts, back outside of the Department of Homeland Security.

"Whatever planning they anticipated fell woefully short," Foley said.

He said the decision to place FEMA in the department, made in response to another disaster, the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, hampered the agency's ability to respond quickly.

Other lawmakers promised to concentrate on the economic consequences of Katrina.

A particular focus is likely to fall on energy prices, which quickly rose as a number of refineries and oil platforms around the gulf shut down.

Rep. Joe Barton (R-Texas) said Katrina "may finally bring home to the American people how fragile our energy sector is and our energy infrastructure is."

The Gulf Coast is responsible for one-third of the oil and one-fifth of the natural gas that is produced in the country.

Barton's Energy and Commerce Committee and the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee both have planned hearings this week on gasoline prices.

In addition, energy lobbyists are working to attach pro-drilling measure to the budget-reconciliation bill, which already was expected to include a provision to open up the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to drilling.

The effort would give states the chance to open their coasts to oil and gas drilling, something that a federal drilling ban now prevents. Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee Chairman Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) said that, in light of Katrina, the issue should be reexamined.

Even with higher prices, however, getting Congress to agree to more drilling is expected to be an uphill fight, energy lobbyists acknowledge, with strong opposition from the Florida and California delegations.

Democrats, meanwhile, are likely to press for measures that focus on energy conservation measures, including higher fuel-efficiency standards for automobiles, which haven't been increased for more than a decade.

Another focus of congressional attention will fall on the Corps of Engineers, the federal agency principally responsible for flood prevention.

A Senate appropriations staff member said the committee would take another look at the Corps budget.

Advocates said the Corps budget for years has unfairly been a target of budget hawks, who criticized it as a magnet for special projects that don't have much benefit.

"There is a traditional misunderstanding that what is in the Corps budget is pork," said Worth Hager, president of the National Waterways Alliance, a group of industries that rely on America's water system for transportation of goods.

Advertisement Blame Amid The Tragedy (WSJ)

By Bob Williams

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

As the devastation of Hurricane Katrina continues to shock and sadden the nation, the question on many lips is, Who is to blame for the inadequate response?

DOJ_NMG_0002926

As a former state legislator who represented the legislative district most impacted by the eruption of Mount St. Helens in 1980, I can fully understand and empathize with the people and public officials over the loss of life and property.

Many in the media are turning their eyes toward the federal government, rather than considering the culpability of city and state officials. I am fully aware of the challenges of having a quick and responsive emergency response to a major disaster. And there is definitely a time for accountability; but what isn't fair is to dump on the federal officials and avoid those most responsible -- local and state officials who failed to do their job as the first responders. The plain fact is, lives were needlessly lost in New Orleans due to the failure of Louisiana's governor, Kathleen Blanco, and the city's mayor, Ray Nagin.

The primary responsibility for dealing with emergencies does not belong to the federal government. It belongs to local and state officials who are charged by law with the management of the crucial first response to disasters. First response should be carried out by local and state emergency personnel under the supervision of the state governor and his/her emergency operations center.

The actions and inactions of Gov. Blanco and Mayor Nagin are a national disgrace due to their failure to implement the previously established evacuation plans of the state and city. Gov. Blanco and Mayor Nagin cannot claim that they were surprised by the extent of the damage and the need to evacuate so many people. Detailed written plans were already in place to evacuate more than a million people. The plans projected that 300,000 people would need transportation in the event of a hurricane like Katrina. If the plans had been implemented, thousands of lives would likely have been saved.

In addition to the plans, local, state and federal officials held a simulated hurricane drill 13 months ago, in which widespread flooding supposedly trapped 300,000 people inside New Orleans. The exercise simulated the evacuation of more than a million residents. The problems identified in the simulation apparently were not solved.

A year ago, as Hurricane Ivan approached, New Orleans ordered an evacuation but did not use city or school buses to help people evacuate. As a result many of the poorest citizens were unable to evacuate. Fortunately, the hurricane changed course and did not hit New Orleans, but both Gov. Blanco and Mayor Nagin acknowledged the need for a better evacuation plan. Again, they did not take corrective actions. In 1998, during a threat by Hurricane George, 14,000 people were sent to the Superdome and theft and vandalism were rampant due to inadequate security. Again, these problems were not corrected.

The New Orleans contingency plan is still, as of this writing, on the city's Web site, and states: "The safe evacuation of threatened populations is one of the principle [sic] reasons for developing a Comprehensive Emergency Management Plan." But the plan was apparently ignored.

Mayor Nagin was responsible for giving the order for mandatory evacuation and supervising the actual evacuation: His office of Emergency Preparedness (not the federal government) must coordinate with the state on elements of evacuation and assist in directing the transportation of evacuees to staging areas. Mayor Nagin had to be encouraged by the governor to contact the National Hurricane Center before he finally, belatedly, issued the order for mandatory evacuation. And sadly, it apparently took a personal call from the president to urge the governor to order the mandatory evacuation.

The city's evacuation plan states: "The city of New Orleans will utilize all available resources to quickly and safely evacuate threatened areas." But even though the city has enough school and transit buses to evacuate 12,000 citizens per fleet run, the mayor did not use them. To compound the problem, the buses were not moved to high ground and were flooded. The plan also states that "special arrangements will be made to evacuate persons unable to transport themselves or who require specific lifesaving assistance. Additional personnel will be recruited to assist in evacuation procedures as needed." This was not done.

The evacuation plan warned that "if an evacuation order is issued without the mechanisms needed to disseminate the information to the affected persons, then we face the possibility of having large numbers of people either stranded and left to the mercy of a storm, or left in an area impacted by toxic materials." That is precisely what happened because of the mayor's failure.

Instead of evacuating the people, the mayor ordered the refugees to the Superdome and Convention Center without adequate security and no provisions for food, water and sanitary conditions. As a result people died, and there was even rape committed, in these facilities. Mayor Nagin failed in his responsibility to provide public safety and to manage the orderly evacuation of the citizens of New Orleans. Now he wants to blame Gov. Blanco and the Federal Emergency Management Agency. In an emergency the first requirement is for the city's emergency center to be linked to the state emergency operations center. This was not done.

The federal government does not have the authority to intervene in a state emergency without the request of a governor. President Bush declared an emergency prior to Katrina hitting New Orleans, so the only action needed for federal assistance was for Gov. Blanco to request the specific type of assistance she needed. She failed to send a timely request for specific aid.

In addition, unlike the governors of New York, Oklahoma and California in past disasters, Gov. Blanco failed to take charge of the situation and ensure that the state emergency operation facility was in constant contact with Mayor Nagin and FEMA. It is likely that thousands of people died because of the failure of Gov. Blanco to implement the state plan, which mentions the possible need to evacuate up to one million people. The plan clearly gives the governor the authority for declaring an emergency, sending in state resources to the disaster area and requesting necessary federal assistance.

State legislators and governors nationwide need to update their contingency plans and the operation procedures for state emergency centers. Hurricane Katrina had been forecast for days, but that will not always be the case with a disaster (think of terrorist attacks). It must be made clear that the governor and locally elected officials are in charge of the "first response."

I am not attempting to excuse some of the delays in FEMA's response. Congress and the president need to take corrective action there, also. However, if citizens expect FEMA to be a first responder to terrorist attacks or other local emergencies (earthquakes, forest fires, volcanoes), they will be disappointed. The federal government's role is to offer aid upon request.

The Louisiana Legislature should conduct an immediate investigation into the failures of state and local officials to implement the written emergency plans. The tragedy is not over, and real leadership in the state and local government are essential in the months to come. More importantly, the hurricane season is still upon us, and local and state officials must stay focused on the jobs for which they were elected -- and not on the deadly game of passing the emergency buck.

Livingston: I Pressed La. Gov. For Martial Law (HILL)

By Jeff Dufour

The Hill, September 6, 2005

Like thousands of other Washingtonians worried about family and friends in New Orleans after Katrina struck the Crescent City, former Rep. Bob Livingston (R-La.) and his wife, Bonnie, had some uneasy moments last week.

Livingston, the former Appropriations Committee chairman turned successful lobbyist, said his 83-year-old mother escaped to Shreveport with his sister and brother-in-law. His wife's mother, also 83, fled the city just in time.

Livingston had to wait for word of the fate of his oldest son's in-laws. On Friday, he received word that they were safe.

Livingston represented the New Orleans metro area for more than 20 years. He owns a condominium and two rental properties there and feared they were damaged or destroyed.

He was particularly critical of Gov. Kathleen Blanco (D) for failing to declare martial law promptly to deter widespread looting.

"I raised hell with the governor for not declaring martial law," he said Thursday. "I told her last [Wednesday] night I was going on 'Hannity & Colmes' and criticize her for not doing that, and 20 minutes later, she did."

Big is beautiful, preaches lobbyist Berman

Fresh on the heels of the controversial Dove ad campaign featuring overweight women, supersized superlobbyist Michael Berman is telling men it's not a sin to be overweight.

Berman, the larger-than-life president of the Duberstein Group consulting firm, is preparing to hit the book-promotion trail this fall to tout his forthcoming memoir, Living Large: A Big Man's Ideas on Weight, Success and Acceptance.

Berman's publisher, Rodale, calls his book, written with the help of ghostwriter and novelist Laurence Shames, "a poignant, funny and, above all, honest look at obesity from the inside out … as a fat man learns acceptance, loses the guilt and gains the wisdom to manage his weight."

Berman, 66, a former top aide to Vice President Walter Mondale and the scheduler for six Democratic national conventions, is "a self-proclaimed 'fat man' who is also a happy man — successful in his career, marriage and friendships," according to Rodale's publicists.

The book is scheduled for publication next spring, said Berman, whose current weight is 230 pounds, well below his top adult weight of 323 pounds and slightly above his slimmest weight of 215. He's due to have knee-replacement surgery soon.

"My goal is to keep it between 230 and 235 for the next few years," Berman said last week. "That's my optimum working weight."

Living Large isn't Berman's first publishing venture. He writes a monthly newsletter, "Washington Political Watch," mailed to about 750 people.

After taking up photography about 10 years ago as a form of relaxation, Berman also put together a collection of 100 photographs of animals he took at zoos around the world to give as gifts for friends with small children.

As for parents, Berman said, "None of them can name every one of the animals, and I refuse to help them."

Sanders stars in Rolling Stone exposé on legislating

One wouldn't expect to open a magazine featuring "it" band Coldplay on the cover, only to find a feature about decidedly unsexy Rep. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) and the legislative process.

DOJ_NMG_0002928

The Aug. 25 issue of Rolling Stone features a multithousand-word piece by writer Matt Taibbi, earned by following Sanders through the halls of Congress on and off for a month during the flurry of late-summer legislative activity. Together, they turn over some of the ugly stones of lawmaking.

Originally set up through Sanders's ex-press secretary, Joel Barkin, Taibbi arranged for Sanders to be his "tour guide" for a month — "an adult version of 'Schoolhouse Rock.'"

Perhaps goaded by famously liberal Rolling Stone editor Jann Wenner, Taibbi wields a ninja-like assortment of harsh rhetorical weapons against the most powerful Republicans, singling out for special scorn such GOPers as Reps. Jim Sensenbrenner of Wisconsin ("your basic Fat Evil Prick"), David Dreier of California ("a pencil-necked Christian Scientist") and Mike Oxley ("leather-skinned, rotting-from-within type").

Democratic Reps. Jim McGovern (Mass.) and Sherrod Brown (Ohio) come off like heroes, along with Sanders and his entire staff, which posed with the congressman for the piece's lead photo.

As for the fact that the congressman is the only person smiling, while his staff surrounds him in varying states of frowning, Erin Campbell, his current press secretary, said, "I don't know how that happened."

Members blog their cancer experiences

Reps. Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio), Chris Cannon (R-Utah) and Sue Myrick (R-N.C.) are among several

notable Americans to begin writing blogs on cancer for the Yahoo Health website.

Cannon and Pryce both lost daughters to cancer, while Myrick won a bout with breast cancer in 1999.

Myrick's online journal entries are among the most personal, as she not so fondly remembers the days surrounding her diagnosis. "I have a very public job, so was concerned about what to tell the media about my surgery," she writes. "My husband and I discussed it and decided that I had a 'bully pulpit" and should go public if it would help others."

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) is also blogging, about the need for preventive medicine and insurance.

Visitors to each Web log are invited to post comments, most of which have been civil.

The lawmakers will continue posting until the end of September. The blogs are available at blogs.health.yahoo.com/ blog-for-hope.

National Press Club owls give last hoot for nude portrait

A controversial nude painting owned by the National Press Club is on the auction block.

"Phryne," a painting depicting a semi-nude, reclining Greek courtesan, hung in the members' lounge from 1932 to 1982. The work, by Brazilian artist Antonio Parreiras, was initially taken down as part of a club-wide restoration. The club's Silver Owls — 25-plus-year members — raised $8,200 to have it restored and rehung.

But, said Don Larrabee, chairman of the Silver Owls' Fine Arts Committee, the club's board "voted it down, under pressure from a small group of people who objected to having it rehung." He said the charge was led by female members in the 1980s who thought such a painting was inappropriate in that era. Women were first permitted to join the club in 1971. "Phryne" (pronounced "free-nee") has been on loan to the Metropolitan Club of Washington since 1999.

Of the auction, Larrabee said, "The time has come. We knew we were never going to get it back again. The board is not at all interested in having it back."

He said the painting was last appraised for $75,000, but at the auction, to be held Nov. 5-6 at the Sloans and Kenyon Gallery in Bethesda, "we won't even think about anything less than $100,000." Proceeds will go toward a new club archive.

Delays In Relief Spark Worries Of Holes In Homeland Security (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

The federal government's slow response to Hurricane Katrina's devastation of the Gulf Coast is stoking fears that the U.S. is no better prepared to deal with a large-scale terrorist attack than it was four years ago.

The Bush administration has spent billions of dollars developing government agencies and technologies to better predict and respond to disasters since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. But security experts said the delays in helping Katrina's victims in New Orleans and elsewhere along the Gulf Coast indicate the relief process has become more cumbersome, opening opportunities for terrorists.

Business consultants and security experts are advising clients to tighten safety measures since al Qaeda or other terrorist networks might find it advantageous to strike when tens of thousands of federal troops and other homeland-security resources are deployed to Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama. Some figure that terrorists might try an attack tied to the fourth anniversary of the Sept. 11 strikes.

"You'd be remiss not to be particularly prepared at a time like this," said Jonathan Lusher, senior vice president of Illinois-based IPC International Corp., which runs security operations for some of the U.S.'s largest mall complexes, including the New Orleans Center in Louisiana. "Terrorists probably think we're unprepared, and [the response to Katrina] would only confirm this."

Mr. Lusher said his firm is ratcheting up security at the malls, offices and retail outlets where IPC works. He said Washington needs to spend even more money on emergency-relief preparedness as Katrina has exposed serious limitations in the federal government's ability to respond to cataclysmic events. "It's not too far-fetched to see a bigger problem, a dirty bomb or water poisoning" carried out by terrorists, Mr. Lusher said.

Katrina's blow comes as many counterterrorism experts say they are seeing signs of more activity by al Qaeda and other militant Islamist groups. Recent bombings in the United Kingdom and Egypt illustrate that even traditionally well-secured countries can be successfully targeted by suicide bombers, they say. There also is rising concern that the war in Iraq is helping to indoctrinate and train thousands of new militants eager to hurt the U.S. and its allies.

Terrorism experts said they believe al Qaeda's senior command, based in the border areas of Pakistan and Afghanistan, remains active, despite extensive U.S. military operations. While U.S. intelligence officials say it is uncertain whether leader Osama bin Laden himself is coordinating attacks, they say substantial evidence indicates he and his lieutenants are at least communicating with operatives in the field. Last week al Qaeda's second-in-command, Egyptian doctor Ayman al Zawahiri, released a tape urging Muslims world-wide to step up attacks against the European and Middle Eastern allies of the U.S. in an effort to drive coalition forces out of Iraq.

"The terrorist threat has grown, not receded" because of the war in Iraq, said Larry Johnson, a security consultant and former deputy director of the State Department's counterterrorism office. "And if an attack comes now, the capacity of U.S. government to respond will be taxed."

Security analysts said that it is more than just the extension of military personnel that makes the U.S. vulnerable. They said terrorists may be learning from Washington's response to Katrina to exploit previously unknown weaknesses. They said looting that swept across parts of New Orleans and other sections of the Gulf after the hurricane highlighted how law and order can quickly break down in major U.S. cities.

"Terrorists have always been attracted to the idea of creating destruction and disruption on a catastrophic scale," said Brian Jenkins, a counterterrorism expert at Rand Corp., a think tank in Santa Monica, Calif. Katrina proved that "the veneer of civilization is very thin" even in the U.S., Mr. Jenkins said, and that "large cities can come apart quickly."

The humanitarian disaster along the Gulf Coast also could prove to be a propaganda victory for al Qaeda and its affiliates for the longer term. Mr. bin Laden and other Islamic leaders have sought to portray the Bush administration as overextending the U.S. by invading Iraq and potentially draining the world's largest economy of its resources. Al Qaeda also has sought to portray the U.S. leadership as imperialists who are hostile to minority groups globally.

Scenes of largely African-American victims suffering in sports arenas and other makeshift shelters are likely to support al Qaeda's portrayal of the U.S. in some parts of the world, said a number of analysts in Muslim countries. This could play into the recruiting tactics of a number of extremists groups.

In Pakistan, said Talat Masood, a social commentator in Islamabad, people think that "the poor communities have been neglected in America. ... And the capitalist system is very exploitative."

A senior member of Russian President Vladimir Putin's government said yesterday that the Bush administration's inability to help the thousands along the Gulf Coast would embolden terrorists who seek to incapacitate major Western cities. The television scenes were "an extremely unpleasant signal to the terrorist community, because what the world sees, so do they," said Nikolai Spassky, deputy director of Mr. Putin's Security Council, according to the Interfax news agency.

But many security analysts said the U.S. has the resources to concurrently rebuild the Gulf region while guarding against terrorists. The key, they said, is that Washington must better train for calamities and better integrate many of the bureaucracies created since Sept. 11 with local governments.

Senators 'to Demand Answers' On Slow Action (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON — Hurricane Katrina has become the Homeland Security Department's first big test.

Since the department was created after the 9/11 attacks to prevent and respond to catastrophes, it has spent tens of billions of dollars, studied disaster scenarios of every imaginable kind and run some of the nation's biggest emergency response drills.

It should have been ready for just about anything. But it wasn't ready for the power of Katrina.

Today, as workers struggle to provide better relief for survivors, Congress will begin investigating why the government's response was so slow.

Sens. Susan Collins, R-Maine, and Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., leaders of the Senate homeland security committee, will discuss their committee's plan for an inquiry into the response by the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA). The agency is the disaster-response division of the Homeland Security Department.

“We intend to demand answers as to how this immense failure occurred,” the senators said in a statement.

Despite the problems and the criticism, government workers are pushing ahead to help tens of thousands of people put out of their homes.

In the Gulf Coast region, two cruise ships based in Galveston, Texas, began boarding evacuees — 2,600 per ship — and the Postal Service began trying to reconnect evacuees with their mail. Customs officers are expected today at the Astrodome in Houston, where they will deliver 100,000 articles of clothing.

Emergency workers also plan to move people from the Astrodome and other large shelters into smaller community shelters.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, who flew to the gulf region over the weekend to take control of the relief effort, appointed Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen on Monday to run recovery efforts in New Orleans.

Chertoff will fly back to Washington for one day today to meet with members of President Bush's Cabinet and members of Congress.

Some, including Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., say Bush should appoint an independent national commission similar to the commission that investigated the 9/11 attacks. “The slow pace of relief efforts in the face of a mounting death toll … seems to confirm that our ability to respond to cataclysmic disaster has not adequately been addressed,” Clinton wrote in a letter to Bush over the weekend.

The response in New Orleans and throughout the gulf region shows “we're not at all prepared for the big one,” said Randy Larsen of the Homeland Security Institute, a research group.

Brian Besanceney, head of public affairs at the Homeland Security Department, said Katrina and the subsequent flooding in New Orleans caused a level of devastation significantly beyond a terrorist's capability and the slow response should not be taken as an indication that the government isn't equipped to handle another terrorist attack.

Unlike the devastation in New York City on 9/11, which was confined to 16 acres, the wreckage from Katrina spreads over 90,000 square miles and left hundreds of thousands of people homeless.

“This is the type of force that only Mother Nature can really unleash,” Besanceney said. “The sheer geography of it would be very difficult for terrorists to achieve.”

But with a nuclear or large radiological device, or even with a major chemical attack, terrorists could render a city the size of New Orleans uninhabitable. And many of the rescue and recovery issues would be the same: Tens of thousands would need to be rescued, power would be out, areas of the city would be contaminated, mobile hospitals and medical equipment would be needed, and shelter and food would be scarce.

“This damage could just as easily have been caused by a terrorist attack, and many if not most of the same elements are involved in responding to natural disasters,” Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., said.

Kyl also plans hearings as chairman of a terrorism and homeland security subcommittee in the Senate. “We need to understand from the key authorities what went wrong,” he said.

An independent Cabinet-level agency whose chief reported directly to the president during the Clinton administration, FEMA was one of 22 agencies folded into the Homeland Security Department in 2003, and some experts say planning for how to respond to natural disasters took a back seat to planning for various terrorist scenarios.

“If this was a terrorist event, is this the kind of response we would have?” asked James Lee Witt, the FEMA director under Clinton.

He said he doesn't understand why response was so slow. “We knew it was coming, we knew it was going to be a big disaster, we've run these scenarios many times,” he said.

Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., said he'll introduce a bill today that would make FEMA once again an independent, Cabinet-level agency that reports directly to the president.

Behind Poor Katrina Response, A Long Chain Of Weak Links (WSJ)

By Robert Block, Amy Schatz, Gary Fields and Christopher cooper

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

Just two weeks ago, five state emergency managers brought a tough message to a meeting in Washington with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and his top deputies.

"We told them straight out that they were weakening emergency management with potentially disastrous consequences," says Dave Liebersbach, the director of Alaska's Division of Homeland Security and Emergency Management. The department's focus on terrorism was undermining its readiness for other catastrophes, said the visiting officials, who included emergency managers from Mississippi and Alabama.

Now that Hurricane Katrina has left the Gulf Coast flooded and New Orleans in ruins, the question ricocheting around the nation and the world is this: How could the world's biggest superpower fail so badly in protecting and rescuing its residents from a natural disaster so frequently foretold?

The answer is sure to receive intense scrutiny this fall in Congress and around the nation, especially given revived fears that the U.S. is ill-prepared for a terrorist attack. "We are going to take a hard, hard look at our disaster-response procedures," said Republican Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee this weekend as he assisted patients at the New Orleans airport.

Yesterday, the government moved aggressively to show it has the situation in hand. President Bush paid his second visit to the region in four days, visiting Baton Rouge, La., and Poplarville, Miss. He asserted that federal, state and local governments are "doing the best we can." The major levee breach in New Orleans, at the 17th Street Canal, was closed, allowing the city to begin pumping out floodwaters, a process expected to take about 30 days.

Meanwhile, thousands of federal troops appeared to be firmly in control of the city, with most residents evacuated and searches for survivors well underway. A Customs and Border Protection aircraft operating as a flying communication link gave first responders in New Orleans the ability to communicate for the first time since Katrina struck more than a week ago. In suburban Jefferson Parish, thousands of residents were allowed to check their homes under tight restrictions to evaluate what was left.

But the weekend's progress hasn't erased the troubling questions left by the government's delayed understanding of the scope of the damage last week and its initial slowness in mounting rescues and bringing food and water to stricken citizens. The problems include:

· The decision to transform the Federal Emergency Management Agency from a cabinet-level agency reporting directly to the president to just one piece of a new, gargantuan Department of Homeland Security, which altered FEMA's mission and watered down its powers.

· Too few helicopters stationed in the Gulf Coast area ahead of the storm.

· A military stretched by wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, which left commanders near New Orleans reluctant to commit some active-duty units at nearby Fort Polk, La., because they were in the midst of preparing for an Afghan deployment this winter.

· A total breakdown of communications systems, an echo of the problems that faced New York officials dealing with the 2001 terrorist attacks and a system the government has been trying to fix for four years.

· Poor coordination among federal, state and local officials in the days immediately before and after the hurricane.

· Failure at all levels of government to take seriously many studies and reports over many years warning of the potential disaster.

Indeed, despite many warnings of the dangers, Mr. Chertoff and other administration officials have explained their poor initial response by saying government planners didn't expect both a serious hurricane and a breach in levees. "This is really one which I think was breathtaking in its surprise," Mr. Chertoff told reporters on Saturday.

Planners, he said, "were confronted with a second wave that they did not have built into the plan, but using the tools they had, we have to move forward and adapt."

Plenty of missteps at the local level contributed to last week's disaster too, from a failure to take basic steps to protect the telecom infrastructure to inadequate food and water at the Superdome. New Orleans may be able to stage events such as Mardi Gras and Jazzfest and provide parking, crowd control and adequate toilets for millions of visitors, but its hurricane plan was more rudimentary. "Get people to higher ground and have the feds and the state airlift supplies to them -- that was the plan, man," Mayor Ray Nagin said in an interview yesterday.

But so far, the federal government is bearing the brunt of criticism, given its vast resources and unique role in responding to major disasters. Critics say the response shows that the nation's disaster-response system, rebuilt in the wake of the 2001 terrorist attacks, is woefully inadequate. In a Washington Post-ABC News poll taken on Friday, the public said by a 67% to 31% margin that the federal government wasn't adequately prepared for Katrina.

"What the events of the last week have shown is that over the last few years since 9/11 we have slowly disassembled our national emergency response system and put in its place something far inferior," says Bill Waugh, an academic expert on emergency management at Georgia State University. "We reinvented the wheel when we didn't need to and now have something that doesn't roll very well at all."

Many of last week's problems are rooted in January 2003, when the Bush administration, urged on by some members of Congress, created the Homeland Security Department. It amalgamated 22 agencies, from the Coast Guard to the Secret Service, creating the largest government bureaucracy since the Pentagon was formed in 1947.

From the start, emergency experts and even the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, warned that a special effort was needed to be sure FEMA's traditional mission of providing disaster relief wasn't lost in the shuffle.

But it was. FEMA's clout had long depended on its ability to help states plan for natural disasters by providing emergency preparedness grants and other resources. Under Homeland Security, grant-making decisions were transferred to a new, department-wide office in an attempt to consolidate funding. As a result, FEMA lost control of more than $800 million in preparedness grants since 2003, congressional figures show.

Focus on Terrorism

State emergency managers and congressional investigators say the overwhelming focus for grants is now on fighting terrorism. More money goes to local police and fire departments for that mission than responding to and recover from disasters.

Officials from Shelby County, Ala., for instance, last year said they could get federal money for chemical suits. But they were unable to get money for an emergency operations center that could link computers, phones and televisions to respond to tornadoes. Between 1957 and 2003, the county had 20 tornadoes that it said killed 11 people and caused more than $32 million in damages.

Meanwhile, morale at FEMA has dropped since it was subsumed by Homeland Security. Several key jobs are unfilled and its executives are overtaxed. Its acting chief operating officer in Washington, for instance, is also the director of FEMA's Atlanta region; his seat there is being held by another acting director. That area includes much of the hurricane-prone Southeast.

In July, Mr. Chertoff unveiled a departmental restructuring that would cement FEMA's reduced role. Among other moves, the plan restricted FEMA's purview to disaster response, stripping away longstanding functions such as helping communities build houses outside flood zones.

The plan, he told Congress, was "to take out of FEMA a couple of elements that were really not related to its core missions, that were generally focused on the issue of preparedness in a way that I think was frankly more of a distraction to FEMA than an enhancement to FEMA."

'Extremely Negative Impact'

On July 27, Alaska's Mr. Liebersbach, in his role as the head of the National Emergency Management Association, an association of state emergency management directors, warned in a letter to Congress that Mr. Chertoff's plan was nothing short of disastrous. It would have "an extremely negative impact on the people of this nation," he wrote.

"The proposed reorganization increases the separation between preparedness, response and recovery functions," the letter said. "Any unnecessary separation of these functions will result in disjointed response and adversely impact the effectiveness of departmental operations." It was the letter that prompted the meetings with Homeland Security officials in late August.

Last week's response certainly revealed cracks in the current system. Though President Bush declared a state of emergency before Katrina made landfall on Monday, officials appear to have underestimated the severity of the damage caused by the storm. By Tuesday it became clear that the response was not meeting needs and that FEMA and Louisiana emergency teams were overwhelmed. Then the flood waters hit in New Orleans. It still took several more hours for Mr. Chertoff to declare the disaster an "incident of national significance."

Even then, some requirements hampered speed. Because of worries that terrorists could take advantage of such chaos, FEMA now must abide by post-9/11 security procedures, such as putting air marshals on flights. That meant stranded residents couldn't be evacuated from the New Orleans airport until FEMA had rounded up dozens of Transportation Security Administration screeners and more than 50 federal air marshals. Inadequate power prevented officials from firing up X-ray machines and metal detectors until the government decided evacuees could be searched manually.

Slow Off the Mark

In the hours before and after Katrina struck, there weren't firm procedures in place for directing people and materials. Dan Wessel, owner of Cool Express Inc., a Blue River, Wis., transportation company that contracts with FEMA to move supplies, said he didn't get a green light to send trucks to a staging area in Dallas until about 4 p.m. Monday, hours after Katrina made landfall. That was too late to meet a deadline of getting trucks to Dallas by noon Tuesday, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0002933

Once the trucks arrived, drivers often found no National Guard troops, FEMA workers or other personnel on hand to help unload the water and ice, Mr. Wessel said. "I almost told the guys to leave, but people are wanting the water," he said. "The drivers distributed it."

Inside New Orleans, said Dr. Joseph Guarisco, chief of the emergency department of Ochsner Clinic Foundation, a 580-bed hospital in New Orleans above the water line, said there was confusion about where to direct evacuees seeking shelter.

'There's No One There'

For a couple of days, Dr. Guarisco said, he directed a stream of patients to what he understood was a FEMA mass-casualty tent at the intersection of Interstate 10 and Causeway Boulevard. "A number came back and said, 'there's no one there.' " Dr. Guarisco said.

Some critics have blamed the war in Iraq, and the deployment of thousands of troops, including National Guard members, to that effort. President Bush has vehemently denied that charge. The administration has said problems on the ground were due to an unexpectedly severe storm and unanticipated flooding.

Four weeks before the hurricane, Lt. Colonel Pete Schneider, of the Louisiana National Guard, told WGNO, a local ABC affiliate, that when guard members left for Iraq last October, they took a lot of needed equipment with them, including dozens of high-water vehicles, Humvees, refueling tankers and generators that would be needed in the event a major natural disaster hit the state.

"You've got combatant commanders over there who need it, they say they need it, they don't want to lose what they have and we certainly understand that," he said. "It's a matter of us educating that combatant commander [that] we need it back here as well."

Col. Schneider also said the state had enough equipment to get by, and that if Louisiana were to get hit by a major hurricane, the neighboring states of Mississippi, Alabama and Florida had all agreed to help. In the end, those states were hit by Katrina as well.

The U.S. Army has a large facility, Fort Polk, in Leesville, La., about 270 miles northwest of New Orleans. Officials at Fort Polk, which has nearly 8,000 active-duty soldiers, said their contribution so far has consisted of a few dozen soldiers from the 10th Mountain Division manning purification equipment and driving half-ton trucks filled with supplies and equipment. The first contingent of soldiers didn't receive orders until Saturday afternoon.

A spokeswoman at Fort Polk said she did not know why the base received its deployment orders so late in the game. "You'd have to ask the Pentagon," she said. A senior Army official said the service was reluctant to commit the 4th brigade of the 10th Mountain Division from Fort Polk, because the unit, which numbers several thousand soldiers, is in the midst of preparing for an Afghanistan deployment in January.

Instead, the Pentagon chose to send upwards of 7,500 soldiers from the 1st Cavalry Division at Fort Hood, Texas and the 82nd Airborne Division from Fort Bragg, N.C., along with Marines from California and North Carolina. Soldiers from the 82nd Airborne Division are able to deploy anywhere in the world in 18 hours. It took several days for them to arrive on the ground in Louisiana.

Helicopters Proved Crucial

There, no piece of equipment was more necessary than helicopters. But in the first 48 hours after the levees were breached, the shortage of helicopters became acute. FEMA wanted choppers to save stranded residents, while the Army Corps of Engineers needed the aircraft, known as "rotary wing" in military jargon, to repair the breaches. The Coast Guard, the primary agency responding to the disaster in New Orleans, had a total of 20 aircraft in the area, mostly helicopters, which focused solely on rescue operations.

"We have very limited aviation assets and rotary wing is what we need to put materials into those breaches, and that's the very asset we need to do search and rescue and save victims, so our efforts became something of a second priority and our initial plan was delayed a bit because of that," says Lt. Gen. Carl Strock, commander of the Army Corps of Engineers.

A FEMA spokesman said the Coast Guard and National Guard had adequate numbers of helicopters on hand, but that rescue and supply operations were hampered by other factors, including limited airspace around New Orleans, which is geographically small. "You put in 30 helicopters in that area and you create a dangerous situation," said the spokesman, Marty Bahamonde.

On the supply front, helicopters flew food to the Superdome, he said, but the helipad there could only accommodate small aircraft, which couldn't hold many supplies.

Communications systems also broke down, as they did at the World Trade Center in 2001, preventing emergency officials from communicating with each other and the military. That led to the odd juxtaposition of top federal officials praising the rescue effort and denying problems at New Orleans' overcrowded convention center while TV cameras showed people there crying for help.

DOJ_NMG_0002934

Radio Systems Lacking

Flooding and power shortages appear to be behind most of the serious communications problems, but incompatible radio systems didn't help.

Emergency responders in New Orleans and three nearby parishes all use different radio systems. New Orleans and nearby Jefferson Parish both use radios that operate on the 800 Mhz band, according to a Louisiana State Police interoperability report, but they were manufactured by different vendors. That means officials there had up to five channels on which to talk to one another.

"Communication is always difficult in emergency situations because of increased traffic," says William Vincent of the Lafayette Office of Homeland Security and Emergency Preparedness, about 135 miles from New Orleans. Emergency 911 dispatchers in Lafayette fielded calls from New Orleans residents who still had working cellphones but couldn't reach local police.

New Orleans officials had equipment at the fire department's communication center that could link otherwise incompatible local and federal systems. It was reportedly knocked out by flooding.

Another problem: Even after 9/11, local officials and federal emergency responders don't typically use the same radio frequencies, which can make communication difficult until agreements are reached on sharing channels.

As handheld radios began losing power in New Orleans, police officers and other emergency responders had no way of recharging them. Unlike radios used by firefighters combating wild fires, which can be powered by disposable batteries found in any grocery store, a typical handheld police emergency radio uses rechargeable batteries similar to those powering cell phones, according to Ron Haraseth, director of automated frequency coordination at the Association of Public-Safety Communications Officers.

Bad Information

FEMA itself seemed to frequently have bad information. At a Tuesday press conference Bill Lokey, federal coordinating officer for FEMA and the agency representative on site, downplayed the severity of the flooding caused by the breaches in New Orleans, saying the water wasn't rising in most areas. "I don't want to alarm everybody that, you know, New Orleans is filling up like a bowl," he said. "That's just not happening."

Within hours, much of the city was under water, and Mr. Lokey was calling Katrina "the most significant natural disaster to hit the United States."

The possible problems had long been trumpeted. In June 2004, FEMA spent more than half a million dollars to commission a "catastrophic hurricane disaster plan" from IEM Inc., a Baton Rouge-based emergency-management and homeland-security consulting firm. A report analyzing results of a mock hurricane hitting New Orleans, dubbed "Hurricane Pam," was envisioned and a response and recovery plan was to be drawn up.

During a five-day mock exercise in July 2004, emergency-management responders huddled in Baton Rouge to plan a response to "Hurricane Pam," a Category 3 storm which featured 120 miles per hour winds and a storm surge that topped New Orleans's levees. For reasons that aren't clear, the mock exercise never anticipated the levees giving way, despite such warnings. Even so, the mock hurricane destroyed 500,000 buildings in New Orleans and displaced one million residents.

The group developed a plan to get stranded residents out of the way and construction of a "command structure" with enough space for upwards of 800 rescue workers. A report, dated Jan. 5 of this year, detailed recommendations from the exercise and was provided to FEMA, an IEM spokeswoman said. FEMA has not released the report.

Need Fed Probe Into Crisis - Hil (NYDN)

By Michael McAuliff

New York Daily News, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON - With many blaming the growing scope of Katrina's devastation on the Bush administration, Sen. Hillary Clinton called yesterday for a 9/11-style probe into how the federal government responded to the crisis.

"It has become increasingly evident that our nation was not prepared," Clinton (D-N.Y.) said in a letter to Bush asking him to set up a "Katrina Commission."

"The slow pace of relief efforts in the face of a mounting death toll ... seems to confirm that our ability to respond to cataclysmic disasters has not been adequately addressed," she said.

Her call echoed statements of Republicans such as Arizona's Sen. John Kyl, chairman of the Technology and Homeland Security Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee, who plans a hearing and has said the catastrophe in New Orleans could have a lot in common with a terror attack.

A White House spokeswoman deferred comment to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, who appeared on numerous Sunday morning broadcasts insisting there would be time to lay blame later.

DOJ_NMG_0002935

Clinton has decided at least one thing without waiting for any commission reports. She said she plans to introduce legislation to split the Federal Emergency Management Agency out of the Department of Homeland Security and give it back a cabinet-level director like it had in her husband's administration.

FEMA Fails Katrina Victims (USAT)

USA Today, September 6, 2005

After the hurricane and killer floods, New Orleans was victimized by another disaster — the disaster response itself.

Every level of government that was supposed to prepare for the storm and its aftermath failed miserably. All were unwilling to make the expensive commitments to shore up vulnerable levees or replenish vanishing wetlands that left New Orleans so open to flooding. There was no logical plan to evacuate the city, particularly those too sick, poor or stubborn to leave.

When it became clear that tens of thousands were marooned, the federal government was unprepared to rush life-saving supplies to the city's Superdome and convention center, to rescue the stranded and sick or keep order in the streets.

Images that brought to mind catastrophes in Third World nations shot around the world — making the inept response of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) not only a human tragedy but also an international embarrassment for the USA.

That bungled response should serve as an alert to the rest of the nation. After spending four years and tens of billions of dollars since 9/11 on "all-hazards preparedness," FEMA's parent, the Homeland Security Department, failed its first major test.

The past week's performance raises many questions, among them:

· If national authorities could not adequately respond to an anticipated threat from a hurricane, how can they possibly be ready to deal with a surprise nuclear or biological attack by terrorists?

· Has FEMA's leadership been politicized, and is it up to the task? According to news reports, the agency's head, Michael Brown, had been supervising horse-show judges in Colorado before he was called to Washington in 2001 to work for an old friend, then the head of FEMA. Brown, with little disaster experience, quickly rose to be the agency's deputy director and then its leader. In the first days of the crisis, FEMA's decision-making appeared tentative and confused, with fatal consequences.

· Has putting FEMA in the new Homeland Security Department undermined its ability to respond to natural disasters? According to a Government Accountability Office report, 75% of the agency's 2006 budget for preparedness grants is focused on terrorism.

Disaster experts will tell you that responding to any catastrophe requires the same elements — evacuation, rescue, emergency supplies and security.

After 9/11, the nation should not have needed a second wake-up call. Having gotten one, it's time to dissect this failure, establish accountability and ensure that it won't happen again.

Hurricane Reorders Capitol Hill Agenda (WSJ)

By David Rogers And John J. Fialka

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON -- After approving a cash infusion for hurricane relief, Congress is focusing on three legislative priorities for responding to Katrina: moving energy supplies, resettling displaced people, and restoring economically critical Gulf ports.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) said the chamber's primary legislative business will include hurricane-related measures and appropriations bills. Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R., Mo.) said the House may consider legislation designed to ease supply by expanding on the administration's authority to waive fuel standards and environmental requirements. Lawmakers also will weigh allowing exploration for oil and gas along the coast of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska, and letting states lease federal offshore land to companies exploring for natural gas along the Atlantic, Pacific and Gulf coasts.

"We can put that on the table very quickly," said House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman Joe Barton of Texas, citing support for the offshore-leasing proposal from Resources Chairman Rep. Richard Pombo of California. Coastal states with big tourism industries, such as Florida, are likely to resist on environmental grounds.

Returning House and Senate leaders are to meet today with President Bush on the government's response, and the agenda is very different from the one lawmakers anticipated after passing energy legislation over the summer and counting on addressing tax cuts, immigration, Social Security and the Supreme Court in the fall. Mr. Frist said yesterday that he would delay indefinitely a vote scheduled for today on the estate tax.

Confirmation hearings for Judge John Roberts, nominated by President Bush first to be an associate justice of the Supreme Court and then to be Chief Justice of the United States, are expected to be postponed until next week. Mr. Frist said no hearings will be held until after the funeral tomorrow of Chief Justice William Rehnquist, and leadership aides predicted that the proceedings will now begin Monday.

Lawmakers instead will be working on legislation to help evacuees move across state lines while retaining benefits to help them build new lives. No measure can ensure immediate relief from gas prices squeezing motorists around the country, but lawmakers hope to begin breaking the bottlenecks that threaten the movement of fuel, as well as the transportation of Midwestern agricultural products.

Rep. Barton's panel and the Senate Energy Committee will hold back-to-back energy hearings this week. "There are going to be questions about what major oil companies are doing with all of the resources they're accumulating," said Sen. Pete Domenici (R., N.M.), chairman of the Senate panel. Mr. Frist said that when he spoke with constituents even days before the hurricane, "The No. 1 issue on people's minds was the price of gas."

But with lawmakers unlikely to seek price caps, the committees will hear ideas aimed at limiting consumption. "We need to address the demand side," says John Dowd, a Wall Street energy analyst for Sanford C. Bernstein & Co. who favors consideration of higher automobile fuel-efficiency standards and decreased speed limits on interstate highways.

The Republican majority -- traditionally hostile to such approaches -- may pursue tax cuts to ease the price squeeze. Mr. Blunt said a potential stimulus package could include tax relief for transportation and airline companies affected by high prices and supply disruptions.

Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.) said the distribution problems following Katrina underscore the need to disperse U.S. refinery capacity around the nation more. "What are the problems that prevent us from building new refineries? ... We need to look at that," Mr. Hastert said. "Maybe we need to make it a little easier to site a refinery and get it up and running."

In addition to energy matters, lawmakers will help relief agencies find a path to resettle a large, often lower-income population displaced by the hurricane and facing huge hurdles before returning home soon. Among the challenges for Congress is to help these people set up new lives with minimal disruption of income, unemployment, nutrition or health-care benefits even as they cross state lines.

A single mother with children, for example, might be taken from New Orleans to the Astrodome but then want to settle with relatives in Arkansas. "You can't keep people in the Astrodome, obviously," said Mr. Hastert and lawmakers are expected to give greater authority to agencies to waive core residency and paperwork requirements that must be met to qualify for this assistance. Beyond waivers, Democrats say Washington must be willing to pick up more of the state share of these benefits since the storm-hit states are in financial trouble and states that welcome displaced families will want some assurance that they aren't assuming an impossible burden.

For example, unemployment, Medicaid and the welfare program, Temporary Assistance for Needy Families, all depend on some employer or state contribution that the federal government may have to absorb. Mr. Blunt said private charities could help by providing transportation for families to relocate. But House Republican and Democratic leaders have asked staff to develop a list of what waivers may need to be authorized quickly.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D., Calif.) has urged the creation of a task force representing the major committees to expedite matters. Based on his experience after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Mr. Hastert may be more inclined to work through individual committees, but also streamline the process by bringing Senate and House chairmen together at the outset.

Despite a budget deficit exceeding $300 billion, "money is not going to be the question," said House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis of California. That is because disparate political forces are converging, producing what most expect will be a record investment by the government. Republicans are themselves stung by the public criticism and Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Thad Cochran (R., Miss.) is from the affected region and commands a huge reservoir of support in Congress.

Also, Midwest farm interests represented by Republicans like Messrs. Hastert and Blunt have a major stake in reconstructing New Orleans. Another port -- Gulfport, Miss. -- is crucial to Southern poultry interests, but New Orleans has a wider regional reach, handling 71% of corn and 65% of soybean exports last year.

The disruptions have hit Midwest farmers at a difficult time. Storage facilities already are strained from big crops last year, and commodity prices have been falling amid efforts to empty grain elevators in time for new crops. If sales can't be completed, there is a risk of grain being stored outside, thereby reducing its value and the return to the farmer.

With rising energy and fertilizer prices and a summer drought in the eastern Midwest, including Speaker Hastert's Illinois district, there are sure to be demands for expanded agriculture assistance as part of any disaster package. Mr. Hastert indicated as much in an interview Friday, where he said the adverse effect of the port's closing on shipments should be considered.

Republicans Halt Death-tax Discussion (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 6, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0002937

Senate Republicans agreed yesterday to postpone consideration of the bill to fully and permanently repeal the death tax that had been scheduled for this week.

Majority Leader Bill Frist promised to return to the bill as soon as possible but wanted to clear the legislative decks this week -- lawmakers' first after a month's recess -- to consider what could be done to help deal with the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

"The Senate will move from its previously scheduled agenda for Tuesday, September 6, and instead consider a resolution expressing the sympathy of the Senate for the victims of Hurricane Katrina," he said yesterday.

The decision by Mr. Frist of Tennessee comes in response to requests by Minority Leader Harry Reid and other Democrats who wanted the vote on the death-tax repeal to be delayed in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

"It doesn't look right," Mr. Reid of Nevada said yesterday.

He also endorsed the idea of creating a "Katrina Commission" to explore how the rescue and relief efforts could have been improved in the hours and days immediately after last week's hurricane.

"We're learning serious mistakes were made, and I don't think that is subject for debate," Mr. Reid said. "Those who put politics ahead of people in dire need must be held accountable."

Mr. Reid declined to say to whom he was referring except to express dismay that some have blamed local officials for failing to evacuate the city of New Orleans and maintain order.

Now is not the time for assigning blame, he said

Then Mr. Reid, like many lawmakers, went on to blame the federal government for a sluggish response.

"I think this is a federal responsibility," he said. "This is a huge federal issue and I think the federal government has not responded properly."

Some of the harshest political criticism came last week from members of the Congressional Black Caucus.

"Many of these Americans who now are struggling to survive are Americans of color," said Rep. Elijah E. Cummings, Maryland Democrat. "Their cries for assistance confront America with a test of our moral compass as a nation."

He also quoted the admonition of Christ to feed the hungry and clothe the naked, saying: "To the president of the United States, I simply say that God cannot be pleased with our response."

Congress Reworks Agenda To Focus On Relief (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON — Responding to the devastation of Hurricane Katrina and the death of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, congressional leaders announced today that they were retooling their legislative agenda to give top priority to storm relief and recovery measures.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said he would cancel a vote scheduled for this week on repealing the estate tax — a controversial measure that Democrats had decried as inappropriate relief for the wealthy at a time when so many poor storm victims are suffering in the South.

Frist also announced the postponement of confirmation hearings on the nomination of John G. Roberts Jr. to the U.S. Supreme Court, which had been scheduled to start Tuesday. Roberts, initially Bush's pick to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, was tapped today to succeed Rehnquist, who died Saturday night, as chief justice of the United States.

Frist said the decision to postpone the hearings' start — at least until Thursday, but not beyond Monday — was to honor Rehnquist and not in response to some Democrats' contention that more preparation time is needed now that Roberts is being considered for the court's top post.

Rehnquist will lie in repose at the Supreme Court on Tuesday and Wednesday morning. His funeral will be held Wednesday afternoon, followed by burial at Arlington National Cemetery.

The agenda changes come on the eve of Congress' return from a month-long August recess — a return that will be marked by a striking change in political climate. Republicans left town at the end of July buoyed by their success in passing energy, highway and trade legislation and eager to tackle other priorities, such as overhauling Social Security and repealing the estate tax.

But as they reconvene this week, their agenda and mood will be darkened by more sobering realities: a vast swath of the U.S. ravaged by Katrina; skyrocketing gas prices; the death of the chief justice; and spreading turmoil in Iraq.

In an unusual Labor Day news conference, Frist declared that Congress' new priority would be funding the relief efforts for hurricane victims and reconstruction of the battered Gulf Coast.

House and Senate leaders called Congress back into session last week to approve $10.5 billion to aid hurricane victims. Frist said another round of funding would be provided "when needed," but he did not say when or how much.

DOJ_NMG_0002938

The entire Senate will be briefed by top Cabinet officials, including Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, on the recovery effort in the South. And the Senate is expected to pass a measure designed to help the storm-ravaged region reestablish its court system: The bill, which may also clear the House on Tuesday, would allow district, circuit and bankruptcy courts to relocate and operate outside their jurisdictions.

On Wednesday, Frist said, the Senate will honor Rehnquist and adjourn for his funeral. Then it will take up a routine appropriations bill that could be a vehicle for additional funding for small business loans and for state and local law enforcement agencies.

Frist has asked committee chairmen to make recommendations on measures that could be approved to help storm recovery, possibly including emergency aid for housing, unemployment insurance, healthcare, protection against price gouging and tax incentives for job creation.

In postponing the scheduled vote on repealing the estate tax, Frist did not say exactly when the Senate would return to the issue, but he denied he was acting in response to political pressure from Democrats.

Earlier in the day, the Senate's Democratic leader, Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, issued the latest in a series of demands that Frist cancel the vote on grounds that it would be "inappropriate and insensitive" to hurricane victims.

House leaders, so far, have announced no immediate changes in their legislative agenda.

Competition Starts In Congress To Aid Victims And To Investigate The Response (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 5 - Congressional leaders of the two parties raced on Monday to spell out competing plans to help victims of Hurricane Katrina, offering proposals for emergency health care, housing and economic support, among other initiatives.

Republicans said committees would announce plans for hearings into the apparently flawed response and increasing oil and gasoline prices.

Democrats said they expected the aftermath of the storm to be a reminder of the importance of federal power in the hearings on the selection of Judge John G. Roberts Jr. for the Supreme Court. Lawmakers postponed confirmation hearings for Judge Roberts, whom President Bush tapped on Monday to succeed Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who died on Saturday.

Pushed aside are Republican plans to try to repeal the estate tax.

"We are going to take a hard, hard look at our disaster response" at the local and federal level, the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist, said Monday at a news conference.

Mr. Frist said he expected the Senate energy committee to look at "price gouging, the excessive oil profits and what responsibility oil companies have in the skyrocketing fuel prices."

Mr. Frist, a physician who visited the region to help treat victims, said the Senate would pass measures to allow courts whose buildings were destroyed to meet in other jurisdictions. He said Senate committees would take up bills to give aid to storm victims, rebuild public works, revive the regional economy and prepare for future disasters.

Congressional leaders are to meet President Bush on Tuesday to discuss relief efforts, and a group of cabinet secretaries, including Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, are to brief the full Senate at the end of the day.

Senator Harry Reid, the minority leader, called for an investigation of the disaster response by a commission modeled after the 9/11 panel. Mr. Reid faulted the White House as failing to take responsibility.

"The buck stops at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue," he said.

At a news conference, Mr. Reid presented a package of emergency measures for storm victims, including dropping some residency and documentation requirements for Medicaid, easing access to Medicare drug benefits, increasing federal financial support for affected states and health care providers, providing emergency vouchers for housing, making federal payments to victims, and creating tax incentives to encourage people to take in the displaced.

In an interview, Mr. Reid also said Democrats were weighing measures to lower gasoline costs, including a proposal by Senator Carl Levin of Michigan for a price cap.

"That is on the table," Mr. Reid said. "We have to do something to address gas prices."

Bob Stevenson, a spokesman for Mr. Frist, said the proposed hearings on the oil crisis would seek to determine the cause of the price increases and the proper responses.

"Oil companies," Mr. Stevenson said, "have a responsibility to ensure that the prices reflected at the pump are at reasonable levels, and should that not be the case, I would expect there could be hell to pay in Congress."

DOJ_NMG_0002939

House Republican leaders have said they will move immediately to pass relief measures in concert with the Senate while House committees hold investigations into the hurricane response and gasoline prices.

The House minority leader, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, called for a bipartisan group of House members to investigate the response and recommend emergency legislation.

"Waiting for multiple committees to act on a crisis of such breadth is not acceptable," Ms. Pelosi wrote in a letter to House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Republican of Illinois.

Mr. Frist and Mr. Reid agreed to postpone the confirmation hearings for Judge Roberts until after Chief Justice Rehnquist's funeral on Wednesday.

But Democratic and Republican aides said the parties were negotiating whether to take up the hearings on Thursday or on next Monday.

Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee who have been seeking more time to look into Judge Roberts's positions are pushing for the longer postponement. But aides involved in the negotiations said the Republicans wanted to begin as soon as possible, unless the Democrats committed to a final floor vote on confirmation by the end of the month.

Democrats are refusing a firm deadline to retain the threat of a filibuster, blocking confirmation by refusing to close debate, even though several Democratic senators have said such a move is extremely unlikely.

Whenever the hearings begin, Senator Charles E. Schumer, a New York Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, said, Democrats are quite likely to bring up Hurricane Katrina in the debate.

"One of the major controversies in the court is how strong should the federal government be," Mr. Schumer said, "and the hurricane has just made an argument, a devastating argument, that the federal government should be more powerful."

Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, another Democrat on the committee, suggested in a statement that the hearings should be further deferred while the public focused on the storm and mourned Chief Justice Rehnquist.

"In the midst of a national disaster of biblical proportions," Mr. Kennedy said, "it is difficult for the American people to participate fully in the selection of the next chief justice, one of the most important positions in our government and the chief protector of our Constitution."

Apparently trying to turn the debate on Judge Roberts into leverage over the president's next selection for the Supreme Court, Mr. Kennedy also argued that the Senate should withhold a vote on his confirmation until the naming of the next choice.

"We should know whom the president intends to propose," Mr. Kennedy said. "The American people care deeply about the overall balance of their highest court and its dedication as an institution to the protection of their rights."

Asked about that argument, Mr. Reid said, "Senator Kennedy has his opinions, and that is something we will talk about" at the caucus meeting on Tuesday.

Congress Comes Back To A Busy Agenda (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, September 6, 2005

Congress returns today from its August vacation to tackle a mountain of leftover legislative business, plus an even bigger challenge: a massive recovery package for the Gulf Coast cities that were flattened and flooded by Hurricane Katrina.

Awaiting action when lawmakers reconvene is Judge John G. Roberts Jr.'s Supreme Court nomination, a budget-cutting reconciliation bill filled with legislative riders that include oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, a phaseout or reduction of the estate tax, Social Security reform to let workers invest in U.S. Treasury bills, reauthorization of the Patriot Act, and a renewed crackdown on illegal aliens.

President Bush has had a string of legislative victories over the past eight months that included an overhaul of the bankruptcy laws, legal class-action reforms, a massive transportation bill and the Central American Free Trade Agreement.

But the next four months are expected to be far more contentious as a result of the decline in Mr. Bush's job-approval rating, which is hovering around 40 percent, and the increasing polarization in Congress, congressional strategists say.

"There will be a Republican leadership meeting Tuesday to discuss the fall agenda that will include immigration, appropriation bills, reconciliation and potential action on Social Security," said Ron Bonjean, chief spokesman for House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican.

"On top of that, we will be evaluating the needs of Hurricane Katrina's victims and working to get the areas affected by the hurricane back on [their] feet," he said.

Congress quickly approved an interim $10.5 billion assistance bill last week as the first step in the early recovery efforts, but congressional officials said a far more expansive aid package is expected in the next several weeks after further assessment of the damage caused by the Category 4 hurricane.

DOJ_NMG_0002940

Other senior leadership officials said Friday there could be additional assistance to counter any downturn in the economy as a result of the disruptions in oil production in the Gulf of Mexico or the impact of higher fuel prices on key sectors of the nation's transportation and industrial sectors.

Some congressional aides, however, question whether a divided Congress will be able to handle both a massive regional recovery bill and everything else already on its plate in the final four months of this legislative session.

"Do you think we're going to be able to pass substantial Medicaid cuts and Social Security reform in the middle of this? You can't put that much on the plate," Steve Bell, New Mexico's Sen. Pete V. Domenici's chief of staff, told the Los Angeles Times.

Not a problem, said House Majority Leader Tom DeLay.

"We can do two things at the same time. We're going to keep our agenda moving," he said Friday.

But House Majority Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri said: "Some committees may have to reprioritize their agenda" to deal with the massive recovery programs that Congress will have to undertake.

"I think this is going to take some time. Now, how much it slows our September-October schedule, I don't know," Mr. Blunt said.

Mike Franc, senior congressional analyst at the Heritage Foundation, said, "A lot of the president's remaining agenda will be overshadowed by what happens in the Gulf of Mexico. If the federal response and the way everything is handled is done competently and effectively, that's going to be a major feather in Bush's cap."

As for the remaining agenda, Mr. Franc said nothing else "stands out as a particularly unique challenge."

"It's more of a steady-as-you-go period. Social Security could turn out to be a major achievement," he said.

Oregon Lawmaker Warned Of Danger Faced By New Orleans (HILL)

By Bob Cusack

The Hill, September 6, 2005

For years, Louisiana lawmakers have warned of a possible flooding disaster in New Orleans.

But one of the most outspoken legislators on preparing the city for a storm like Hurricane Katrina was a Democrat from Oregon.

Earlier this year, Rep. Earl Blumenauer delivered a speech on the House floor that drew parallels between the 2004 tsunami in Southeast Asia and the vulnerability of New Orleans.

Blumenauer's predictions of a catastrophe came true as Katrina flooded New Orleans, leading to a death toll that is expected to climb into the thousands.

On Jan. 26, Blumenauer said a hurricane hitting New Orleans would lead to a "30-foot wall of water hitting the city, causing thousands of deaths and $100 billion in damage."

He added, "The experience of Southeast Asia should convince us all of the urgent need for congressional action. … Prevention and planning will pay off. Maybe the devastation will encourage us to act before disaster strikes."

In a Sept. 15, 2004, floor speech, Blumenauer said damage inflicted by a hurricane "might represent the loss of the city of New Orleans. … Now is the time to deal with policies that will make a difference protecting people."

GOP Agenda Shifts As Political Trials Grow (WP)

By Shailagh Murray And Charles Babington

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

As Congress returns from its August recess today, Republicans face a far more troubling political landscape than the one they left a month ago, according to lawmakers in both parties.

Gasoline prices have skyrocketed, the Bush administration is being widely criticized for its handling of Hurricane Katrina, and as the war in Iraq grows increasingly unpopular, the president's approval ratings have sunk to an all-time low. Further complicating the picture is a rare double vacancy on the Supreme Court, which could trigger sniping between the GOP's center and right wing if not deftly handled.

"We're going to have a busy time," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

As the pressure on Republicans builds, Democrats are sounding emboldened. One sign of GOP unease: The Senate was supposed to vote this week on whether to permanently repeal the estate tax, but Frist said yesterday that the bill will be temporarily shelved. The announcement came two hours after Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) called for Republicans to back off tax cuts in the wake of the Katrina tragedy. "Not now, for heaven's sake," Reid said.

Some conservatives worry that Bush has given Democrats an opening by naming John G. Roberts Jr. to succeed Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who died Saturday night. Roberts had been nominated to succeed the retiring Sandra Day O'Connor, and that confirmation process was scheduled to start today. Because Rehnquist was a solid conservative and

O'Connor a centrist, the argument goes, liberals will fight much harder to keep a conservative -- such as Roberts -- from getting the O'Connor seat, whereas the philosophy of Rehnquist's successor is less vital to them.

Lawmakers in both parties said the surging price of gas and spot shortages are leading concerns in their states and districts, and Democrats will try to get the upper hand by calling for price caps and a requirement that oil companies and refineries disclose their pricing policies. Frist said Republicans would proceed with legislation to allow oil drilling in the Alaska wilderness.

Another immediate concern will be disaster relief. Frist, a surgeon who spent the weekend treating hurricane victims in New Orleans, said the Senate would focus on several Katrina-related matters, including aid to victims, rebuilding and economic development assistance, and examining the many ways that government fell short in dealing with the crisis. "We're going to take a hard, hard look at our disaster response," Frist said.

Although congressional Republicans facing reelection next year are unhappy with Bush's slide in the polls, there's no sense of panic, said Stu Rothenberg, who writes an independent political newsletter. "But inevitably, if we continue to see a softening in the president's numbers, every Republican is going to be expressing some concern, if not alarm," he said.

The biggest wild card, Republicans say, is the war in Iraq. The dominant issue before the hurricane will resurface when Congress tries to complete a defense bill.

"People don't see light at the end of the tunnel in Iraq," said Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa). "If the situation a year from now is the same, it's going to be the number one issue in the next election, and consequently for incumbent Republicans, a problem."

One of the more vulnerable GOP members is Rep. Michael G. Fitzpatrick, a freshman from a moderate district in the Philadelphia suburbs. Fitzpatrick does not air his concerns publicly, as a few Republicans are beginning to do, but he is worried about the safety of U.S. troops and has written to the Pentagon pressing for improved body armor and vehicle protection.

"I think everyone is on the edge of their seat right now, hoping for the best, but preparing for what comes next," Fitzpatrick said. If the situation does not improve soon, "I think you will see more members of Congress speaking up generally," he said.

Katrina could have bolstered Bush's standing, but instead his response may have weakened his standing in Congress, particularly among lawmakers from the affected Gulf Coast region. Sen. Mary Landrieu of Louisiana, a conservative Democrat who often supported Bush proposals, was outraged to hear White House officials disparage the local response. On ABC's "This Week," she said of Bush, "One more word about it after this show airs and I might likely have to punch him. Literally."

Sen. Trent Lott (R) of Mississippi, who lost his Pascagoula home in the storm, released a statement headlined "I Am Demanding Help for Mississippi." After a blistering critique of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, Lott thanked Bush for his efforts.

Some argue that the hurricane disaster, high fuel prices and continued problems in Iraq will increase chances that Bush will name a centrist, consensus nominee to replace O'Connor.

Even before Katrina hit, Republicans were struggling to keep their agenda on track. They had made little progress with revamping Social Security, but immigration reform was gaining momentum.

Bush and congressional Republicans might argue that soaring gasoline prices and a storm-damaged economy call for tax cuts -- in the name of helping middle-class people fuel their cars and keeping Katrina from slowing the economy, Rothenberg said. House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) said last week that Congress should consider tax cuts as part of a "stimulus package" in response to Katrina.

But Democrats say they are poised to pounce. "If they think they can go forward as if nothing's changed, they do not understand what the rest of America has witnessed over the past week," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), who heads the House Democrats' campaign committee.

Clinton And Bush In Charity Reprise (WP)

By Lisa Rein

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

HOUSTON, Sept. 5 -- Former presidents George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton announced a nationwide fundraising campaign Monday to help the victims of Hurricane Katrina, saying they will bring what they learned from reaching out to tsunami victims halfway around the world to a crisis on their doorstep.

"I guess I could say on behalf of all of us that nothing we can do can be an adequate response to the agony we've seen," Clinton said at a news conference at the Reliant Arena. "The reason we decided to do this, not that we think the governments won't do their part, is we need to have a fund where we can fill in the blanks and help people who otherwise will be totally overlooked," he said. "A lot of people, they have no cars, no homes, nothing."

A dozen members of Congress and local and state officials sat on chairs below the podium, among them former first lady Barbara Bush, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and Texas Gov. Rick Perry (R). In the exhibit hall a floor below, more than 4,000 evacuees were waking up on cots to another day of uncertainty in one of Houston's newest shelters.

The Bush-Clinton Katrina Fund will serve as an umbrella for special funds established by the governors of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama to assist those displaced in their states and will focus on collecting donations to assist in the long-term recovery plan for areas devastated by the storm, officials said.

The former presidents said they hope to step in where government and relief agencies leave off. "The fund will take the outpouring of generosity to the next level," Bush said.

That outpouring has already been substantial. The Chronicle of Philanthropy reported yesterday that $487 million has been raised in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. Corporate donations already were pouring in, including $20 million from Wal-Mart and the Walton Family Foundation, Bush and Clinton said.

With the administration facing public criticism for a slow response to the crisis, there was no sign of friction between the president's father and Clinton. When asked to comment on the criticism of President Bush, his father said: "We can always blame somebody else -- that's one of the things you do after a football game, figure out what went wrong. We're trying to make things better."

Later, on CNN, Clinton said of the hurricane response: "Our government failed those people in the beginning, and I take it now there is no dispute about it. One hundred percent of the people I've talked to here recognize that it was a failure, and I personally believe that there should be a serious analysis of it."

The Red Cross said it has logged 75,000 names on its online registry of hurricane victims staying at shelters in Texas and other states, a database created to help reunite splintered families.

Spokeswoman Tara Lynch also said that the organization has received an unprecedented $404 million in donations as of yesterday morning, much of it from online and telephone donations. She said the agency has opened more than 470 shelters in 12 states and is now helping hurricane victims in 30 states.

Clinton Is An Unexpected Partner In The Hurricane Effort (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney And John M. Broder

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 5 - As President Bush and administration officials fanned out across the Gulf Coast in the White House's campaign to deal with criticism that they had failed in managing the tragedy of Hurricane Katrina, there was one unexpected face in their crowd on Monday: former President Bill Clinton.

Mr. Clinton was at Reliant Center next to the Astrodome in Houston, where about 3,800 homeless New Orleans residents had decamped, standing next to former President George Bush as they announced the creation of the Bush-Clinton Katrina Fund to help hurricane victims. After that, the two former presidents, along with Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, toured the shelter, while President Bush visited storm-struck areas of Mississippi and Louisiana, providing a flow of television images suggesting a concerned White House on the march.

Mr. Clinton's visit to the Houston shelter on Monday is the latest time the former president has come to the current president's aid in his second term, from early in the year when Mr. Bush was criticized for his slow response to the tsunami, to initially defending the administration's response to Hurricane Katrina at the White House last week, to praising the credentials of Judge John G. Roberts Jr., Mr. Bush's choice for the Supreme Court. And it offered what many Democrats described as a vivid, if slightly disconcerting, insight into the complicated and increasingly transactional relationship between the Bush and Clinton families.

While officials in both parties said they had no doubt that both men were first and foremost intent on helping Americans, they also took note of the web of political benefits spun by this burgeoning alliance. It helps Mr. Bush during the roughest time of his presidency, Mr. Clinton as he tries to establish himself as a respected and admired former president and Mrs. Clinton as she potentially prepares to run for president in 2008.

For President Bush, Mr. Clinton's agreement to a request by the White House chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr., to join former President Bush in their second fund-raising project could hardly have been better timed. One of the crucial elements of a White House strategy to help Mr. Bush recover from the rounds of criticism he received in the wake of the disaster in New Orleans was to present him as above politics, and to avoid any kind of political entanglements with Democrats.

"It definitely helps Bush," said Douglas Sosnik, who was White House political director under Mr. Clinton. "Given what has happened to Bush in the last six or seven days, there is not a single aspect of this crisis at all that can be positive to Bush. So anything he can do to get politics out of this - given how vulnerable he is politically - the better for him."

At the same time, the political benefits for the former president and Mrs. Clinton were at least as striking. Mr. Clinton has been engaged in a campaign to establish himself as a respected force in American life after a rather messy departure from the White House, using his foundation for prominent work in the fight against AIDS in Africa.

He is also trying to be less polarizing than he was when he left the White House, an effort to become less of a political weight if, as expected, Mrs. Clinton runs for president, friends said. The presence of Mr. Clinton next to Mr. Bush will make it that much harder, some Democrats said, for Republicans to attack the Clintons.

"Isn't it interesting that Bush realizes he's in trouble and he has to phone President Clinton for cover?" said Bob Mulholland, a Democratic leader from California. "Bush is standing next to President Clinton for cover. You've got all these photos of President Clinton with both Bushes. It's hard for a Republican in the national arena to be attacking the Clintons with these kind of images out there."

White House officials did not respond to a request for comment.

Mr. Clinton's spokesman, Jay Carson, said of Mr. Clinton's involvement: "In a time of crisis like this, it is President Clinton's nature to do everything he can to help victims. His involvement is tied to nothing other than to help the tens of thousands of victims of the hurricane."

Still, the situation was complicated Monday. Mr. Clinton seemed to be struggling to be diplomatic in talking about the administration's response to the hurricane damage. He told CNN that "we failed once, but we don't want to fail a second time." But at times he seemed to be following the political directions of the White House in deferring questions about the past and turning them into questions about the future.

"It's an appropriate thing to look into, but not at this time - they're still finding bodies there," Mr. Clinton said in Houston.

By contrast, Mrs. Clinton was fierce in denouncing the administration, particularly for budget cuts it made to the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

"It was basically taken apart and denied funding," she said. Mrs. Clinton, in an interview, disputed the suggestion that her husband was joining hands with Mr. Bush and Mr. Bush.

"He is no longer in politics," she said. "He is a former president with an enormous amount of influence and just as during the tsunami, he is willing to serve his country. He has expressed strong feelings about the way this has been handled. My role is different. I'm on the front lines dealing with these issues day to day."
